The main business of this parliament was the act concerning the new test that was proposed. It had been promised in the beginning of the session, that as soon as an act for maintaining the succession should pass, they should have all the security that they could desire for the protestant religion. So many zealous men began to call for some more effectual security for their religion; upon which a test was proposed, for all that should be capable of any office in church or state, or of electing or being elected members of parliament, that they should adhere firmly to the protestant religion; to which the court party added, the condemning of all resistance in any sort, or under any pretence, the renouncing the covenant, and an obligation to defend all the king's rights and prerogatives; and that they should never meet to treat of any matter, civil or ecclesiastical, but by the king's permission; and never endeavour any alteration in the government, in church or state. And they were to swear all this according to the literal sense of the words. The test was thus loaded at first to make the other side grow weary of the motion and let it fall, which they would willingly have done. But the duke was made to apprehend that he would find such a test as this prove much for his service; so it seems that article of the protestant religion was forgiven, for the service that was expected from the other parts of the test. There was a hot debate upon the imposing it on all that might elect, or be elected, members of parliament. It was said that was the most essential of all the privileges of the subjects, therefore they ought not to be limited in it. The bishops were earnest for this, which they thought would secure them for ever from a presbyterian parliament. It was carried in the vote; and that made many of the court more zealous than ever for carrying through the act. Some proposed that there should be two tests: one for papists, with higher incapacities, and another for presbyterians, with milder censures. But that was rejected with much scorn, some making their court, by saying, they were more in danger from the presbyterians than from the papists. And it was reported that Paterson, then bishop of Edinburgh, said to the duke, that he thought the two religions, popish and protestant, were so equally stated in his mind, that a few grains of loyalty, in which the protestants had the better of the papists, turned the balance with him. Another clause in the bill was liable to great objections: all the royal family were excepted out of it. Lord Argyle spoke zealously against this; he said, the only danger we could apprehend as to popery was if any of the royal family should happen to be perverted; therefore he thought it was better to have no act at all than such a clause in it. Some few seconded him; but it was carried without any considerable opposition. The nicest point of all was, what definition, or standard, should be made for fixing the sense of so general a term as "the protestant religion." Dalrymple proposed the confession of faith agreed on in the year one thousand five hundred and fifty-nine, and enacted in parliament in one thousand five hundred and sixty-seven, which was the only confession of faith that had then the sanction of a law. That was a book so worn out of use, that scarcely any one in the whole parliament had ever read it; none of the bishops had, as appeared afterwards. For these last thirty years, the only confession of faith that was read in Scotland, was that which the assembly of divines at Westminster, Anno 1648, had set out, which the Scotch kirk had set up instead of the old one; and the bishops had left it in possession, though the authority that enacted it was annulled. So here a book was made the matter of an oath, (for they were to swear that they would adhere to the protestant religion, as it was declared in the confession of faith enacted in the year 1567, that contained a large system of religion that was not so much as known to those who enacted it :) yet the bishops went all into it. Dalrymple, who had read it, thought there were propositions in it which, being better considered, would make the test be let fall; for in it the repressing of tyranny is reckoned a duty incumbent on good subjects. And the confession being made after the Scots had deposed the queen regent, and it being ratified in parliament after they had forced their queen Mary to resign, it was very plain what they, who made and enacted this confession, meant by the repressing of tyranny. But the duke and his party set it on so earnestly, that upon one day's debate the act passed, though only by a majority of seven voices. There was some appearance of security to the protestant religion by this test; but the prerogative of the crown in ecclesiastical matters had been raised so high by duke Lauderdale's act, that the obliging all people to maintain that with the rest of the prerogative, might have made way for everything. All ecclesiastical courts subsisted now by this test, only upon the king's permission, and at his discretion.

The parliament of Scotland was dissolved soon after this act passed; and Hyde was sent down from the king to the duke immediately upon it. It was given out that he was sent by the king to press the duke upon this victory to show, that what ill usage could not extort from him he would now do of his own accord, and return to the church of England. I was assured that lord Halifax had prevailed with the king to write to him to that purpose. The letter was written, but was not sent; but lord Hyde had it in charge to manage it as a message. How much of this is true I cannot tell; one thing is certain, that if it was true it had no effect.

As soon as the test with the confession of faith was printed, there was a universal murmuring among the best of the clergy. Many were against the swearing to a system made up of so many propositions, of which some were at least doubtful; though it was found to be much more moderate in many points than could have been well expected, considering the heat of that time. There was a limitation put on the duty of subjects in the article, by which they were required not to resist any whom God had placed in authority, in these words, "While they pass not the bounds of their office." And in another they condemned those who resist the supreme power, "Doing that thing which appertaineth to his charge." These were propositions now of a very ill sound. They were also highly offended at the great extent of the prerogative in the point of supremacy, by which the king turned bishops out at pleasure by a letter. It was hard enough to bear this; but it seemed intolerable to oblige men by oath to maintain it. The king might by a proclamation put down even episcopacy itself, as the law then stood; and by this oath they would be bound to maintain that. All meeting in synods, or for ordinations, were hereafter to be held only by permission; so that all the visible ways of preserving religion depended now wholly on the king's good pleasure; and they saw that this would be a very feeble tenure under a popish king. The being tied to all this by oath seemed very hard. And when a church was yet in so imperfect a state, without liturgy or discipline, it was a strange imposition to make people swear never to endeavour any alteration either in church or state. Some, or all, of these exceptions did run so generally through the whole body of the clergy, that they were all shaking in their resolutions. To prevent this, an explanation was drawn by bishop Paterson, and passed in council. It was by it declared, that it was not meant that those who took the test should be bound to every article in the confession of faith, but only in so far as it contained the doctrine upon which the protestant churches had settled the reformation; and that the test did not cut off those rights which were acknowledged to have been in the primitive church for the first three hundred years after Christ; and an assurance was given, that the king intended never to change the government of the church. By this it was pretended that the greatest difficulties were now removed. But to this it was answered that they were to swear they took the oath in the literal sense of the words. So that if this explanation was not conform to the literal sense, they would be perjured who took it upon this explanation. The imposers of an oath could only declare the sense of it; but that could not be done by any other, much less by a lower authority, such as the privy council was confessed to be. Yet when men are to be undone if they do not submit to a hard law, they willingly catch at anything that seems to resolve their doubts.

About eighty of the most learned and pious of their clergy left all rather than comply with the terms of this law; and these were noted to be the best preachers, and the most zealous enemies to popery, that belonged to that church. The bishops, who thought their refusing the test was a reproach to those who took it, treated them with much contempt, and put them to many hardships. About twenty of them came up to England. I found them men of excellent tempers, pious and learned, and I esteemed it no small happiness that I had then so much credit by the ill opinion they had of me at court, that by this means I got most of them to be well settled in England; where they have behaved themselves so worthily, that I have great reason to rejoice in being made an instrument to get so many good men, who suffered for their consciences, to be again well employed, and well provided for. Most of them were formed by Charteris, who had been always a great enemy to the imposing of books and systems, as tests that must be signed and sworn, by such as are admitted to serve in the church. He had been for some years divinity professor at Edinburgh, where he had formed the minds of many of the young clergy both to an excellent temper and to a set of very good principles. He upon this retired, and lived private for some years. He wrote to me, and gave me an account of this breach that was likely to be in the church; and desired that I would try, by all the methods I could think of, to stop the proceedings upon the test. But the king had put the affairs of Scotland so entirely in the duke's hands, and the bishops here were so pleased with those clauses in the test that renounced the covenant, and all endeavours for any alteration in church and state, that I saw it was in vain to make any attempt at court.

Upon this matter an incident of great importance happened. The earl of Argyle was a privy councillor, and one of the commissioners of the treasury; so when the time limited was near lapsing he was forced to declare himself. He had once resolved to retire from all employments, but his engagements with duke Lauderdale's party, and the entanglements of his own affairs, overcame that. His main objection lay to that part which obliged them to endeavour no alteration in the government in church or state, which he thought was a limitation of the legislature. He desired leave to explain himself on that point; and he continued always to affirm, that the duke was satisfied with that which he proposed; so being called on the next day at the council table to take the test, he said he did not think that the parliament did intend an oath that should have any contradictions in one part of it to another; therefore he took the test, as it was consistent with itself; (this related to the absolute loyalty in the test, and the limitations that were on it in the confession:) and he added that he did not intend to bind himself up by it from doing anything in his station for the amending of anything in church or state, so far as was consistent with the protestant religion and the duty of a good subject; and he took that as a part of his oath. The thing passed, and he sat that day in council, and went next day to the treasury chamber, where he repeated the same words. Some officious people upon this came and suggested to the duke, that great advantage might be taken against him from these words. So at the treasury chamber he was desired to write them down and give them to the clerk, which he did, and was immediately made a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh upon it. It was said this was high treason, and the assuming to himself the legislative power, in his giving a sense of an act of parliament, and making that a part of his oath. It was also said, that his saying that he did not think the parliament intended an oath that did contradict itself, was a tacit way of saying that he did think it, and was a defaming and a spreading lies of the proceedings of parliament, which was capital. The liberty that he reserved to himself was likewise called treasonable, in assuming a power to act against law. These were such apparent stretches, that for some days it was believed all this was done only to affright him to a more absolute submission, and to surrender up some of those great jurisdictions over the Highlands that were in his family*. He desired he might be admitted to speak with the duke in private, but that was refused. He had let his old correspondence with me fall for some years; but I thought it became me in this extremity to serve him all I could. And I prevailed with lord Halifax to speak so oft to the king about it, that it came to be known; and lord Argyle wrote me some letters of thanks upon it. Duke Lauderdale was still in a firm friendship with him, and tried his whole strength with the king to preserve him; but he was sinking both in body and mind, and was likely to be cast off in his old age. Upon which I also prevailed with lord Halifax to offer him his service, for which duke Lauderdale sent me very kind messages. I thought these were the only returns that I ought to make him for all the injuries he had done me, thus to serve him and his friends in distress. But the duke of York took this, as he did everything from me, by the worst handle possible. He said I would reconcile myself to the greatest enemies I had in opposition to him. Upon this it was not thought fit upon many accounts that I should go and see duke Lauderdale, which I had intended to do. It was well known I had done him acts of friendship ; so the scandal of being in enmity with him was over ; for a Christian is no man's enemy : and he will always study to overcome evil with good.

Lord Argyle was brought to a trial for the words he had spoken. The fact was certain ; so the debate lay on a point of law, what guilt could be made out of his words. Lockhart pleaded three hours for him, and showed so manifestly that his words had nothing criminal, much less of treason, in them, that, if his cause had not been determined before his trial, no harm could have come to him. The court that was to judge the point of law (or the relevancy of the libel, as it is called in Scotland,) consisted of a justice-general, the justice-clerk, and of five judges. The justice-general does not yote, unless the court is equally divided. One of the judges was deaf, and so old that he could not sit all the while the trial lasted, but went home and to bed. The other four were equally divided. so the old judge was sent for : and he turned it against lord Argyle. The jury was only to find the fact proved ; but they were officious, and found it treason ; and to make a show of impartiality, whereas in the libel he was charged with perjury for taking the oath falsely, they acquitted him of the perjury. No sentence in our age was more universally cried out on than this. All people spoke of it, and of the duke, who drove it on, with horror. All that was said to lessen that was, that duke Lauderdale had restored the family with such an extended jurisdiction, that he was really the master of all the Highlands ; so that it was fit to attain him, that by a new restoring him, these grants might be better limited. This, as the duke wrote to the king, was all he intended by it, as lord Halifax assured me. But lord Argyle was made believe that the duke intended to proceed to execution. Some more of the guards were ordered to come to Edinburgh. Rooms were also fitted for him in the common jail, to which peers used to be removed a few days before their execution. And a person of quality, whom lord Argyle never named, affirmed to him, on his honour, that he heard one, who was in great favour, say to the duke, the thing must be done, and that it would be easier to satisfy the king about it after it was done, than to obtain his leave for doing it. It is certain, many of the Scotch nobility did believe that it was intended he should die.

Upon these reasons lord Argyle made his escape out of the castle in a disguise. Others suspected those stories were sent to him on purpose to frighten him to make his escape ; as that which would justify further severities against him. He came to London, and lurked for some months there. It was thought I was in his secret. But though I knew one that knew it, and saw many papers that he then wrote, giving an account of all that matter, yet I abhorred lying ; and it was not easy to have kept out of the danger of that, if I had seen him, or known where he was ; so I avoided it by not seeing him. One that saw him knew him, and went and told the king of it ; but he would have no search made for him, and retained still very good thoughts of him. In one of lord Argyle's papers he wrote, that if ever he was admitted to speak with the king, he could convince him how much he merited at his hands, by that which had drawn the duke's indignation on him. He that showed me this explained it, that at the duke's first being in Scotland, when he apprehended that the king might have consented to the exclusion, he tried to engage lord Argyle to stick to him in that case ; who told him, he would always be true to the king, and likewise to him when it should come to his turn to be king ; but that he would go no further, nor engage himself, in case the king and he should quarrel.

I had lived many years in great friendship with the earl of Perth : I lived with him as a father with a son for above twelve years, and he had really the submission of a child to me. So, he having been on lord Argyle's jury, I wrote him a letter about it, with the freedom that I thought became me. He, to merit at the duke's hands, showed it to him, as he himself confessed to me. I could very easily forgive him, but could not esteem him much after so unworthy an action. He was then aspiring to great preferment, and so sacrificed me to obtain favour ; but he made greater sacrifices afterwards. The duke now seemed to triumph in Scotland. All stooped to him. The presbyterian party was much depressed. The best of the clergy were turned out. Yet, with all this, he was now more hated there than ever. Lord Argyle's business made him be looked on as one that would prove a terrible master when all should come into his hands. He had promised to redress all the merchants' grievances with relation to trade, that so he might gain their concurrence in parliament; but as soon as that was over, all his promises were forgotten. The accusations of perjury were stifled by him. And all the complaints of the great abuse lord Halton was guilty of, in the matter of the coin, ended in turning him out of all his employments, and obliging him to compound for his pardon by paying 20,000*l.* to two of the duke's creatures; so that all the reparation the kingdom had for the oppression of so many years, and so many acts of injustice, was, that two new oppressors had a share of the spoils, who went into the same tract, or rather invented new methods of oppression. All these things, together with a load of age and of a vast bulk, sank duke Lauderdale so that he died that summer. His heart seemed quite spent; there was not left above the bigness of a walnut of firm substance: the rest was spongy, more like the lungs than the heart.

The duke had leave given him to come to the king at Newmarket; and there he prevailed for leave to come up and live again at court. As he was going back to bring the duchess, the Gloucester frigate that carried him struck on a bank of sand. The duke got into a boat, and took care of his dogs, and some unknown persons, who were taken, from that earnest care of his, to be his priests. The long-boat went off with very few in her, though she might have carried off above eighty more than she did. One hundred and fifty persons perished: some of them men of great quality. But the duke took no notice of this cruel neglect, which was laid chiefly to Leg's charge*.

In Scotland the duke declared the new ministers. Gordon, now earl of Aberdeen, was made chancellor, and Queensbury was made treasurer; and the care of all affairs was committed to them. The duke at parting recommended to the council to preserve the public peace, to support the church, and to oblige all men to live regularly in obedience to the laws. The bishops made their court to him with so much zeal, that they wrote a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, to be communicated to the rest of the English bishops, setting forth in a very high strain his affection to the church, and his care of it; and, lest this piece of merit should have been stifled by Sancroft, they sent a copy of it to the press; which was

* When the duke proceeded from Margate to Leith in May 1682, he was nearly lost upon a sand in Yarmouth Roads. The Gloucester frigate, on which he was aboard, was wrecked, and about one hundred and ten persons perished: among them were the lords Perth, Middleton, Roxburgh, Hopton, and O'Brien, lieutenant Hyde, brother to the lord treasurer, and many other distinguished persons. The duke on this occasion certainly did not conduct himself with a becoming regard for human life. It does not appear to be demonstrated that he took his dogs into the boat to the exclusion of more valuable beings, as asserted by Burnet; but it is very certain that he was much too anxious to preserve his strong-box and the papers unwetted, when he might have been paying greater attention to the saving of the lives of his companions—companions “who, though ready to be swallowed up, gave a great huzza as soon as they saw his royal highness in safety.” In his first letter to lord Hyde, after the loss of his brother, there is much too little notice of the catastrophe, and too much obtruding of his own affairs.—(Memoirs of James the Second, by himself; Memoirs of Sam. Pepys, by lord Braybrooke, ii. 57—59; Singer's Clarendon Correspond. i. 67, &c.; Dalrymple's Memoirs, App. 68—71.) In a letter of the earl of Dartmouth, written in 1724, he thus defends his father's (Mr. Legg's) conduct on this occasion.—“My father was on board the Gloucester. After the ship had struck he several times pressed the duke to get into the boat, who refused to do so, saying, that if he were gone, nobody would take care of the ship, which he had hopes might be saved if not abandoned. My father, finding she was ready to sink, told him if he stayed any longer they should be obliged to force him out; upon which the duke ordered a strong box to be lifted into the boat, which, besides being very weighty, took up much room and time. My father asked, with some warmth, if there was anything in it worth a man's life. The duke answered that there were things of so great consequence, both to the king and himself, that he would hazard his own rather than it should be lost. Before he went off he enquired for lords Roxburgh and O'Brien, but the confusion and hurry was so great they could not be found. When the duke and as many as she would hold with safety were in the boat, my father stood with his sword drawn to hinder the crowd from oversetting her; which is what I suppose the bishop (Burnet) esteemed a fault. But the king thanked him publicly for the care he had taken of the duke; and the duchess, who was not apt to favour him much upon other occasions, said upon this, she thought herself more obliged to him than to any man in the world, and should do so as long as she lived. I believe the bishop's reflection upon the duke for his care of the dogs to be ill-grounded; for I remember a story, in everybody's mouth at the time, of a struggle that happened for a plank between sir Charles Scarborough and the duke's dog, Mumper, which convinces me that the dogs were left to take care of themselves, as he did, if there were any more on board, which I never heard until the bishop's story book was published.” —Sir John Dalrymple's Memoirs, Appendix, p. 71.

* Sir John Berry, in an official report of the narrative, observes, “The government of the ship being lost, and every one crying for help, yet amidst all this disorder and confusion, I could not but observe the great duty the poor seamen had for the preservation of his royal highness's person; when the barge was hoisting out, and lowered down into the water, not one man so much as proffered to run into her; but in the midst of all their affliction and diving condition did rejoice and thank God his royal highness was preserved.”—Some Hist. Memoirs of the Duke of York in 1682—Singer's Clarendon Corr. i. 71.

a greater reproach to them than a service to the duke, who could not but despise such abject and indecent flattery. The proceedings against conventicles were now likely to be severer than ever; all the fines, that were set so high by law that they were never before levied, but on some particular instances, were now ordered to be levied without exception. All people upon that saw they must either conform, or be quite undone. The chancellor laid down a method for proceeding against all offenders punctually; and the treasurer was as rigorous in ordering all the fines to be levied.

When the people saw this, they came all to church again: and that in some places where all sermons had been discontinued for many years. But they came in so awkward a manner that it was visible they did not mean to worship God, but only to stay some time within the church walls; and they were either talking, or sleeping, all the while. Yet most of the clergy seemed to be transported with this change of their condition, and sent up many panegyrics of the glorious services that the duke had done their church. The enemies of religion observed the ill nature of the one side, and the cowardliness of the other, and pleased themselves in censuring them both. And by this means an impious and atheistical leaven began to corrupt most of the younger sort. This has since that time made a great progress in that kingdom, which was before the freest from it of any nation in Christendom. The beginnings of it were reckoned from the duke's stay among them, and from his court, which have been cultivated since with much care and but too much success.

About the end of the year, two trials gave all people sad apprehensions of what they were to look for. One Home was charged by a kinsman of his own, for having been at Bothwell Bridge. All gentlemen of estates were excepted out of the indemnity; so he, having an estate, could have no benefit by that. One swore he saw him go into a village and seize on some arms; another swore he saw him ride towards the body of the rebels; but none did swear that they saw him there. He was indeed among them, but there was no proof of it. And he proved, that he was not in the company where the single witness swore he saw him seize on arms, and did evidently discredit him; yet he was convicted and condemned on that single evidence that was so manifestly proved to be infamous. Many were sensible of the mischievousness of such a precedent; and great applications were made to the duke for saving his life; but he was not born under a pardoning planet. Lord Aberdeen, the chancellor, prosecuted Home with the more rigour, because his own grandfather had suffered in the late times for bearing arms on the king's side, and Home's father was one of the jury that cast him. The day of his execution was set to be on the same day of the year on which lord Stafford had suffered; which was thought done in compliment to the duke, as a retaliation for his blood. Yet Home's infamous kinsman, who had so basely sworn against him, lived not to see his execution; for he died before it, full of horror for what he had done. Another trial went much deeper; and the consequences of it struck a terror into the whole country.

One Weir of Blakewood, that managed the marquis of Douglas's concerns, was accused of treason for having kept company with one that had been in the business of Bothwell Bridge. Blakewood pleaded for himself, that the person, on whose account he was now prosecuted as an abettor of traitors, had never been marked out by the government by process, or proclamation. It did not so much as appear that he had ever suspected him upon that account. He had lived in his own house quietly for some years after that rebellion, before he employed him: and if the government seemed to forget his crime, it was no wonder if others entered into common dealings with him. All the lawyers were of opinion, that nothing could be made of this prosecution: so that Blakewood made use of no secret application, thinking he was in no danger. But the court came to a strange sentence in this matter, by these steps: they judged, that all men who suspected any to have been in the rebellion, were bound to discover such their suspicion, and to give no harbour to such persons: that the bare suspicion made it treason to harbour the person suspected, whether he was guilty or not: that if any person was under such a suspicion, it was to be presumed that all the neighbourhood knew it: so that there was no need of proving that against any particular person, since the presumption of law did prove it: and it being proved that the person with whom Blakewood had conversed lay under that suspicion, Blakewood was upon that condemned as guilty of high treason. This was such a constructive treason, that went upon so many unreasonable suppositions, that it shewed the shamelessness of a sort of man, who had been for forty years declaiming against a parliamentary attainder for a constructive treason in the case of the earl of Stafford, and did now in a common court of justice condemn a man upon a train of so many inferences, that it was not possible to make it look even like a constructive treason. The day of his execution was set; and though the marquis of Douglas wrote earnestly to the duke for his pardon, that was denied. He only obtained two months' reprieve for making up his accounts. The reprieve was renewed once or twice: so Blakewood was not executed. This put all the gentry in a great fright: many knew they were as obnoxious as Blakewood was: and none could have the comfort to know that he was safe. This revived among them a design, that Lockhart had set on foot ten years before, of carrying over a plantation to Carolina. All the presbyterian party saw they were now disinherited of a main part of their birthright, of choosing their representatives in parliament: and upon that they said, they would now seek a country where they might live undisturbed, as freemen, and as Christians. The duke encouraged the motion: he was glad to have many untoward people sent far away, who he reckoned would be ready upon the first favourable conjuncture, to break out into a new rebellion. Some gentlemen were sent up to treat with the patentees of Carolina: they did not like the government of those palatinates, as they were called: yet the prospect of so great a colony obtained to them all the conditions they proposed. I was made acquainted with all the steps they made; for those who were sent up were particularly recommended to me. In the negotiation this year there was no mixing with the malcontents in England: only they who were sent up went among them, and informed them of the oppressions they lay under; in particular of the terror with which this sentence against Blakewood had struck them all. The court resolved to prosecute that farther: for a proclamation was issued out in the beginning of the year eighty-three, by which the king ordered circuit courts to be sent round the western and southern counties, to enquire after all who had been guilty of harbouring, or conversing with, those who had been in rebellion, even though there had been neither process nor proclamation issued out against them. He also ordered, that all who were found guilty of such converse with them should be prosecuted as traitors. This inquisition was to last three years: and at the end of that time all was to conclude in a full indemnity to such as should not be then under prosecution. But the indemnity was to take place immediately to all such as should take the test. This was perhaps such a proclamation as the world had not seen since the days of the duke of Alba. Upon it great numbers ran in to take the test, declaring at the same time that they took it against their consciences; but they would do any thing to be safe. Such as resolved not to take it were trying how to settle or sell their estates, and resolved to leave the country, which was now in a very oppressed and desperate state.

But I must next turn again to the affairs of England. The court was every where triumphant: the duke was highly complimented by all, and seemed to have overcome all difficulties. The court, not content with all their victories, resolved to free themselves from the fears of troublesome parliaments for the future. The cities and boroughs of England were invited, and prevailed on, to demonstrate their loyalty, by surrendering up their charters, and taking new ones modelled as the court thought fit. It was much questioned whether those surrenders were good in law or not: it was said, that those who were in the government in corporations, and had their charters and seals trusted to their keeping, were not the proprietors, nor masters of those rights: they could not extinguish those corporations, nor part with any of their privileges. Others said, that whatever might be objected to the reason and equity of the thing, yet, when the seal of a corporation was put to any deed, such a deed was good in law. The matter goes beyond my skill in law to determine it: this is certain, that whatsoever may be said in law, there is no sort of theft or perfidy more criminal than for a body of men, whom their neighbours have trusted with their concerns, to steal away their charters, and affix their seals to such a deed, betraying in that their trust and their oaths. In former ages corporations were jealous of their privileges and customs to excess and superstition: so that it looked like a strange degeneracy, when all these were now delivered up; and this on design to pack a parliament, that might make way for a popish king. So that, instead of securing us from popery under such a prince, these persons were now contriving ways to make all easy to him. Popery at all times has looked odious and cruel: yet what the emperor had lately done in Hungary, and what the king of France was then doing against protestants in that kingdom, shewed that their religion was as perfidious and as cruel in this age, as it had been in the last: and by the duke's government of Scotland, all men did see what was to be expected from him. All this laid together, the whole looked like an extravagant fit of madness: yet no part of it was so unaccountable, as the high strains to which the universities and most of the clergy were carried. The non-conformists were now prosecuted with much eagerness: this was visibly set on by the papists; and it was wisely done of them; for they knew how much the non-conformists were set against them; and therefore they made use of the indiscreet heat of some angry clergymen to ruin them: this they knew would render the clergy odious, and give the papists great advantages against them, if ever they should run into an opposition to their designs.

At Midsummer a new contest discovered how little the court resolved to regard either justice or decency. The court had carried the election of sir John Moor to be mayor of the city of London at Michaelmas eighty-one. He was the alderman on whom the election fell in course. Yet some who knew him well were for setting him aside, as one whom the court would easily manage. He had been a non-conformist himself, till he grew so rich, that he had a mind to go through the dignities of the city: but though he conformed to the church, yet he was still looked on, as one that in his heart favoured the sectaries: and upon this occasion he persuaded some of their preachers to go among their congregations to get votes for him. Others, who knew him to be a flexible and faint-hearted man, opposed his election: yet it was carried for him. The opposition that was made to his election had sharpened him so much, that he became in all things compliant to the court, in particular to secretary Jenkins, who took him into his own management. When the day came, in which the mayor used to drink to one, and to mark him out for sheriff, he drank to North, a merchant that was brother to the chief justice. Upon that it was pretended, that this ceremony was not a bare nomination, which the common hall might receive or refuse, as they had a mind to it; but that this made the sheriff, and that the common hall was bound to receive and confirm him in course, as the king did the mayor. On the other hand it was said, that the right was to be determined by the charter, which granted the election of the sheriffs to the citizens of London; and that, whatever customs had crept in among them, the right still lay where the charter had lodged it among the citizens. But the court was resolved to carry this point; and they found orders that had been made in the city concerning this particular, which gave some colour to this pretension of the mayor's. So he claimed it on Midsummer day; and said, the common hall were to go and elect one sheriff, and to confirm the other that had been declared by him. The hall on the other hand said, that the right of choosing both was in them. The old sheriffs put it according to custom to a poll: and it was visible, the much greater number was against the lord mayor. The sheriffs were always understood to be the officers of that court: so the adjourning it belonged to them: yet the mayor adjourned the court, which they said he had no power to do, and so went on with the poll. There was no disorder in the whole progress of the matter, if that was not to be called one, that they proceeded after the mayor had adjourned the poll: but though the mayor's party carried themselves with great insolence towards the other party, yet they shewed on this occasion more temper than could have been expected from so great a body, who thought their rights were now invaded. The mayor upon this resolved to take another poll, to which none should be admitted, but those who were contented to vote only for one, and to approve his nomination for the other. And it was resolved, that his poll should be that, by which the business should be settled: and though the sheriff's poll exceeded his by many hundreds, yet order was given to return those on the mayor's poll, and that they should be sworn; and so those of the sheriff's poll should be left to seek their remedy by law, where they could find it. Box, who was chosen by the mayor's party and joined to North, had no mind to serve upon so doubtful an election, where so many actions would lie, if it was judged against them at law: and he could not be persuaded to hold it. So it was necessary to call a new common hall, and to proceed to a new election: and then, without any proclamation made, as was usual, one in a corner near the mayor named Rich, and about thirty more, applauded it; the rest of those in the hall, that was full of people and of noise, hearing nothing of it. Upon this it was said, that Rich was chosen without any contradiction: and so North and Rich were returned, and sworn sheriffs for the ensuing year. The violence and the injustice with which this matter was managed, shewed, that the court was resolved to carry that point at any rate: and this gave great occasions of jealousy, that some wicked design was on foot, for which it was necessary, in the first place, to be sure of favourable juries.

Lord Shaftesbury upon this, knowing how obnoxious he was, went out of England. His voyage was fatal to him: he just got to Amsterdam to die in it. Of the last parts of his life I shall have some occasion to make mention afterwards. When Michaelmas day came, those who found how much they had been deceived in Moor, resolved to choose a mayor that might be depended on. The poll was closed when the court thought they had the majority; but upon casting it up it appeared they had lost it: so they fell to canvass it: and they made such exceptions to those of the other side, that they discounted as many voices as gave them the majority. This was also managed in so gross a manner, that it was visible the court was resolved by fair or foul means to have the government of the city in their own hands. But because they would not be at this trouble, nor run this hazard every year, it was resolved that the charter of the city must either be given up, or be adjudged to the king. The former was much the easier way; so great pains was taken to manage the next election of the common council, so as that they might be tractable in this point. There was much injustice complained of in many of the wards of the city, both in the poll, and in the returns that were made. In order to the disabling all the dissenters from having a vote in that election, the bishop and clergy of London were pressed by the court to prosecute them in the church courts, that so they might excommunicate them; which some lawyers thought would render them incapable to vote, though other lawyers were very positively of another opinion. It is certain it gave at least a colour to deny them votes. The bishop of London began to apprehend that things were running too fast, and was backward in the matter. The clergy of the city refused to make presentments: the law laid that on the churchwardens: and so they would not meddle officiously. The king was displeased with them for their remissness: but after all the practices of the court, in the returns of the common council of the city, they could not bring it near an equality for delivering up their charter. Jenkins managed the whole business of the city with so many indirect practices, that the reputation he had for probity was much blemished by it: he seemed to think it was necessary to bring the city to a dependence on the court in the fairest methods he could fall on; and, if these did not succeed, that then he was to take the most effectual ones, hoping that a good intention would excuse bad practices.

The earl of Sunderland had been disgraced after the exclusion parliaments, as they were now called, were dissolved: but the king had so entire a confidence in him, and lady Portsmouth was so much in his interests, that upon great submissions made to the duke, he was again restored to be secretary this winter. Lord Hyde was the person that disposed the duke to it. Upon that lord Halifax and he fell to be in ill terms; for he hated lord Sunderland beyond expression, though he had married his sister. From lord Sunderland's returning to his post, all men concluded, that his declaring as he did for the exclusion, was certainly done by direction from the king, who naturally loved craft and a double game, that so he might have proper instruments to work by, which way soever he had turned himself in that affair. The king was the more desirous to have lord Sunderland again near him, that he might have somebody about him who understood foreign affairs. Jenkins understood nothing; but he had so much credit with the high church party, that he was of great use to the court. Lord Conway was brought in to be the other secretary, who was so very ignorant of foreign affairs, that his province being the north, when one of the foreign ministers talked to him of the circles of Germany, it amazed him: he could not imagine what circles had to do with affairs of state. He was now dismissed. Lord Halifax and lord Hyde fell to be in an open war, and were both much hated. Lord Halifax charged Hyde, who was at this time made earl of Rochester, with bribery, for having farmed a branch of the revenue much lower than had been proffered for it. Lord Halifax acquainted the king first with it; and, as he told me, he desired lord Rochester himself to examine into it, he being inclined to think it was rather an abuse put on him, than corruption in himself. But he saw lord Rochester was cold in the matter, and instead of prosecuting any for it, protected all concerned in it. He laid the complaint before the king in council: and to convince the king how ill a bargain he had made, the complainers offered, if he would break the bargain, to give him 40,000*l.* more than he was to have from the farmers. He looked also into the other branches of the revenue, and found cause to suspect much corruption in every one of them: and he got undertakers to offer at a farm of the whole revenue. In this he had all the court on his side: for the king being now resolved to live on his revenue, without putting himself on a parliament, he was forced on a great reduction of expense: so that many payments ran in arrear: and the whole court was so ill paid, that the offering any thing that would raise the revenue, and blemish the management of the treasury, was very acceptable to all in it. Lord Rochester was also much hated: but the duke and the lady Portsmouth both protected the earl of Rochester so powerfully, that even propositions to the king's advantage, which blemished him, were not hearkened to. This touched in too tender a place to admit of a reconciliation: the duke forgot all lord Halifax's service in the point of the exclusion: and the dearness that was between them, was now turned upon this to a coldness, and afterwards to a most violent enmity. Upon this occasion lord Halifax sent for me, (for I went no more near any that belonged to the court,) and he told me the whole matter. I asked him how he stood with the king: he answered, that neither he, nor I, had the making of the king: God had made him of a particular composition. He said, he knew what the king said to himself: I asked him, if he knew likewise what he said to others; for he was apt to say to his several ministers, whatsoever he thought would please them, as long as he intended to make use of them. By the death of the earl of Nottingham the seals were given to North, who was made lord Guilford. He had not the virtues of his predecessor, but he had parts far beyond him; they were turned to craft: so that whereas the former seemed to mean well even when he did ill, this man was believed to mean ill even when he did well. The court finding that the city of London could not be wrought on to surrender their charter, resolved to have it condemned by a judgment in the king's bench. Jones had died in May: so now Pollexfen and Treby were chiefly relied on by the city in this matter. Sawyer was the attorney-general; a dull, hot man, and forward to serve all the designs of the court*. He undertook by the advice of Saunders, a learned but a very immoral man, to overthrow the charter.

The two points upon which they rested the cause were, that the common council had

* Sir George Treby was a native of Devonshire, where he was born, at or near Plympton, about the year 1654. He left college without taking his degree, and was called to the bar by the benchers of the Middle Temple. He speedily became known for his legal acquirements. In 1679 he was a representative in parliament of Plympton; and was appointed chairman of the committee of secrecy relating to the development of evidence concerning the popish plot. In 1680 he was a manager of the prosecution against the earl of Stafford. In the same year, sir George Jeffreys being deprived of the recordership of London, for checking the petitions to the king relative to calling a parliament, Treby was elected to succeed him, and was knighted; but when the presbyterian plot was prosecuted, or discovered in 1683, he was deprived of his office. In 1688 he was made solicitor-general, Pollexfen being then made attorney-general; and the year following he succeeded to the latter preferment upon Pollexfen being raised to the bench. In 1692 he was made a serjeant, and shortly after lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. He died in 1701.—(Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Noble's Cont. of Grainger.) As an advocate and a judge he was distinguished for the maintenance of the public liberties; his chief foible was a fondness for wine. His works throw considerable light upon some of the public transactions of his period. They are "A Collection of Letters, &c. relating to the Popish Plot;" "Truth Vindicated; or, a Detection of the Scandals cast upon Sir Robert Clayton, and Sir George Treby, justices, and Slingsby Bethel and Henry Cornish, sheriffs, &c.;" this, and a pamphlet by Dr. Hawkins, related to the Confession of Fitzharris, the informer; "Speech to the Prince of Orange in 1688;" "Pleadings and Arguments upon the Quo Warranto, touching the Charter of the City of London." He is supposed to have written the marginal notes to Dyer's Reports.—Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys.

Sir Robert Sawyer was the son of sir Edmund Sawyer, who resided near Windsor. He was a barrister of the Inner Temple, having previously completed his education at Magdalen College, Cambridge. He seems to have possessed inflexible integrity. In 1661 he represented in parliament Great Wycomb. He became attorney-general, and was knighted in 1680, succeeding sir Cresswell Levin in that office. He lost his place for denying and opposing James the Second's dispensing power. Although he mitigated the brutal violence of Jeffreys during the trial of Plunket, yet he has been justly censured for similar disgraceful conduct at the trial of Lord William Russell. He had a large estate at High-Clere, in Hampshire, where he died, in 1692.—Wood's Fæsti Oxon.; Grainger's Gen. Biog. Dict., &c.

petitioned the king, upon a prorogation of parliament, that it might meet on the day to which it was prorogued, and had taxed the prorogation as that which occasioned a delay of justice : this was construed to be raising sedition, and possessing the people with an ill opinion of the king and his government. The other point was, that the city had imposed new taxes on their wharfs and markets, which was an invasion of the liberty of the subject, and contrary to law. It was said, that all that the crown gave was forfeitable back to the crown again, upon a malversation of the body ; and that as the common council was the body of the city, chosen by all the citizens, so they were all involved in what the common council did : and they inferred, that since they had both scandalized the king's government, and oppressed their fellow-subjects, they had thereupon forfeited their liberties : many precedents were brought of the seizing on the liberties of towns, and other corporations, and of extinguishing them.

The arguments against this were made by Treby, then the recorder of London, and Pollexfen, who argued about three hours apiece. They laid it down for a foundation, that trading corporations were immortal bodies, for the breeding a succession of trading men, and for perpetuating a fund of public chambers, for the estates of orphans, and trusts, and for all pious endowments : that crimes committed, by persons entrusted in the government of them, were personal things, which were only chargeable on those who committed them, but could not affect the whole body : the treason of a bishop, or a clerk, only forfeited his title, but did not dissolve the bishopric, or benefice : so the magistrates only were to be punished for their own crimes : an entailed estate, when a tenant for life was attainted, was not forfeited to the king, but went to the next in remainder upon his death. The government of a city, which was a temporary administration, vested no property in the magistrates : and therefore they had nothing to forfeit, but what belonged to themselves : there were also express acts of parliament made in favour of the city, that it should not be punished for the misdemeanors of those who bore office in it : they answered the great objection, that was brought from the forfeitures of some abbeyes, on the attainder of their abbots in king Henry the Eighth's time, that there were peculiar laws made at that time, upon which those forfeitures were grounded, which had been repealed since that time : all those forfeitures were confirmed in parliament, and that purged all defects : the common council was a selected body, chosen for particular ends ; and if they went beyond these, they were liable to be punished for it : if the petition they offered the king was seditious, the king might proceed against every man that was concerned in it : and those upon whom those taxes had been levied, might bring their actions against those who had levied them. But it seemed very strange, that when none of the petitioners were proceeded against for any thing contained in that petition, and when no actions were brought on the account of those taxes, that the whole body should suffer in common for that, which none of those who were immediately concerned in it, had been so much as brought in question for, in any court of law : if the common council petitioned more earnestly than was fitting for the sitting of the parliament, that ought to be ascribed to their zeal for the king's safety, and for the established religion : and it ought not to be strained to any other sense, than to that which they profess, in the body of their petition, much less to be carried so far as to dissolve the whole body on that account : and as for the tolls and taxes, these were things practised in all the corporations of England, and seemed to be exactly according to law : the city, since the fire, had, at a vast charge, made their wharfs and markets much more noble and convenient than they were before ; and therefore they might well deny the benefit of them to those, who would not pay a new rate, that they set on them for the payment of the debt contracted in building them : this was not the imposing a tax, but the raising a rent out of a piece of ground, which the city might as well do, as a man who rebuilds his house may raise the rent of it : all the precedents that were brought were examined and answered : some corporations were deserted, and so upon the matter dissolved themselves : judgments in such cases did not tally with this in hand. The seizing on the liberties of a corporation did not dissolve the body ; for when a bishop dies the king seizes the temporalities ; but the corporation still subsists ; and they are restored to the next incumbent. There were indeed some very strange precedents made in Richard the Second's time ; but they were followed by as strange a reverse : the judges were hanged for the judgments they gave: they also insisted on the effects that would follow on the forfeiting the charter: the custom of London was thereby broken: all the public endowments, and charities lodged with the city, must revert to the heirs of the donors. This is the substance of the argument, as I had it from Pollexfen. As for the more intricate points of law, I meddle not with them, but leave them to the learned men of that profession. When the matter was brought near judgment, Saunders, who had planned the whole thing, was made chief justice. Pemberton, who was not satisfied in the point, being removed to the common pleas, upon North's advancement. Dolben, a judge of the king's bench, was found not to be clear: so he was turned out, and Withins came in his room. When sentence was to be given, Saunders was struck with an apoplexy; so he could not come into court: but he sent his judgment in writing, and died a few days after*. The sentence was given without the solemnity that was usual upon great occasions: the judges were wont formerly in delivering their opinions to make long arguments, in which they set forth the grounds of law on which they went, which were great instructions to the students and barristers; but that had been laid aside ever since Hale's time.

The judgment now given was, that a city might forfeit its charter; that the malversations of the common council were the acts of the whole city, and that the two points set forth in the pleadings were just grounds for the forfeiting of a charter. Upon which premises the proper conclusion seemed to be, that therefore the city of London had forfeited its charter: but the consequences of that were so much apprehended, that they did not think fit to venture on it; so they judged, that the king might seize the liberties of the city. The attorney-general moved, contrary to what is usual in such cases, that the judgment might not be recorded. And upon that, new endeavours were used to bring the common council to deliver up their charter: yet that could not be compassed, though it was brought much nearer in the numbers of the voices, than was imagined could ever be done.

There were other very severe proceedings at this time with relation to particular persons. Pilkinton was sheriff of London the former year; an honest but an indiscreet man, that gave himself great liberties in discourse. He being desired to go along with the mayor and aldermen, to compliment the duke upon his return from Scotland, declined going, and reflected on him as one concerned in the burning of the city. Two aldermen said they heard that, and swore it against him. Sir Patience Ward, the mayor of the former year, seeing him go into that discourse, had diverted him from it, but heard not the words which the others swore to: and he deposed, that to the best of his remembrance he said not those words. Pilkinton was cast in 100,000*l.* damages, the most excessive that had ever been given. But the matter did not stop there: Ward was indicted of perjury; it being said, that since he swore that the words were not spoken, and that the jury had given a verdict upon the evidence that they were spoken, by consequence he was guilty of perjury. It was said on the other side, that when two swear one way, and a third swears another way, a jury may believe the two better than the one: but it is not certain from thence that he is perjured: if that were law, no man would be a witness; if, because they of the other side were believed, he should be therefore convicted of perjury. A man's swearing to a negative, that such words were not * Sir Edmund Saunders had a powerful mind, which no difficulties could subdue; a buoyancy that would rise superior to all obstacles. Without known parents or relatives, he was a mere beggar boy, who frequented Clement's Inn, and "courted the attorney's clerks for scraps." They noticed his good-humoured gaiety, and one of them attending to his desire to learn to write, soon made him master of that acquirement. He had now the instrument of success in his power; he borrowed books, and devoted all his leisure to their perusal. An attorney fixed a desk for him at the top of a staircase, and employed him as a copier. By degrees he rose from being an attorney, to be as able a barrister. His practice was equal to the best in the King's Bench; "his art and cunning were equal to his knowledge; and he carried many a cause by laying snares." His person was so uncouth that it is described as "a mere lump of morbid flesh;" morbid, because his intemperance produced a state of body that could only be kept free from fatal attacks by means of continued discharges. He smelt so offensively that persons were obliged to protect their noses when near him. He often observed that "none could say he wanted issue, for he had no less than nine in his back." He was much employed by the court party, indeed he was the government devil, that is the counsellor who settles its pleadings. His promotion and death are mentioned in the text. His "Reports" are among the best authorities the lawyer can consult.—(North's Life of L. K. Guildford.) Sir William Dolben was made recorder of London when sir John Howel retired. He was raised to a judgeship of the King's Bench in 1678, but removed, as stated by Burnet, because he would not decide as the king wished. At the revolution in 1688 he was restored. He died in 1693.—Wood's Athenæ; Woolrych's Jeffreys, &c.

spoken, did only amount to this, that he did not hear them : and it would be hard to prove, that he who swore so, had heard them. But Ward proved, by him that took the trial in short hand, as he had done some others with great approbation, that he had said, " To the best of his remembrance these words were not spoken by Pilkinton : " upon which Jeffreys had said, that his invention was better than his memory : and the attorney-general in summing up the evidence to the jury had said, they ought to have no regard to Ward's evidence, since he had only deposed upon his memory. Yet that jury returned Ward guilty of perjury : and it was intended, if he had not gone out of the way, to have set him in the pillory. The truth is, juries became at that time the shame of the nation, as well as a reproach to religion : for they were packed, and prepared to bring in verdicts as they were directed, and not as matters appeared on the evidence.

Thus affairs were going on, all the year eighty-two, and to the beginning of eighty-three. The earl of Shaftesbury had been for making use of the heat the city was in, during the contest about the sheriffs ; and thought they might have created a great disturbance, and made themselves masters of the Tower : and he believed, the first appearance of the least disorder would have prevailed on the king to yield every thing. The duke of Monmouth, who understood what a rabble was and what troops were, looked on this as a mad exposing of themselves and of their friends. The lords Essex and Russel were of the same mind. So lord Shaftesbury, seeing they could not be engaged into action, flew out against them. He said, the duke of Monmouth was sent into the party by the king for this end, to keep all things quiet till the court had gained its point : he said, lord Essex had also made his bargain, and was to go to Ireland ; and that among them lord Russel was deceived. With this he endeavoured to blast them in the city : they studied to prevent the ill effects, that those jealousies which he was infusing into the citizens, might have among them. So the duke of Monmouth gave an appointment to lord Shaftesbury, or some of his friends, to meet him, and some others that he should bring along with him, at Shepherd's, a wine merchant in whom they had an entire confidence. The night before this appointment lord Russel came to town, on the account of his uncle's illness. The duke of Monmouth went to him, and told him of the appointment, and desired he would go thither with him : he consented, the rather because he intended to taste some of that merchant's wine. At night they went with lord Grey and sir Thomas Armstrong. When they came, they found none there but Rumsey and Ferguson, two of lord Shaftesbury's tools that he employed : upon which, they seeing no better company, resolved immediately to go back : but lord Russel called for a taste of the wines ; and while they were bringing it up, Rumsey and Armstrong fell into a discourse of surprising the guards. Rumsey fancied it might have been easily done : Armstrong, that had commanded them, shewed him his mistakes. This was no consultation about what was to be done, but only about what might have been done. Lord Russel spoke nothing upon the subject ; but as soon as he had tasted his wines they went away. It may seem, that this is too light a passage to be told so copiously ; but much depends on it. Lord Shaftesbury had one meeting with the earls of Essex and Salisbury before he went out of England. Fear, anger, and disappointment, had wrought so much on him, that lord Essex told me he was much broken in his thoughts : his notions were wild and impracticable ; and he was glad that he was gone out of England : but said, that he had done them already a great deal of mischief, and would have done more if he had stayed. As soon as he was gone, the lords and all the chief men of the party saw their danger from forward sheriffs, willing juries, mercenary judges, and bold witnesses : so they resolved to go home, and be silent, to speak and to meddle as little as might be in public business, and to let the present ill temper the nation was fallen into wear out : for they did not doubt but the court, especially as it was now managed by the duke, would soon bring the nation again into its wits by their ill conduct and proceedings. All that was to be done was, to keep up as much as they could a good spirit with relation to elections of parliament, if one should be called.

The duke of Monmouth resolved to be advised chiefly by lord Essex. He would not be alone in that, but named lord Russel, against whom no objection could lie : and next to him he named Algernon Sidney, brother to the earl of Leicester, a man of most extraordinary courage, a steady man, even to obstinacy ; sincere, but of a rough and boisterous temper that could not bear contradiction. He seemed to be a Christian, but in a particular form of his own : he thought, it was to be like a divine philosophy in the mind : but he was against all public worship, and every thing that looked like a church. He was stiff to all republican principles ; and such an enemy to every thing that looked like monarchy, that he set himself in a high opposition against Cromwell when he was made protector. He had studied the history of government in all its branches beyond any man I ever knew. He was ambassador in Denmark at the time of the restoration, but did not come back till the year seventy-eight, when the parliament was pressing the king into a war. The court of France obtained leave for him to return. He did all he could to divert people from that war, so that some took him for a pensioner of France ; but to those to whom he durst speak freely, he said, he knew it was all a juggle ; that our court was in an entire confidence with France, and had no other design in this shew of a war but to raise an army, and keep it beyond sea till it was trained and modelled. Sidney had a particular way of insinuating himself into people that would hearken to his notions, and not contradict him *. He tried me, but I was not so submissive a hearer ; so we lived afterwards at a great distance. He wrought himself into lord Essex's confidence to such a degree, that he became the master of his spirit. He had a great kindness for lord Howard, as was formerly told ; for that lord hated both the king and monarchy as much as he himself did. He prevailed on lord Essex to take lord Howard into their secrets, though lord Essex had expressed such an ill opinion of him a little before to me, as to say he wondered how any man would trust himself alone with him. Lord Russel, though his cousin german, had the same ill opinion of him : yet Sidney overcame both their aversions. Lord Howard had made the duke of Monmouth enter into confidence with Sidney, who used to speak very slightly of him, and to say, it was all one to him whether James duke of York, or James duke of Monmouth was to succeed. Yet lord Howard perhaps put a notion into him, which he offered often to me, that a prince who knew there was a flaw in his title would always govern well, and consider himself as at the mercy of the right heir, if he was not in all things in the interests and hearts of his people, which was often neglected by princes that relied on an undoubted title. Lord Howard, by a trick put both on the duke of Monmouth and Sidney, brought them to be acquainted. He told Sidney that the duke of Monmouth was resolved to come some day alone and dine with him : and he made the duke of Monmouth believe that Sidney desired this, that so he might not seem to come and court the duke of Monmouth : and said that some regard was to be had to his temper and age. Hampden was also taken into their secret ; he was the grandson of him that had pleaded the cause of England, in the point of the ship-money, with king Charles the First. His father was a very eminent man, and had been zealous in the exclusion : he was a young man of great parts ; one of the most learned gentlemen I have ever known ; for he was a critic both in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew : he was a man of great heat and vivacity, but too unequal in his temper : he had once great principles of religion : but he was much corrupted by P. Simon's conversation at Paris.

With these men the duke of Monmouth met often. His interest in Scotland, both by * Algernon Sidney is an instance, among many others of this period, of a man being raised to celebrity by his sufferings : and immortalized by the firmness with which he endured them. All authorities represent him as unamiable. According to sir William Temple's opinion, Sidney must have had an extraordinary opinion of his own character. There is this passage in his work upon government, " If there be any such thing as divine right, it must be where one man is better qualified to govern another than he is to govern himself : such a person seems by God and Nature designed to govern the other for his benefit and happiness." Sir W. Temple told the earl of Dartmouth, that he knew Sidney well, and was sure that he looked upon himself as the man qualified to govern others.—Oxford ed. of this work. The leading feature of his political life is the implacable hatred he entertained towards a monarchy. He served as a colonel in the parliamentary army, and was nominated one of Charles the First's judges, but did not sign the death warrant. He justly thought that " Protector was only king written large," therefore as strenuously opposed Oliver and Richard Cromwell as he had their predecessor. In 1659 he was one of the commissioners delegated to mediate between Denmark and Sweden. He remained an exile until 1677, and then returned upon a conditional pardon. The text has told how closely knit he was to the friends of public liberty. His " Discourses upon Government " are well written. He was born about 1620, consequently was fifty-three when he suffered.—Biog. Britannica. When he was at the court of Denmark, he wrote this sentence in its book of mottoes ; it was doubtless a true utterance of his heart—

Manus hæc inimica tyrannia,

—Molesworth's Account of Denmark.

the dependence that his wife's great estate brought him, but chiefly by the knowledge he had of their affairs while he was among them, and by the confidence he knew they had all in him, made him turn his thoughts much towards that kingdom, as the properest scene of action. He had met often with lord Argyle while he was in London, and had many conferences with him of the state of that kingdom, and of what might be done there: and he thought the business of Carolina was a very proper blind to bring up some of the Scotch gentlemen, under the appearance of treating about that. They upon this agreed to send one Aaron Smith to Scotland, to desire that some men of absolute confidence might be sent up for that end. So when the proclamation, that was formerly mentioned, was published, it spread such an universal apprehension through all the suspected counties, that they looked on themselves as marked out to destruction: and it is very natural for people under such impressions, to set themselves to look out for remedies as soon as they can.

In the beginning of April some of them came up. The person that was most entirely trusted, and to whom the journey proved fatal, was Baillie, of whose unjust treatment upon Carstairs's information an account was formerly given. He was my cousin german; so I knew him well. He was in the presbyterian principles, but was a man of great piety and virtue, learned in the law, in mathematics, and in languages: I went to him as soon as I heard he was come, in great simplicity of heart, thinking of nothing but of Carolina. I was only afraid they might go too much into the company of the English, and give true representations of the state of affairs in Scotland: this might be reported about by men that would name them; and that might bring them into trouble. But a few weeks after I found they came not to me as they were wont to do; and I heard they were often with lord Russel. I was apprehensive of this; and lord Essex being in the country, I went to him to warn him of the danger, I feared lord Russel might be brought into, by this conversation with my countrymen. He diverted me from all my apprehensions; and told me, I might depend on it, lord Russel would be in nothing without acquainting him: and he seemed to agree entirely with me, that a rising, in the state in which things were then, would be fatal. I always said, that when the root of the constitution was struck at to be overturned, then I thought subjects might defend themselves: but I thought jealousies and fears, and particular acts of injustice, could not warrant this. He did agree with me in this: he thought, the obligation between prince and subject was so equally mutual, that upon a breach on the one side the other was free: but though he thought the late injustice in London, and the end that was driven at by it, did set them at liberty to look to themselves, yet he confessed things were not ripe enough yet, and that an ill laid, and an ill managed rising would be our ruin. I was then newly come from writing my history of the reformation; and did so evidently see, that the struggle for lady Jane Grey, and Wyatt's rising, was that which threw the nation so quickly into popery after king Edward's days, (for such as had rendered themselves obnoxious in those matters saw no other way to secure themselves, and found their turning was a sure one,) that I was now very apprehensive of this; besides that I thought it was yet unlawful. What passed between the Scots and the English lords I know not; only that lord Argyle, who was then in Holland, asked at first 20,000*l.* for buying a stock of arms and ammunition, which he afterwards brought down to 8,000*l.*, and a thousand horse to be sent into Scotland: upon which he undertook the conduct of that matter. I know no further than general hints of their matters: for though Hampden offered frequently to give me a particular account of it all, knowing that I was writing the history of that time, yet I told him, that till by an indemnity that whole matter was buried, I would know none of those secrets, which I might be obliged to reveal, or to lie and deny my knowledge of them: so to avoid that I put it off at that time. And when I returned to England at the revolution, we appointed often to meet, in order to a full relation of it all. But by several accidents it went off, as a thing is apt to do which one can recover at any time. And so his unhappy end came on before I had it from him. I know this, that no money was raised: but the thing had got some vent; for my own brother, a zealous presbyterian, who was come from Scotland, it not being safe for him to live any longer in that kingdom, knowing that he had conversed with many that had been in the rebellion, told me, there was certainly somewhat in agitation among them, about which some of their teachers had let out somewhat very freely to himself: how far that matter went, and how the scheme was laid, I cannot tell; and so must leave it in the dark. Their contract for the project of Carolina seemed to go on apace: they had sent some thither the former year, who were now come back, and brought them a particular account of every thing: they likewise, to cover their negotiations with lord Argyle, sent some over to him; but with the blind of instructions for buying ships in Holland, and other things necessary for their transportation.

While this matter was thus in a close management among them, there was another company of lord Shaftesbury's creatures, that met in the Temple in the chambers of one West, a witty and active man, full of talk, and believed to be a determined atheist. Rumsey and Ferguson came constantly thither. The former of these was an officer in Cromwell's army, who went into Portugal with the forces that served there under Schomberg. He did a brave action in that service: and Schomberg wrote a particular letter to the king setting it out: upon which he got a place; and he had applied himself to lord Shaftesbury as his patron. He was much trusted by him, and sent often about on messages. Once or twice he came to lord Russel, but it was upon indifferent things. Lord Russel said to me, that at that very time he felt such a secret aversion to him, that he was in no danger of trusting him much. He was one of the bold talkers, and kept chiefly among lord Shaftesbury's creatures. He was upon all the secret of his going beyond sea, which seemed to shew that he was not then a spy of the court's, which some suspected he was all along. Ferguson was a hot and a bold man, whose spirit was naturally turned to plotting: he was always unquiet, and setting people on to some mischief: I knew a private thing of him, by which it appeared he was a profligate knave, and could cheat those that trusted him entirely: so though he, being a Scotchman, took all the ways he could to be admitted into some acquaintance with me, I would never see him, or speak with him: and I did not know his face till the revolution: he was cast out by the presbyterians, and then went among the independents, where his boldness raised him to some figure, though he was at bottom a very empty man: he had the management of a secret press, and of a purse that maintained it: and he gave about most of the pamphlets written of that side; and with some he passed for the author of them: and such was his vanity, because this made him more considerable, that he was not ill pleased to have that believed; though it only exposed him so much the more*. With these, Goodenough, who had been under-sheriff of London in Bethel's year, and one Halloway, of Bristol, met often, and had a great deal of rambling discourse, to shew how easy a thing it was on the sudden to raise four thousand men in the city. Goodenough, by reason of his office, knew the city well, and pretended he knew many men of so much credit in every corner of it, and on whom they might depend, as could raise that number, which he reckoned would quickly grow much stronger: and it is probable, this was the scheme with which lord Shaftesbury was so possessed, that he thought it might be depended on. They had many discourses of the heads of a declaration proper for such a rising, and disputed of these with much subtilty as they thought: and they intended to send Halloway to Bristol, to try what could be done there at the same time. But all this was only talk, and went no further than to a few of their own confidants. Rumsey, Ferguson, and West were often talking of the danger of executing this, and that the shorter and surer way was to kill the two brothers†. One Rumbold, who had served in Cromwell's army, came twice among them; and while they were in that wicked discourse, which they expressed by the term lopping. He upon that told them, he had a farm near Hodsden, in the way to Newmarket; and there was a moat cast round his house, through which the king sometimes passed in his way thither. He said, once the coach went through quite alone, without any of the guards about it; and that, if he had laid any thing across the way to have stopped the coach but a minute, he could have shot them both, and have rode away through grounds, that he knew so well, that it would not have been possible to have followed him. Upon which they ran into much wicked talk about the way of executing that. But nothing was ever fixed on: all was but talk. At one time lord Howard was among them: and they talked over their several schemes of lopping. One of them was to be executed in the Play-house. Lord Howard said, he liked that best, for then they would die in their calling. This was so like his way of talk, that it was easily believed, though he always denied it. Walcot, an Irish gentleman that had been of Cromwell's army, was now in London, and got into that company: and he was made believe, that the thing was so well laid, that many both in city and country were engaged in it. He liked the project of a rising, but declared he would not meddle in their lopping. So this wicked knot of men continued their caballings, from the time that the earl of Shaftesbury went away: and these were the subjects of their discourses. The king went constantly to Newmarket for about a month, both in April and October. In April, while he was there, the fire broke out, and burned part of the town: upon which the king came back a week sooner than he intended.

While all these things were thus going on, there was one Keeling, an anabaptist in London, who was sinking in his business, and began to think that of a witness would be the better trade. Goodenough had employed him often to try their strength in the city, and to count on whom they could depend for a sudden rising: he had also talked to him of the design of killing the two brothers: so he went and discovered all he could to Leg, at that time made lord Dartmouth. Leg made no great account of it, but sent him to Jenkins. Jenkins took his depositions, but told him he could not proceed in it without more witnesses; so he went to his brother, who was a man of heat in his way, but of probity; who did not incline to ill designs, and less to discover them. Keeling carried his brother to Goodenough, and assured him he might be depended on. So Goodenough run out into a rambling discourse of what they both could and would do: and he also spoke of killing the king and the duke, which would make their work easy. When they left him, the discoverer pressed his brother to go along with him to Westminster, where he pretended business, but stopped at Whitehall. The other was uneasy, longing to get out of his company, to go to some friends for advice upon what had happened. But he drew him on: and at last, he not knowing whither he was going, he drew him into Jenkins's office; and there told the secretary he had brought another witness, who had heard the substance of the plot from Goodenough's own mouth just then. His brother was deeply struck with this cheat and surprise, but could not avoid the making oath to Jenkins of all he had heard. The secretary, whose phlegmatic head was not turned for such a work, let them both go, and sent out no warrants till he had communicated the matter to the rest of the ministry, the king being then at Windsor. So Keeling, who had been thus drawn into the snare by his brother, sent advertisements to Goodenough, and all the other persons whom he had named, to go out of the way.

Rumsey and West were at this time perpetually together; and apprehending that they had trusted themselves to too many persons, who might discover them, they laid a story, in which they resolved to agree so well together, that they should not contradict one another. They framed their story thus: that they had laid the design of their rising to be executed on the seventeenth of November, the day of queen Elizabeth's coming to the crown, on which the citizens used to run together, and carry about popes in procession, and burn them: so that day seemed proper to cover their running together, till they met in a body. Others, they said, thought it best to do nothing on that day, the rout being usually at night, but to lay their rising for the next Sunday at the hour of people's being at church. This was laid to shew how near the matter was to the being executed. But the part of their story that was the best laid, (for this looked ridiculous, since they could not name any one person of any condition that was to head this rising,) was, that they pretended that Rumbold had offered them his house in the Heath for executing the design. It was called Rye; and from thence it was called the Rye Plot. He asked forty men, well armed and mounted, whom Rumsey and Walcot were to command in two parties: the one was to engage the guards, if they should be near the coach; and the other was to stop the coach, and to murder the king and the duke. Rumsey took the wicked part on himself, saying, that Walcot had made a scruple of killing the king, but none of engaging the guards: so Rumsey was to do the execution. And they said, they were divided in their minds what to do next: some were for defending the moat till night, and then to have gone off: others were for riding through grounds in a shorter way towards the Thames. Of these forty they could name but eight. But it was pretended that Walcot Goodenough, and Rumbold had undertaken to find both the rest of the men and the horses; for, though upon such an occasion men would have taken care to have had sure and well tried horses, this also was said to be trusted to others. As for arms, West had bought some, as on a commission for a plantation: and these were said to be some of the arms with which they were to be furnished; though when they were seen they seemed very improper for such a service. I saw all West's narrative, which was put in lord Rochester's hands: and a friend of mine borrowed it of him, and lent it me. They were so wise at court, that they would not suffer it to be printed; for then it would have appeared too gross to be believed.

But the part of it all that seemed the most amazing was, that it was to have been executed on the day in which the king had intended to return from Newmarket; but the happy fire that sent him away a week sooner had quite defeated the whole plot, while it was within a week of its execution, and neither horses, men, nor arms yet provided. This seemed to be so eminent a providence, that the whole nation was struck with it: and both preachers and poets had a noble subject to enlarge on, and to shew how much the king and the duke were under the watchful care of Providence.

Within three days after Keeling's discovery the plot broke out, and became the whole discourse of the town. Many examinations were taken, and several persons were clapped up upon it. Among these Wildman was one, who had been an agitator in Cromwell's army, and had opposed his protectorship. After the restoration, he being looked on as a high republican, was kept long in prison; where he had studied law and physic so much, that he passed as a man very knowing in those matters. He had a way of creating in others a great opinion of his sagacity, and had great credit with the duke of Buckingham, and was now very active under Sidney's conduct. He was seized on, and his house was searched: in his cellars there happened to be two small field-pieces that belonged to the duke of Buckingham, and that lay in York-house when that was sold, and was to be pulled down: Wildman carried those two pieces, which were finely wrought, but of little use, into his cellars, where they were laid on ordinary wooden carriages, and no way fitted for any service: yet these were carried to Whitehall, and exposed to view, as an undeniable proof of a rebellion designed, since here was their cannon.

Several persons came to me from court, assuring me that there was full proof made of a plot. Lord Howard coming soon after them to see me, talked of the whole matter in his spiteful way with so much scorn, that I really thought he knew of nothing, and by consequence I believed there was no truth in all these discoveries. He said, the court knew they were sure of juries, and they would furnish themselves quickly with witnesses: and he spoke of the duke as of one that would be worse, not only than queen Mary, but than Nero: and with eyes and hands lifted to Heaven, he vowed to me, that he knew of no plot, and that he believed nothing of it.

Two days after, a proclamation came out for seizing on some who could not be found: and among these Rumsey and West were named. The next day West delivered himself: and Rumsey came in a day after him. These two brought out their story, which, how incredible soever it was, passed so for certain, that any man that seemed to doubt it was concluded to be in it. That of defending themselves within mud walls and a moat, looked like the invention of a lawyer, who could not lay a military contrivance with any sort of probability. Nor did it appear where the forty horse were to be lodged, and how they were to be brought together. All these were thought objections that could be made by none but those who either were of it, or wished well to it. These new witnesses had also heard of the conferences that the duke of Monmouth and the other lords had with those who were come from Scotland, but knew nothing of it themselves. Rumsey did likewise remember the discourse at Shepherd's.

When the council found the duke of Monmouth and lord Russel were named, they wrote to the king to come to London: they would not venture to go further without his presence and leave. A messenger of the council was sent the morning before the king came, to wait at lord Russel's gate, to have stopped him if he had offered to go out. This was observed; for he walked many hours there; and it was looked on as done on purpose to frighten him away ; for his back gate was not watched ; so for several hours he might have gone away if he had intended it. He heard that Rumsey had named him ; but he knew he had not trusted him, and he never reflected on the discourse at Shepherd's. He sent his wife among his friends for advice. They were of different minds ; but since he said he apprehended nothing, from any thing he had said to Rumsey, they thought his going out of the way would give the court too great an advantage, and would look like a confessing of guilt. So this agreeing with his own mind, he stayed at home till the king was come : and then a messenger was sent to carry him before the council. He received it very composedly, and went thither. Rumsey had also said, that at Shepherd's there was some discourse of Trenchard's undertaking to raise a body out of Taunton, and of his failing in it : so lord Russel was examined upon that, the king telling him, that nobody suspected him of any design against his person, but that he had good evidence of his being in designs against his government. Lord Russel protested, he had heard nothing relating to Trenchard : and said to the last, that either it was a fiction of Rumsey's, or it had passed between him and Armstrong, while he was walking about the room, or tasting the wines at Shepherd's ; for he had not heard a word of it. Upon all this he was sent a close prisoner to the Tower.

Sidney was brought next before the council, but his examination lasted not long. He said, he must make the best defence he could, if they had any proof against him ; but he would not fortify their evidence by any thing he should say : and, indeed, that was the wisest course, for the answering questions upon such examinations is a very dangerous thing : every word that is said is laid hold on, that can be turned against a man's self or his friends, and no regard is had to what he might say in favour of them ; and it had been happy for the rest, especially for Baillie, if they had all held to this maxim. There was at that time no sort of evidence against Sidney, so that his commitment was against law : Trenchard was also examined ; he denied every thing. But one point of his guilt was well known : he was the first man that had moved the exclusion in the house of commons ; so he was reckoned a lost man.

Baillie and two other gentlemen of Scotland, both Campbells, had changed their lodgings while the town was in this fermentation : and upon that they were seized on as suspected persons, and brought before the king. He himself examined them, and first questioned them about the design against his person, which they very frankly answered, and denied they knew any thing about it. Then he asked them, if they had been in any consultations with lords or others in England, in order to an insurrection in Scotland. Baillie faltered at this ; for his conscience restrained him from lying. He said, he did not know the importance of those questions, nor what use might be made of his answers : He desired to see them in writing, and then he would consider how to answer them. Both the king and the duke threatened him upon this : and he seemed to neglect that with so much of the air of a philosopher, that it provoked them out of measure against him. The other two were so lately come from Scotland, that they had seen nobody, and knew nothing. Baillie was loaded by a special direction with very heavy irons ; so that for some weeks his life was a burden to him. Cochran, another of those who had been concerned in this treaty, was complained of, as having talked very freely of the duke's government of Scotland. Upon which the Scotch secretary sent a note to him, desiring him to come to him ; for it was intended only to have given him a reprimand, and to have ordered him to go to Scotland. But he knew his own secret : so he left his lodgings, and got beyond sea. This shewed the court had not yet got full evidence ; otherwise he would have been taken up, as well as others were.

As soon as the council rose, the king went to the duchess of Monmouth's, and seemed so much concerned for the duke of Monmouth, that he wept as he spoke to her. That duke told a strange passage relating to that visit, to the lord Cutts, from whom I had it. The king told his lady, that some were to come and search her lodgings ; but he had given orders that no search should be made in her apartments : so she might conceal him safely in them. But the duke of Monmouth added, that he knew him too well to trust him : so he went out of his lodgings. And it seems he judged right ; for the place that was first searched for him, was her rooms ; but he was gone : and he gave that for the reason why he could never trust the king after that. It is not likely the king meant to proceed to extremities with him, but that he intended to have him in his own hands, and in his power *.

An order was sent to bring up the lord Grey, which met him coming up. He was brought before the council, where he behaved himself with great presence of mind. He was sent to the Tower; but the gates were shut: so he stayed in the messenger's hands all night, whom he furnished so liberally with wine, that he was dead drunk. Next morning he went with him to the Tower gate, the messenger being again fast asleep. He himself called at the Tower gate, to bring the lieutenant of the Tower to receive a prisoner. But he began to think he might be in danger: he found Rumsey was one witness, and if another should come in he was gone: so he called for a pair of oars, and went away, leaving the drunken messenger fast asleep. Warrants were sent for several other persons; some went out of the way, and others were dismissed after some months' imprisonment. The king shewed some appearance of sincerity in examining the witnesses: he told them, he would not have a growing evidence; and so he charged them to tell out at once all that they knew: he led them into no accusations by asking them any questions: he only asked them if Oates was in their secret? They answered, that they all looked on him as such a rogue, that they would not trust him. The king also said, he found lord Howard was not among them, and he believed that was upon the same account. There were many more persons named, and more particulars set down in West's narrative, than the court thought fit to make use of: for they had no appearance of truth in them.

Lord Russel, from the time of his imprisonment, looked upon himself as a dead man, and turned his thoughts wholly to another world. He read much in the scriptures, particularly in the Psalms, and read "Baxter's Dying Thoughts." He was as serene and calm as if he had been in no danger at all. A committee of council came to examine him upon the design of seizing on the guards, and about his treating with the Scots. He answered them civilly; and said, that he was now preparing for his trial, where he did not doubt but he should answer every thing that could be objected to him. From him they went to Sidney, who treated them more roughly: he said, it seemed they wanted evidence, and therefore they were come to draw it from his own mouth; but they should have nothing from him. Upon this examination of lord Russel, in which his treating with the Scots was so positively charged on him, as a thing of which they were well assured, his lady desired me to see who this could be that had so charged him; but this appeared to be only an artifice to draw a confession from him. Cochran was gone; and Baillie was a close prisoner, and was very ill used: none were admitted to him. I sent to the keeper of the prison to let him want for nothing, and that I should see him paid. I also at his desire sent him books for his entertainment, for which I was threatened with a prison. I said, I was his nearest kinsman in the place, and this was only to do as I would be done by. From what I found among the Scots, I quieted the fears of lord Russel's friends.

Lord Howard was still going about, and protesting to every person he saw that there was no plot, and that he knew of none: yet he seemed to be under a consternation all the while. Lord Russel told me, he was with him when the news was brought that West had delivered himself, upon which he saw him change colour: and he asked him, if he apprehended any thing from him? He confessed, he had been as free with him as with any man. Hampden saw him afterwards under great fears: and upon that he wished him to go out of the way, if he thought there was matter against him, and if he had not a strength of mind to suffer any thing that might happen to him. The king spoke of him with such contempt, that it was not probable that he was all this while in correspondence with the court.

At last, four days before lord Russel's trial, he was taken in his own house after a long search; and was found standing up within a chimney. As soon as he was taken he fell a crying; and at his first examination he told, as he said, all that he knew. West and Rumsey had resolved only to charge some of the lower sort, but had not laid every thing so well together, but that they were found contradicting one another. So Rumsey charged West for concealing some things: upon which he was laid in irons, and was threatened with being hanged : for three days he would eat nothing, and seemed resolved to starve himself, but nature overcame his resolutions ; and then he told all he knew, and perhaps more than he knew ; for I believe it was at this time that he wrote his narrative. And in that he told a new story of lord Howard, which was not very credible, that he thought the best way of killing the king and the duke, was for the duke of Monmouth to fall into Newmarket with a body of three or four hundred horse when they were all asleep, and so to take them all : as if it had been an easy matter to get such a body together, and to carry them thither invisibly upon so desperate a service. Upon lord Howard's examination, he told a long story of lord Shaftesbury's design of raising the city : he affirmed, that the duke of Monmouth had told him, how Trenchard had undertaken to bring a body of men from Taunton, but had failed in it : he confirmed that of a rising intended in the city on the seventeenth or the nineteenth of November last ; but he knew of nobody that was to be at the head of it. So this was looked on as only talk. But that which came more home was, that he owned there was a council of six settled, of which he himself was one ; and that they had several debates among them concerning an insurrection, and where it should begin, whether in the city or in the country ; but that they resolved to be first well informed concerning the state Scotland was in ; and that Sidney had sent Aaron Smith to Scotland, to bring him a sure information from thence, and that he gave him sixty guineas for his journey : more of that matter he did not know ; for he had gone out of town to the Bath, and to his estate in the country. During his absence the lords began to apprehend their error in trusting him : and upon it lord Essex said to lord Russel, as the last told me in prison, that the putting themselves in the power of such a man would be their reproach, as well as their ruin, for trusting a man of so ill a character : so they resolved to talk no more to him : but at his next coming to town they told him, they saw it was necessary at present to give over all consultations, and to be quiet : and after that they saw him very little. Hampden was upon lord Howard's discovery seized on : he, when examined, desired not to be pressed with questions ; so he was sent to the Tower.

A party of horse was sent to bring up lord Essex, who had stayed all this while at his house in the country ; and seemed so little apprehensive of danger, that his own lady did not imagine he had any concern on his mind. He was offered to be conveyed away very safely, but he would not stir. His tenderness for lord Russel was the cause of this ; for he thought his going out of the way might incline the jury to believe the evidence the more for his absconding. He seemed resolved, as soon as he saw how that went, to take care of himself. When the party came to bring him up, he was at first in some disorder, yet he recovered himself ; but when he came before the council, he was in much confusion. He was sent to the Tower ; and there he fell under a great depression of spirit : he could not sleep at all. He had fallen before that twice under great fits of the spleen, which returned now upon him with more violence. He sent by a servant, whom he had long trusted, and who was suffered to come to him, a very melancholy message to his wife ; that what he was charged with was true : he was sorry he had ruined her and her children ; but he had sent for the earl of Clarendon, to talk freely to him, who had married his sister. She immediately sent back the servant, to beg of him that he would not think of her or her children, but only study to support his own spirits ; and desired him to say nothing to lord Clarendon, nor to any body else, till she should come to him, which she was in hope to obtain leave to do in a day or two. Lord Clarendon came to him upon his message ; but he turned the matter so well to him, as if he had been only to explain somewhat, that he had mistaken himself in, when he was before the council : but as to that for which he was clapped up, he said there was nothing in it, and it would appear how innocent he was. So lord Clarendon went away in a great measure satisfied, as he himself told me. His lady had another message from him, that he was much calmer ; especially when he found how she took his condition to heart, without seeming concerned for her own share in it. He ordered many things to be sent to him ; and among other things he called at several times for a penknife, with which he used to pare his nails very nicely : so this was thought intended for an amusement : but it was not brought from his house in the country, though sent for. And when it did not come, he called for a razor, and said, that would do as well. The king and the duke came to the Tower that morning, as was given out, to see some invention about the ordinance. As they were going into their barge, the cry came after them of what had happened to lord Essex ; for his man, thinking he staid longer than ordinary in his closet, said, he looked through the key-hole, and there saw him lying dead : upon which the door being broken open, he was found dead ; his throat cut, so that both the jugulars and the gullet were cut, a little above the aspera arteria. I shall afterwards give an account of the further inquiry into this matter, which passed then universally as done by himself. The coroner's jury found it self-murder. And when his body was brought home to his own house, and the wound was examined by his own surgeon, he said to me ; it was impossible the wound could be as it was, if given by any hand but his own : for, except he had cast his head back, and stretched up his neck all he could, the aspera arteria must have been cut. But to go on with this tragical day, in which I lost the two best friends I had in the world :

The lord Russel's trial was fixed for that day. A jury was returned that consisted of citizens of London who were not freeholders. So the first point argued in law was, whether this could be a legal jury. The statute was express : and the reason was, that none but men of certain estates might try a man upon his life. It was answered, that the practice of the city was to the contrary, upon the very reason of the law : for the richest men of the city were often no freeholders, but merchants whose wealth lay in their trade and stock. So this was overruled, and the jury was sworn. They were picked out with great care, being men of fair reputation in other respects, but so engaged in the party for the court, that they were easy to believe any thing on that side. Rumsey, Shepherd, and lord Howard were the witnesses, who deposed according to what was formerly related. Shepherd swore lord Russel was twice at his house, though he was never there but once. And when lord Russel sent him word after his sentence, that he forgave him all he had sworn against him, but that he must remember that he was never within his doors but one single time : to which all the answer Shepherd made was, that all the while he was in court during the trial, he was under such a confusion, that he scarce knew what he said. Both Rumsey and he swore, that lord Russel had expressed his consent to the seizing on the guards, though they did not swear any one word that he spoke which imported it : so that here a man was convicted of treason, for being present by accident, or for some innocent purpose, where treasonable matter was discoursed, without bearing a part in that discourse, or giving any assent by words or otherwise to what was so discoursed ; which at the most amounts to misprision, or concealment, of treason only. As lord Howard began his evidence, the news of the earl of Essex's death came to the court. Upon which lord Howard stopped, and said, he could not go on till he gave vent to his grief in some tears. He soon recovered himself, and told all his story. Lord Russel defended himself by many compurgators, who spoke very fully of his great worth, and that it was not likely he would engage in ill designs. Some others besides myself testified, how solemnly lord Howard had denied his knowledge of any plot, upon its first breaking out. Finch, the solicitor-general, said, no regard was to be had to that, for all witnesses denied at first. It was answered, if these denials had been only to a magistrate, or at an examination, it might be thought of less moment ; but such solemn denials, with asseverations, to friends, and officiously offered, shewed that such a witness was so bad a man, that no credit was due to his testimony. It was also urged that it was not sworn by any of the witnesses, that lord Russel had spoken any such words, or words to that effect : and without some such indication, it could not be known that he hearkened to the discourse, or consented to it. Lord Russel also asked, upon what statute he was tried : if upon the old statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third, or if upon the statute made declaring what shall be held treason during the king's reign ? They could not rely on the last, because of the limitation of time in it : six months, and something more, were passed since the time of these discourses ; so they relied on the old statute. Upon which he asked, where was the overt act ? For none appeared. It was also said, that by that statute the very imagining the king's death, when proved by an overt act, was treason : but it was only the levying war, and not the imagining to levy war against the king, that was treason by that statute. Cook and Hale were of this opinion, and gave their reasons for it. And it seemed, that the parliament that passed the act of treason during the present reign were of that mind ; for they enumerated consultations to raise war among those things which were declared to be treason during that reign: this shewed that they did not look on them as comprehended within the old statute. The king's counsel pretended, that consultations to seize on the guards were an overt act of a design against the king's person. But those forces that have got the designation of guards appropriated to them, are not the king's guards in law: they are not so much as allowed of by law: for even the lately dissolved long parliament, that was so careful of the king, and so kind to him, would never take notice of the king's forces, much less call them his guards. The guards were only a company of men in the king's pay; so that a design to seize on them amounted to no more, than to a design to seize on a part of the king's army. But the word guards sounded so like a security to the king's person, that the design against them was constructed a design against his life: and yet none of the witnesses spoke of any design against the king's person. Lord Howard swore positively, that they had no such design. Yet the one was constructed to be the natural consequence of the other. So that after all the declaiming against a constructive treason in the case of lord Strafford, the court was always running into it, when they had a mind to destroy any that stood in their way. Lord Russel desired, that his counsel might be heard to this point of seizing the guards; but that was denied, unless he would confess the fact: and he would not do that, because, as the witnesses had sworn it, it was false. He once intended to have related the whole fact, just as it was; but his counsel advised him against it. Some of his friends were for it, who thought that it could amount to no more than a concealment and misprision of treason. Yet the counsel distinguished between a bare knowledge, and a concealing that, and a joining designedly in council with men that did design treason; for in that case, though a man should differ in opinion from a treasonable proposition, yet his mixing in council with such men will in law make him a traitor. Lord Russel spoke but little: yet in few words he touched on all the material points of law that had been suggested to him. Finch summed up the evidence against him; but in that, and in several other trials afterwards, he shewed more of a vicious eloquence, in turning matters with some subtlety against the prisoners, than of solid or sincere reasoning. Jefferies would shew his zeal, and speak after him; but it was only an insolent declamation, such as all his were, full of fury and indecent invectives. Pemberton was the head of the court, the other bench not being yet filled. He summed up the evidence at first very fairly; but in conclusion he told the jury, that a design to seize the guards was surely a design against the king's life. But though he struck upon this, which was the main point, yet it was thought that his stating the whole matter with so little eagerness against lord Russel, was that which lost him his place; for he was turned out soon after. Lord Russel's behaviour during the trial was decent and composed: so that he seemed very little concerned in the issue of the matter. He was a man of so much candour, that he spoke little as to the fact: for since he was advised not to tell the whole truth, he could not speak against that which he knew to be true, though in some particulars it had been carried beyond the truth. But he was not allowed to make the difference: so he left that wholly to the jury, who brought in their verdict against him, upon which he received sentence.

He then composed himself to die with great seriousness. He said he was sure the day of his trial was more uneasy to him than that of his execution would be. All possible methods were used to have saved his life. Money was offered to the lady Portsmouth, and to all that had credit, and that without measure. He was pressed to send petitions and submissions to the king, and to the duke; but he left it to his friends to consider how far these might go, and how they were to be worded. All he was brought to was to offer to live beyond sea in any place that the king should name, and never to meddle any more in English affairs. But all was in vain; both king and duke were fixed in their resolutions; but with this difference, as lord Rochester afterwards told me, that the duke suffered some, among whom he was one, to argue the point with him, but the king could not bear the discourse. Some have said, that the duke moved that he might be executed in Southampton-square, before his own house, but that the king rejected that as indecent. So Lincoln's-inn-fields was the place appointed for his execution. The last week of his life he was shut up all the mornings, as he himself desired; and about noon I came to him, and stayed with him till night. All the while he expressed a very Christian temper, without sharpness or resentment, vanity or affectation. His whole behaviour looked like a triumph over death. Upon some occasions, as at table, or when his friends came to see him, he was decently cheerful. I was by him when the sheriffs came to show him the warrant for his execution. He read it with indifference; and when they were gone, he told me it was not decent to be merry with such a matter, otherwise he was near telling Rich (who, though he was now of the other side, yet had been a member of the house of commons, and had voted for the exclusion), that they should never sit together in that house any more to vote for the bill of exclusion. The day before his death he fell a bleeding at the nose; upon that he said to me pleasantly, "I shall not now let blood to divert this, that will be done to-morrow." At night it rained hard, and he said, such a rain to-morrow will spoil a great show, which was a dull thing on a rainy day. He said, the sins of his youth lay heavy upon his mind; but he hoped God had forgiven them, for he was sure he had forsaken them, and for many years he had walked before God with a sincere heart; if in his public actings he had committed errors, they were only the errors of his understanding, for he had no private ends, nor ill designs of his own in them. He was still of opinion that the king was limited by law, and that when he broke through those limits his subjects might defend themselves, and restrain him. He thought a violent death was a very desirable way of ending one's life; it was only the being exposed to be a little gazed at, and to suffer the pain of one minute, which, he was confident, was not equal to the pain of drawing a tooth. He said he felt none of those transports that some good people felt; but he had a full calm in his mind, no palpitation at heart, nor trembling at the thoughts of death. He was much concerned at the cloud that seemed to be now over his country; but he hoped his death should do more service than his life could have done.

This was the substance of the discourse between him and me. Tillotson was oft with him that last week. We thought the party had gone too quick in their consultations, and too far; and that resistance in the condition we were then in was not lawful. He said he had not leisure to enter into discourses of politics; but he thought a government limited by law was only a name, if the subjects might not maintain those limitations by force; otherwise all was at the discretion of the prince; that was contrary to all the notions he had lived in of our government. But he said there was nothing among them but the embryos of things that were never like to have any effect, and that were now quite dissolved. He thought it was necessary for him to leave a paper behind him at his death; and because he had not been accustomed to draw such papers, he desired me to give him a scheme of the heads fit to be spoken to, and of the order in which they should be laid, which I did. And he was three days employed for some time in the morning to write out his speech. He ordered four copies to be made of it, all which he signed; and gave the original with three of the copies to his lady, and kept the other to give to the sheriffs on the scaffold. He wrote it with great care; and the passages that were tender he wrote in papers apart, and showed them to his lady and to myself before he wrote them out fair. He was very easy when this was ended. He also wrote a letter to the king, in which he asked pardon for everything he had said, or done, contrary to his duty, protesting he was innocent as to all designs against his person or government, and that his heart was ever devoted to that which he thought was his true interest. He added, that though he thought he had met with hard measure, yet he forgave all concerned in it, from the highest to the lowest; and ended, hoping that his majesty's displeasure at him would cease with his own life, and that no part of it should fall on his wife and children. The day before his death he received the sacrament from Tillotson, with much devotion. And I preached two short sermons to him, which he heard with great affection. And we were shut up till towards the evening. Then he suffered his children that were very young, and some few of his friends, to take leave of him; in which he maintained his constancy of temper, though he was a very fond father. He also parted with his lady with a composed silence; and, as soon as she was gone, he said to me, "The bitterness of death is past;" for he loved and esteemed her beyond expression, as she well deserved it in all respects. She had the command of herself so much, that at parting she gave him no disturbance. He went into his chamber about midnight, and I stayed all night in the outward room. He went not to bed till about two in the morning, and was fast asleep till four, when, according to his order, we called him. He was quickly dressed, but would lose no time in shaving; for he said he was not concerned in his good looks that day.

He was not ill pleased with the account he heard that morning of the manner of Walcot's death, who, together with one Hone and Rowse, had suffered the day before. These were condemned upon the evidence of the witnesses. Rumsey and West swore fully against Walcot; he had also written a letter to the secretary, offering to make discoveries, in which he said the plot was laid deep and wide. Walcot denied at his death the whole business of the Rye-plot, and of his undertaking to fight the guards while others should kill the king. He said West had often spoken of it to him in the phrase of lopping; and that he always said he would not meddle in it, and that he looked on it as an infamous thing, and as that which the duke of Monmouth would certainly revenge; though West assured him that duke had engaged under his hand to consent to it. This confession of Walcot's, as it showed himself very guilty, so it made West appear so black, that the court made no more use of him. Hone, a poor tradesman in London, who it seems had some heat but scarce any sense in him, was drawn in by Keeling, and Lee, another witness, who was also brought in by Keeling to a very wild thing of killing the king but sparing the duke, upon this conceit, that we would be in less danger in being under a professed papist than under the king. Hone had promised to serve in the execution of it, but neither knew when, where, nor how, it was to be done; so, though he seemed fitter for a Bedlam than a trial, yet he was tried the day before the lord Russel, and suffered with the others the day before him. He confessed his own guilt, but said these who witnessed against him had engaged him in that design, for which they now charged him; but he knew nothing of any other persons besides himself and the two witnesses. The third was one Rowse, who had belonged to Player, the chamberlain of London; against whom Lee and Keeling swore the same things. He was more affected with a sense of the heat and fury, with which he had been actuated, than the others were; but he denied that he was ever in any design against the king's life. He said the witnesses had let fall many wicked things of that matter in discourse with him, so that he was resolved to discover them, and was only waiting till he could find out the bottom of their designs; but that now they had prevented him. He vindicated all his acquaintance from being any way concerned in the matter, or from approving such designs. These men dying as they did was such a disgrace to the witnesses, that the court saw it was not fit to make any further use of them. Great use was made of the conjunction of these two plots, one for a rising, and another for an assassination. It was said, that the one was that which gave the heart and hope to the other black conspiracy, by which they were over all England blended together as a plot within a plot, which cast a great load on the whole party.

Lord Russel seemed to have some satisfaction to find that there was no truth in the whole contrivance of the Rye-plot, so that he hoped that infamy, which now blasted their party, would soon go off. He went into his chamber six or seven times in the morning and prayed by himself, and then came out to Tillotson and me. He drank a little tea and some sherry. He wound up his watch, and said, now he had done with time and was going to eternity. He asked what he should give the executioner; I told him ten guineas. He said, with a smile, it was a pretty thing to give a fee to have his head cut off. When the sheriffs called him about ten o'clock, lord Cavendish was waiting below to take leave of him. They embraced very tenderly. Lord Russel, after he had left him, upon a sudden thought came back to him, and pressed him earnestly to apply himself more to religion; and told him what great comfort and support he felt from it now in his extremity. Lord Cavendish had very generously offered to manage his escape, and to stay in prison for him while he should go away in his clothes; but he would not hearken to the motion. The duke of Monmouth had also sent me word to let him know, that if he thought it could do him any service, he would come in, and run fortunes with him. He answered, it would be of no advantage to him to have his friends die with him. Tillotson and I went in the coach with him to the place of execution. Some of the crowd that filled the streets wept, while others insulted; he was touched with a tenderness that the one gave him, but did not seem at all provoked by the other. He was singing psalms a great part of the way, and said he hoped to sing better very soon. As he observed the great crowds of people all the way, he said to us, "I hope I shall quickly see a much better assembly." When he came to the scaffold he walked about it four or five times; then he turned to the sheriffs and delivered his paper. He protested he had always been far from any designs against the king's life or government. He prayed God would preserve both, and the protestant religion. He wished all protestants might love one another, and not make way for popery by their animosities.

The substance of the paper he gave them was, first a profession of his religion, and of his sincerity in it; that he was of the church of England; but wished all would unite together against the common enemy; that churchmen would be less severe, and dissenters less scrupulous. He owned he had a great zeal against popery, which he looked on as an idolatrous and bloody religion; but that though he was at all times ready to venture his life for his religion or his country, yet that would never have carried him to a black or wicked design. No man ever had the impudence to move to him anything with relation to the king's life; he prayed heartily for him, that in his person and government he might be happy, both in this world and in the next. He protested that in the prosecution of the popish plot he had gone on in the sincerity of his heart, and that he never knew of any practice with the witnesses. He owned he had been earnest in the matter of the exclusion, as the best way in his opinion to secure both the king's life and the protestant religion; and to that he imputed his present sufferings; but he forgave all concerned in them, and charged his friends to think of no revenges. He thought his sentence was hard; upon which he gave an account of all that had passed at Shepherd's. From the heats that appeared in choosing the sheriffs he concluded that this matter would end as it now did, and he was not much surprised to find it fall upon himself; he wished it might end in him; killing by forms of law was the worst sort of murder. He concluded with some very devout ejaculations. After he had delivered this paper he prayed by himself. Then Tillotson prayed with him. After that he prayed again by himself; and then undressed himself and laid his head on the block, without the least change of countenance, and it was cut off at two strokes*.

This was the end of that great and good man: on which I have enlarged perhaps too copiously; but the great esteem I had for him, and the share I had in this matter, will, I hope, excuse it. His speech was so soon printed, that it was selling about the streets an hour after his death; upon which the court was highly inflamed. So Tillotson and I were appointed to appear before the cabinet council. Tillotson had little to say, but only that lord Russel had showed him his speech the day before he suffered; and that he spoke to him, what he thought was incumbent on him, upon some parts of it, but he was not disposed to alter it. I was longer before them. I saw they apprehended I had penned the speech. I told the king that at his lady's desire I wrote down a very particular journal of every passage, great and small, that had happened during my attendance on him; I had just ended it, as I received my summons to attend his majesty; so, if he commanded me, I would read it to him; which upon his command I did. I saw they were all astonished at the many extraordinary things in it: the most important of them are set down in the former relation. The lord-keeper asked me if I intended to print that. I said it was only intended

* The outlines of the life and character of lord Russel have been given in a previous page, and but few remarks need be made upon his trial and execution. The struggle was now wearing a sterner and more determined aspect, that was to decide whether the king or the people were to be the chief sources of political power—every meeting of parliament had warned the former, if he resolved to persevere in aiming at despotism, it must be obtained by pursuing a bloody path. It was determined to proceed—and sheriffs were culled, juries packed, and unprincipled judges raised to the bench, to aid the butchery of the free-spirited—by disguising murder with a legal habit. It mattered little that the evidence against lord Russel was deficient of that required by the statute to convict of treason—if it had been still more imperfect it would have ended in the same tragedy—his conviction was resolved before he was brought to the bar. This he himself had foreseen—he knew that he was marked as the supporter of popular freedom, and that he was to be slaughtered as a terror to his party. This was confessed by the duke of York, when the earl of Dartmouth warned him that the taking of Russel's life would never be forgiven by a numerous and great family, who, on the other hand, would be bound to him, if the delinquent was pardoned; and that some regard was due to lord Southampton's daughter and her children. The duke replied, "All that is true; but it is as true, that if I do not take his life he will soon have mine."—(Dalrymple's Memoirs, Append. ii. 59.) If the duke had not resolved to be a tyrant, he need not have feared lord Russel.

for his lady's private use*. The lord-keeper, seeing the king silent, added, "You are not to think the king is pleased with this, because he says nothing." This was very mean. He then asked me if I had not studied to dissuade the lord Russel from putting many things in his speech. I said I had discharged my conscience to him very freely in every particular; but he was now gone, so it was impossible to know, if I should tell anything of what had passed between us, whether it was true or false; I desired therefore to be excused. The duke asked me if he had said anything to me in confession. I answered, that if he had said anything to me in confidence, that was enough to restrain me from speaking of it. Only I offered to take my oath, that the speech was penned by himself, and not by me. The duke, upon all that passed in this examination, expressed himself so highly offended at me, that it was concluded I would be ruined. Lord Halifax sent me word, that the duke looked on my reading the journal as a studied thing, to make a panegyric on lord Russel's memory. Many pamphlets were written on that occasion; and I was heavily charged in them all, as the adviser, if not the author, of the speech. But I was advised by all my friends to write no answer, but to bear the malice that was vented upon me with silence; which I resolved to do.

At this time, prince George of Denmark came into England to marry the duke's second daughter. The prince of Hanover had come over two years before to make addresses to her; but he was scarcely got hither, when he received orders from his father not to proceed in that design; for he had agreed a match for him with his brother, the duke of Zell, for his daughter, which did at that time more accommodate the family. The marriage that was now made with the brother of Denmark did not at all please the nation; for we knew that the proposition came from France. So it was apprehended, that both courts reckoned they were sure that he would change his religion; in which we have seen, since that time, that our fears were ill grounded. He has lived in all respects the happiest with his princess that was possible, except in one particular; for though there was a child born every year for many years, yet they have all died; so that the most fruitful marriage that has been known in our age has been fatally blasted as to the effect of it.

The affairs abroad were now everywhere in a great fermentation. The emperor had governed Hungary so strangely, as at once to persecute the protestants and to oppress the papists in their liberties, which disposed both to rebel; upon which the malcontents were now in arms, and had possessed themselves of several places in the upper Hungary: which being near Poland, they were managed and assisted by the French ministers in that kingdom, in which the cardinal of Fourbin was the chief instrument. But they not being able to maintain themselves against the emperor's whole force, Tekeli, who was set at their head, offered all submissions to the Turk, and begged his protection. Upon this that great war

* Those who would convert us to the opinion that woman is man's intellectual inferior, must first make us forget that a lady Croke, a countess of Derby, a lady Bankes, and lady Rachael Russel, lived as contemporaries—to say nothing of a galaxy that may be traced through every other period of our history, from Boadicea downwards. Education and the rules of society throw man more customarily forward in active life, but no one's experience, perhaps, can justify him in saying that he has oftener seen women fail in rising equal to the exertions required, than those whom they submit to as their superiors and love as their guardians. Lady Russel was one of those who never failed in the hour of extraordinary effort. She cheered her patriot husband during the confinement preceding his trial, and at that trying period she did not forsake him. When the court informed him he might have a clerk to take notes of the evidence, he must have felt strengthened, as he was enabled to reply, "My lords, my wife is here." She was there—and to her dying hour might feel consolation in reflecting that she thus aided him in his time of extremest need. It was not insensibility, it was not the love of display, that made her thus act; but that firmness of mind, that forgetfulness of self, which enables those who cherish virtuous emotions to do their duty. No—Rachael Russel was not a maudlin sentimentalist, who could only weep for those she loved, but a true woman, who exerted herself as long as she could be useful in the cause of him whom she loved the most entirely in this world. Even in that time, when the sternest heart might be forgiven for failing—when the last embrace and the last look were to be exchanged—she did not add to her husband's agony by a fruitless outpouring of grief; she parted from him silently. But when all was over, then did she give vent to the natural sorrow of her heart, and her blindness was attributed to her almost incessant weeping. Reason, however, triumphed at last, and she lived to devote herself to her three children. "Her ladyship's letters, which have been published, are a compound of resigned piety, never-ceasing grief, strong sense, and true patriotism, with strict attention to all domestic duties. She lived to the age of eighty-seven, revered almost as a saint herself, and venerated as the relict of the martyr to liberty and the constitution." She was born in 1636, the second daughter of Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. Her first husband was lord Vaughan, son of the earl of Carberry. She died on the 29th of September, 1723.—Grainger.

broke out, all set on by the practices of the king of France ; who, while he was persecuting the protestants in his own kingdom, was at the same time encouraging the rebellion of Hungary, and drawing the Turk into Christendom. I need not enlarge further on a matter so well known as the siege of Vienna ; which, if it had been as well prosecuted as it was first undertaken, the town would have been certainly taken, and with that the emperor and his family ruined. The king of France drew a great army together near the frontier of Germany, and seemed to depend upon it that the town would be taken, and that he would be called in by the princes of Germany to protect them, and upon that have been chosen emperor. He at the same time sent Humieres with an army into Flanders, upon a pretension to Alost, that would have seemed very strange in any other court but that. He had once possessed himself, during the war, of Alost ; but afterwards he drew his troops out of it. So it not being in his hands when the peace of Nimeguen was made, no mention was made of restoring it. But now it was said that, it being once in the king's hands by the right of his arms, it was still his, since he had not expressly renounced it ; therefore he now demanded it, or to have Luxembourg given him as an equivalent for it. Humieres finding no resistance in the Spanish Netherlands, destroyed and ruined the country beyond anything it had felt during the whole war. This was the state of affairs abroad at the time of these trials.

All people thought we should see a parliament presently called, from which both the king and the duke might have expected everything that they could desire ; for the body of the nation was yet so possessed with the belief of the plot, that probably all elections would have gone as the court directed, and scarcely any of the other party would have had the courage to have stood for an election any where. But the king of France began to apprehend that the king might grow so much the master at home, that he would be no longer in their management ; and they foresaw that, what success soever the king might have in a parliament with relation to his own affairs, it was not to be imagined but that a house of commons, at the same time that they showed their submission to the king, would both enable him to resist the progress of the French arms, and address to him to enter into alliances with the Spaniards and the States. So the French made use of all their instruments to divert our court from calling a parliament, and they got the king to consent to their possessing themselves of Luxembourg ; for which, I was told, they gave him 300,000*l*. But I have no certainty of that. Lord Montague told me of it, and seemed to believe it ; and lady Portsmouth valued herself on this of Luxembourg as gained by her, and called it the last service she did the court of France*.

At this time I went over into France, chiefly to be out of the way, when I was fallen on almost in every libel ; for new sets of addresses were now running about the nation, with more heat and swelled eloquence in them than the former ones : in all which the providential fire of Newmarket was set off with great pomp. And in many of them there were hard things said of lord Russel and his speech, with insinuations that looked towards me.

In France, Rouvigny, who was the lady Russel's uncle, studied to get me to be much visited and known. There my acquaintance with marshal Schomberg began ; and by him I was acquainted with marshal Bellefonds, who was a devout man, but very weak. He read the Scriptures much, and seemed to practice the virtues of the desert in the midst of that court. I knew the archbishop of Rheims, who was a rough, boisterous man ; he seemed to have good notions of the episcopal duty, in all things except that of the setting a good example to his clergy ; for he allowed himself in liberties of all kinds. The duke of Montausier was a pattern of virtue and sincerity, if not too cynical in it. He was so far from flattering the king, as all the rest did most abjectly, that he could not hold from contradicting him, as often as there was occasion for it. And for that reason chiefly the king made him the dauphin's governor : to which, he told me, he had applied himself with great care, though, he very frankly added, without success. The exterior of the king was very solemn ; the first time I happened to see him was when the news came of the raising the siege of Vienna, with which, Schomberg told me, he was much struck, for he did not look for it. While I was at court, which was only for four or five days, one of the king's coaches was sent to wait on me, and the king ordered me to be well treated by all about him, which upon that was done, with a great profusion of extraordinary respects; at which all people stood amazed. Some thought it was to encourage the side against the court, by this treatment of one then in disgrace. Others more probably thought, that the king, hearing I was a writer of history, had a mind to engage me to write on his side. I was told a pension would be offered me. But I made no steps towards it; for though I was offered an audience of the king, I excused it, since I could not have the honour to be presented to that king by the minister of England*. I saw the prince of Condé but once, though he intended to see me oftener. He had a great quickness of apprehension, and was thought the best judge in France both of wit and learning. He had read my history of the Reformation, that was then translated into French, and seemed pleased with it. So were many of the great lawyers; in particular, Harlay, then attorney-general, and now first president of the court of parliament of Paris. The contests with Rome were then very high; for the assembly of the clergy had passed some articles very derogatory to the papal authority. So many fancied that matter might go to a rupture; and Harlay said very publicly that, if that should happen, I had laid before them a good plan to copy from.

* Barillon writing, December 1st, 1681, to Louis the Fourteenth, from whom he was ambassador to England, says, "After much bargaining, the king (Charles) has agreed to allow our seizure of Luxembourg, in consideration of our paying him a million livres," (not 30,000*l*.)

—(Dalrymple's Memoirs, Append. 31.) According to this authority Barillon made the bargain with Charles in person. Barillon represents Montague in the blackest light as a traitor to his country.

Bellefonds had so good an opinion of me, that he thought instances of devotion might have some effect on me; so he made the duchess La Valiere think that she might be an instrument in converting me; and he brought a message from her, desiring me to come to the grate to her. I was twice there; and she told me the steps of her conversion, and of her coming into that strict order of the Carmelites, with great humility, and much devotion. Treville, one of the duchess of Orleans's admirers, was so struck with her death, that he had lived in retreat from that time, and was but newly come to appear again. He had great knowledge, with a true sense of religion; he seemed to groan under many of the corruptions of their church. He, and some others whom I knew of the Sorbon, chiefly Faur, Pique, and Brayer, seemed to think that almost everything among them was out of order, and wished for a regular reformation; but their notion of the unity of the church kept them still in a communion that they seemed uneasy in. And they said very freely, they wondered how any one, that was once out of their communion, should desire to come back into it. They were generally learned only in one point; Faur was the best read in ecclesiastical history of any man I saw among them; and I never knew any of that church that understood the Scriptures so well as Pique. They declared themselves for abolishing the papal authority, and for reducing the pope to the old primacy again. They spoke to me of the bishops of France, as men that were both vicious and ignorant; they seemed now to be against the pope; but it was only because he was in the interests of the house of Austria; for they would declare him infallible the next day after he should turn to the interest of France. So they expected no good, neither from the court nor from the clergy. I saw St. Amour, the author of the journal of what passed at Rome, in the condemnation of the five propositions of Jansenius. He seemed to be a sincere and worthy man, who had more judgment than either quickness or learning. He told me, his whole life had been one campaign against the Jesuits; and spoke of them as the great plague of the church. He lamented also that sharpness of style with which his friend Arnauld treated the protestants; for which, he said, both he and all his friends blamed him. I was carried by a bishop to the Jesuits at St. Anthony's. There I saw P. Bourdaloue, esteemed one of the greatest preachers of the age, and one of the honours of his order. He was a man of a sweet temper, not at all violent against protestants; on the contrary, he believed good men among them might be saved, which was a pitch of charity that I had never observed in any of the learned of that communion. I was also once with P. de la Chaise, the king's confessor, who was a dry man. He told me how great a man they would make me, if I would come over to them.

* The reason for his being well received by the French monarch, whilst Mr. Montague was treated but coolly, was considered, by the earl of Dartmouth, to arise from our author having flattered Louis in his work, "The History of the Rights of Princes;" but lord Preston, our then ambassador at Paris, thought it proceeded from a belief that the doctor was influential with the discontented party in England; and Mr. Montague had required money, which was then not very abundant in the French coffers.—Dalrymple's Memoirs, Appendix, 80; Oxford ed. of this work.

This was my acquaintance on the popish side. I say little of the protestants. They came all to me; so I was well known among them. The method that carried over the men of the finest parts among them to popery was this: they brought themselves to doubt of the whole Christian religion; when that was once done, it seemed a more indifferent thing of what side, or form, they continued to be outwardly. The base practices of buying many over with pensions, and of driving others over with perpetual ill usage, and acts of the highest injustice and violence, and the vile artifices in bringing on and carrying so many processes against most of their churches, as not comprehended within the edict of Nantes, were a reproach both to the greatness of their king and to the justice of their courts. Many new edicts were coming out every day against them, which contradicted the edict of Nantes in the most express words possible; and yet to all these a strange clause was added, that the king did not intend by them to recal, nor to go against any article of the edict of Nantes, which he would maintain inviolable. I knew Spanheim particularly, who was envoy from the elector of Brandenburg, who is the greatest critic of the age in all ancient learning, and is with that a very able man in all affairs, and a frank, cheerful man: qualities that do not always meet in very learned men. After a few months' stay I returned, and found both the king and duke were highly offended at the reception I had met with in France. They did not know what to make of it, and fancied there was something hid under it.

The addresses had now gone round England. The grand juries made after that high presentments against all that were esteemed whigs and nonconformists. Great pains were taken to find out more witnesses. Pardons and rewards were offered very freely. But none came in; which made it evident, that nothing was so well laid, or brought so near execution, as the witnesses had deposed; otherwise people would have been crowding in for pardons. All people were apprehensive of very black designs, when they saw Jeffreys made lord chief justice, who was scandalously vicious, and was drunk every day; besides a drunkenness of fury in his temper, that looked like enthusiasm. He did not consider the decencies of his post; nor did he so much as affect to seem impartial, as became a judge, but ran out upon all occasions into declamations, that did not become the bar, much less the bench. He was not learned in his profession; and his eloquence, though viciously copious, yet was neither correct nor agreeable*. Pemberton was turned out of the common pleas, and Jones was put in his place; and Jeffreys had three judges joined with him in the king's bench fit to sit by him.

* George Jeffreys was a native of Acton, in Denbighshire; passing through various grades of his education at Shrewsbury, Westminster, and the Inner Temple. He was never regularly admitted to the degree of barrister; but being at Kingston whilst the assizes were proceeding, in the year 1666, the plague had so thinned the attendance of counsellors that he was persuaded to plead, and he continued to practice without interruption. He was soon after chosen recorder of London, then a Welch judge, and, in 1680, chief-justice of Chester. The following year he was made a baronet, and, in 1683, chief-justice of the king's bench, as mentioned in the text. The other passages of his life will be noticed in future pages. To animadvert upon the brutality of Jeffreys is superfluous—every historian confesses that a more cruel minister of justice never scourged a people. For proofs of his rabid fury, both as a counsel and as a judge, the pages of the State Trials may be referred to. Alluding to his conduct at the bar, Somers says, "The law intends that every man shall be exactly just in their several employments, relating to the execution of justice. The serjeant of the king's counsel, sir George Jeffreys, among the rest who prosecute in the king's name, and are consulted in the forming bills of indictment, &c. these, if they would remember it, take an oath 'as well and truly to serve the people,' whereof the accused is one, 'as the king himself; and to minister the king's matters duly and truly after the course of law, and their cunning: not to use their cunning and craft to hide the truth and destroy the accused if they can.'—The Security of Englishmen's Lives, p. 72.

Mr. Fox was wrong in remarking that Charles the Second appointed a fitting tool, when he raised Jeffreys to the chief-justiceship; for it is a matter of history, that Charles really objected to him: once saying of him, that "He had neither learning, law, nor good manners, but more impudence than ten carted whores." And the earl of Sunderland, writing to the earl of Rochester in March, 1683, says, "I spoke to the king of Jeffreys, but I found him very much unresolved, and full of objections against him, as that all the judges would be unsatisfied if he were so advanced, and that he had not law enough."—Singer's Clarendon Corr. i. 83.

Lord Delamere, who was tried and acquitted before Jeffreys, when chief-justice of Chester, on a charge of high treason, founded upon suspicion of his intending to raise a rebellion in that county in aid of Monmouth, said, "Our chief-justice, sir George Jeffreys, behaves himself more like a jack-pudding than a judge. He was mighty witty upon the prisoners at the bar; he was very full of his jokes upon people that came to give evidence, not suffering them to

The king sent a new message to the city of London, requiring the common council to deliver up their charter, threatening them, that otherwise he would order the judgment to be entered. Upon this a great debate arose among them. Some were for their compliance, that they might prevent the prejudice that would otherwise arise. On the other hand it was said, that all freemen took an oath to maintain the rights of their corporation; so that it was perjury in them to betray these. They said it was better to leave the matter to the king, than by any act of their own to deliver all up. So it was carried not to do it by a few voices. Upon that the judgment was entered; and the king seized on their liberties. Many of the aldermen and other officers were turned out, and others were put in their places. So they continued for some time a city without a charter, or a common council, and the king named the magistrates. New charters were sent to most of the corporations, in which the king reserved a power to himself, to turn out magistrates at his pleasure. This was done to make all sure for a new election of parliament, which came now under consideration.

There was a clause in the act that repealed the triennial bill, which had passed in the beginning of the troubles, whereby it was enacted that a parliament should meet every third year; but it had none of those enforcing clauses, in case it did not meet, that were in the other act; and the third year from the parliament of Oxford was now near an end. So, since the king had declared he would govern according to law, and in particular that he would have frequent parliaments, for which he had special thanks given him in many of the addresses, it was proposed that a parliament should be called. A war seemed likely to break out in Flanders, where the Spaniards, how ill soever they were prepared for it, had declared war, upon the French troops possessing themselves of Dixmuyd and Courtray. The prince of Orange was pressing the States to go into a new war, rather than let Luxemburg be taken. But this was much opposed by the town of Amsterdam. The calling a new parliament here, and England's engaging, as all believed they might do, would be an effectual restraint on the French. But the king had consented to let Luxemburg fall into their hands; so it was apprehended that the parliament might fall upon that, which was the only point that could occasion any difference between the king and them. It was also said, that it was fit all the charters should be first brought in, and all the corporations new modelled, before the parliament should be called. The prerogative lawyers pretended that the prerogative was indeed limited by negative and prohibiting words, but not by affirmative words. Lord Halifax told me he pressed this all he could; but there was a French interest working strongly against it: so the thoughts of a parliament at that time were laid aside. The Scotch prisoners were ordered to be sent down to be tried in Scotland. This was sad news to them; for the boots there are a severe torture. Baillie had reason to expect the worst usage: he was carried to Newgate in the morning that lord Russel was tried, to see if he could be persuaded to be a witness against him. Everything that could work on him was made use of, but all in vain: so they were resolved to use him severely.

I passed slightly over the suspicions that were raised upon lord Essex's death, when I mentioned that matter. This winter the business was brought to a trial. A boy and a girl did report that they heard great crying in his lodgings, and that they saw a bloody razor flung out at a window, which was taken up by a woman that came out of the house where he was lodged. These children reported this confidently that very day, when they went to their several homes: they were both about ten or twelve years old. The boy went backward and forward in his story, sometimes affirming it, and at other times denying it; but his father had an office in the custom house: so it was thought he prevailed with him to deny it in open court. But the girl stood firmly to her story. The simplicity of the children, together with the ill opinion that was generally had of the court, inclined many to declare what they had to say in their own way and method." He then proceeds to animadvert upon his drunken habits and arbitrary conduct.—Lord Delamere's Works, 142. See also Reresby's Memoirs.

The earl of Dartmouth relates, that he has heard sir J. Jekyl, master of the rolls, say, that Jeffreys had a good knowledge of the law. The earl adds, "He had likewise great parts, and made a great chancellor in the business of that court. In mere private matters, he was thought an able and upright judge, wherever he sat; but when the crown, or his party, were concerned, he was generally as Burnet represents him."—Oxford ed. of this work.

A very interesting and temperate "Life of Lord Jeffreys" was published by Mr. Woolrych, in 1827.

believe this. As soon as his lady heard of it, she ordered a strict inquiry to be made about it; and sent what she found to me, to whom she had trusted all the messages, that had passed between her lord and her, while he was in the Tower. When I perused all, I thought there was not a colour to found any prosecution on; which she would have done with all possible zeal, if she had found any appearances of truth in the matter. Lord Essex had got into an odd set of extraordinary principles; and in particular he thought a man was the master of his own life; and seemed to approve of what his wife's great grandfather, the earl of Northumberland, did, who shot himself in the Tower after he was arraigned. He had also very black fits of the spleen. But at that time one Braddon, whom I had known for some years for an honest but enthusiastical man, hearing of these stories, resolved to carry the matter as far as it would go; and he had picked up a great variety of little circumstances, all which laid together seemed to him so convincing, that he thought he was bound to prosecute the matter. I desired him to come no more near me, since he was so positive. He talked of the matter so publicly, that he was taken up for spreading false news, to alienate people's hearts from the king. He was tried upon it. Both the children owned that they had reported the matter as he had talked it; the boy saying then that it was a lie. Braddon had desired the boy to set it all under his hand, though with that he charged him to write nothing but the truth. This was called a suborning; and he was fined for it in 2000l.* But I go next to a trial of more importance.

Howard was the only evidence against the prisoners of better rank; for they had no communication with the other witnesses. So other things were to be found out as supplements to support it. Sidney was next brought to his trial. A jury was returned, consisting for most part of very mean persons. Men's pulses were tried beforehand, to see how tractable they would be. One Parry, a violent man, guilty of several murders, was not only pardoned, but was now made a justice of peace, for his officious meddling and violence. He told one of the duke's servants, thinking that such a one was certainly of their party, that he had sent in a great many names of jurors, who were sure men. That person told me this himself. Sidney excepted to their not being freeholders. But Jeffreys said that had been overruled in lord Russel's case; and therefore he overruled it; and would not so much as suffer Sidney to read the statute. This was one of his bold strains. Lord Russel was tried at the Old Bailey, where the jury consisted of Londoners; and there indeed the contrary practice had prevailed upon the reason before mentioned; for the merchants are supposed to be rich. But this trial was in Middlesex, where the contrary practice had not prevailed; for in a county a man who is no freeholder is supposed to be poor. But Jeffreys said, on another occasion, why might not they make precedents to the succeeding times, as well as those who had gone before them had made precedents for them? The witnesses of the other parts of the plot were now brought out again to make a show; for they knew nothing of Sidney: only they said, that they had heard of a council of six, and that he was one of them. Yet even in that they contradicted one another: Rumsey swearing that he had it from West, and West swearing that he had it from him: which was not observed till the trial came out. If it had been observed sooner, perhaps Jeffreys would have ordered it to be struck out; as he did all that Sidney had objected upon the point of the jury, because they were not freeholders. Howard gave his evidence, with a preface that had become a pleader better than a witness. He observed the uniformity of truth, and that all the parts of his evidence and theirs met together as two tallies. After this a book was produced, which Sidney had been * Braddon published a "Narrative," which is worth perusing; as also are the "Letters" and "Life" of the nobleman to which it relates, which are not at all rare books.

A very curious circumstance, mentioned by the editor of "Grey's Debates," seems to confirm the suspicion that the earl was murdered by his servant, instigated by the ruling powers. "Harry Guy was then secretary to the treasury, and a sure agent to the king or duke, if any dirty work was to be done. He paid and dispersed the secret-service money; of which payments he kept a regular account in a book which is still extant, and now is writing, and which was found in his closet, in answer to Filmer's book entitled Patriarcha; by which Filmer asserted the divine right of monarchy, upon the eldest son's succeeding to the authority of the father. It was a book of some name, but so poorly written, that it was somewhat strange that Sidney bestowed so much pains in answering it. In this answer he had asserted, that princes had their power from the people with restrictions and limitations; and that they were liable to the justice of the people, if they abused their power to the prejudice of the subjects, and against established laws. This by an innuendo was said to be an evidence to prove that he was in a plot against the king's life. And it was insisted on, that this ought to stand as a second witness. The earls of Clare, Anglesey, and some others with myself, deposed what lord Howard had said, denying there was any plot. Blake, a draper, deposed, that having asked him when he was to have his pardon, he answered, not till the drudgery of swearing was over. Howard had also gone to Sidney's house, and had assured his servants that there was nothing against him, and had desired them to bring his goods to his own house. Sidney showed how improbable it was that Howard, who could not raise five men, and had not five shillings to pay them, should be taken into such consultations. As for the book, it was not proved to be written by him; for it was an adjudged case in capital matters, that a similitude of hands was not a legal proof, though it was in civil matters. That whatever was in those papers, they were his own private thoughts and speculations of government, never communicated to any. It was also evident that the book had been written some years ago; so that could not be pretended to be a proof of a late plot. The book was not finished, so it could not be known how it would end. A man writing against atheism, who sets out the strength of it, if he does not finish his answer, could not be concluded an atheist because there was such a chapter in his book. Jeffreys interrupted him often very rudely, probably to put him in a passion, to which he was subject; but he maintained his temper to admiration. Finch aggravated the matter of the book, as a proof of his intentions, pretending it was an overt-act; for he said, "scribere est agere." Jeffreys delivered it as law, and said, that all the judges were of the same mind: that if there were two witnesses, the one to the treason, the other only to a circumstance, such as the buying a knife, these made the two witnesses, which the statute required in cases of treason. In conclusion Sidney was cast. And some days after he was brought to court to receive sentence. He then went over his objections to the evidence against him, in which judge Withins interrupted him, and by a strange indecency gave him the lie in open court; but he bore it patiently. He sent to lord Halifax, who was his nephew by marriage, a paper to be laid before the king, containing the main points of his defence; upon which he appealed to the king, and desired he would review the whole matter. Jeffreys upon that, in his furious way, said, either Sidney must die, or he must die. His execution was respite for three weeks, the trial being universally cried out on, as a piece of most enormous injustice. When he saw the warrant of his execution, he expressed no concern at it. And the change that was now in his temper, amazed all that went to him. He told the sheriffs that brought it, he would not expostulate upon anything on his own account; (for the world was now nothing to him;) but he desired they would consider how guilty they were of his blood, who had not returned a fair jury, but one packed, and as they were directed by the king's solicitor. He spoke this to them, not for his own sake, but for their sake. One of the sheriffs was struck with this, and wept. He told it to a person, from whom Tillotson had it, who told it to me. Sidney wrote a long vindication of himself (which I read), and summed up the substance of it in a paper that he gave the sheriffs; but, suspecting they might suppress it, he gave a copy of it to a friend. It was a fortnight before it was printed, though we had all the speeches of those who died for the popish plot printed the very next day. But when it was understood that written copies of Sidney's speech were going about, it was also printed. In it he showed his innocence; that lord Howard was an infamous person, and that no credit was due to him; yet he did not deny the matter he swore against him. As for his book, he showed what reason all princes had to abhor Filmer's maxims; for if primogeniture from Noah was the ground settled by God for monarchy, then all the princes now in the world were usurpers: none claiming by that pedigree, and this primogeniture being only in one person. He said, since God did not now by any declaration of his will, as of old by prophets, mark out such or such persons for princes, they could have no title, but what was founded on law and compact; and this was that in which the difference lay between lawful princes and usurpers. If possession was a donation from God (which Filmer had substituted to the conceit of primogeniture), then every prosperous usurper had a good right. He concluded with a prayer, that the nation might be preserved from idolatry and tyranny. And he said, he rejoiced that he suffered for the old cause, in which he was so early engaged. These last words furnished much matter to the scribblers of that time. In his imprisonment he sent for some independent preachers, and expressed to them a deep remorse for his past sins, and great confidence in the mercies of God. And indeed he met death with an unconcernedness, that became one who had set up Marcus Brutus for his pattern. He was but a very few minutes on the scaffold at Tower Hill: he spoke little, and prayed very short; and his head was cut off at one blow*.

At this time an accident happened that surprised both the court and city, and which, if well managed, might probably have produced great effects. The duke of Monmouth had lurked in England all this summer, and was then designing to go beyond sea, and to engage in the Spanish service. The king still loved him passionately. Lord Halifax, seeing matters run so much further than he apprehended, thought that nothing could stop that so effectually, as the bringing the duke of Monmouth again into favour. That duke wrote to the king several letters, penned with an extraordinary force. Lord Halifax drew them all, as he himself told me, and showed me his own draughts of them. By these the king was mollified, and resolved to restore him again to his favour. It stuck much at the confession that he was to make. The king promised that no use should be made of it; but he stood on it, that he must tell him the whole truth of the matter. Upon which he consented to satisfy the king. But he would say nothing to the duke, more than to ask his pardon in a general compliment. Lord Halifax had pressed him earnestly upon his first appearance to be silent, and for a while to bear the censures of the town. The last day of the term was very near, in which all the prisoners were to be discharged according to the Habeas Corpus act. That would show he had discovered nothing to their prejudice. So that all discourses concerning his confession, and discoveries, would vanish in a few days. And if he had followed this, probably it would have given a great turn to affairs. The king spoke nothing of the reconciliation to the duke of York, till the day before it was to be done. He was much struck with it; but the king was positive. Yet the duke's creatures in the cabinet council moved, that for form's sake he should be for some days put in the Tower. The king cut that off by saying, he had promised to pardon him. The duke of Monmouth, as was agreed, made an humble confession of his offences in general words to the king; and made a compliment to the duke, and begged that he would intercede with the king to pardon him. The king received him with a fondness that confounded all the duke's party. He used him more tenderly than he had done formerly. The duke put on an outward appearance of being very well pleased with it. The king said next day, that "James (for so he called him) had confirmed all that Howard had sworn." This was carried to the duke of Monmouth, who denied he had ever said any such thing; adding, that lord Howard was a liar and a rogue. And this was set round the town by his creatures, who run with it from coffee-house to coffee-house. The next gazette mentioned that the king had pardoned him upon his confessing the late plot. Lord Halifax pressed the duke of Monmouth to pass that over, and to impute it to the importunity of his enemies, and to the king's easiness; but he could not prevail. Yet he said little till his pardon was past: but then he openly denied that he had confessed the plot. By that he engaged himself in a plain contradiction to what the king had said. Some were brought by the duke to the king, who confirmed they had heard the duke of Monmouth say, that he had not confessed the plot. Upon which the king ordered him to give a confession of it under his hand. Lord Halifax pressed him to write a letter to the king, acknowledging he had confessed the plot. Plot was a general word, that might signify as much, or little, as a man pleased. They had certainly dangerous consultations among them which might be well called plots. He said, the service he might do his friends by such a general letter, and by his gaining the king's heart upon it, would quickly balance the seeming prejudice that such a general acknowledgment would bring them under, which could do them no hurt. Upon that he got him to write a letter to that purpose, which he carried to the king. And the king was satisfied. But the duke of Monmouth, whether of himself, or upon the suggestion of others, reflected on what he had done, and thought it a base thing. Though this was no evidence, yet he thought it might have an influence on juries, to make them believe everything that might be sworn by other witnesses, when from his confession they were possessed with a general belief of the plot. So he went full of uneasiness to the king, and desired he might have his letter again, in the terms of an agony like despair. The king gave it back, but pressed him vehemently to comply with his desire; and among other things the duke of Monmouth said, that the king used this expression, "If you do not yield in this you will ruin me." Yet he was firm. So the king forbid him the court, and spoke of him more severely than he had ever done formerly. He was upon this more valued and trusted by his own party than ever. After some days he went beyond sea; and after a short concealment he appeared publicly in Holland, and was treated by the prince of Orange with a very particular respect.

The prince had come for a few days to England after the Oxford parliament, and had much private discourse with the king at Windsor. The king assured him that he would keep things quiet, and not give way to the duke's eagerness, as long as he lived; and added, he was confident, whenever the duke should come to reign, he would be so restless and violent, that he could not hold it four years to an end. This I had from the prince's own mouth*. Another passage was told me by the earl of Portland. The king showed the prince one of his seals, and told him, that whatever he might write to him, if the letter was not sealed with that seal, he was to look on it as only drawn from him by importunity. The reason for which I mention that in this place is, because, though the king wrote some terrible letters to the prince against the countenance he gave to the duke of Monmouth, yet they were not sealed with that seal; from which the prince inferred, that the king had a mind that he should keep him about him, and use him well. And the king gave orders, that in all the entries that were made in the council books of this whole business, nothing should be left on record that could blemish him.

Hampden was now the only man of the six that was left. Yet there was nothing but Howard's evidence against him, without so much as any circumstance to support it. So since two witnesses were necessary to treason, whereas one was enough for a misdemeanor, he was indicted of a misdemeanor, though the crime was either treason or nothing. Jeffreys, upon Howard's evidence, charged the jury to bring him in guilty; otherwise, he told them, they would discredit all that had been done before. So they brought him in guilty. And the court set 40,000*l.* fine on him, the most extravagant fine that had ever been set for a misdemeanor in that court. It amounted indeed to an imprisonment for life†.

Some time in the spring, eighty-four, Halloway was taken in the West Indies, and sent over. He was under an outlawry for treason. The attorney-general offered him a trial, if he desired it. But he was prevailed on, by the hope of a pardon, to submit and confess all he knew. He said, he was drawn into some meetings, in which they consulted how to raise an insurrection; and that he and two more had undertaken to manage a design for seizing on Bristol, with the help of some that were to come to them from Taunton; but, he added, that they had never made any progress in it. He said, at their meetings in London, Rumsey and West were often talking of lopping the king and the duke; but that he had never entered into any discourse with them upon that subject; and he did not believe that there were above five persons that approved of it. These were West, Rumsey, Rumbold, and his brother; the fifth person is not named in the printed relation. Some said it was Ferguson; others said it was Goodenough. Halloway was thought by the court not to be sincere in his confession. And so, since what he had acknowledged made himself very guilty, he was executed, and died with a firm constancy. He showed great presence of mind. He observed

* A statement by sir Richard Bulstrode, who had been the British resident at Brussels for some years, says, that Charles the Second, when in familiar conversation with him, said he admired the character of the Flemish people; "but," added the king, "I am weary of travelling; I am resolved to go abroad no more; but, when I am dead and gone, I know not what my brother will do. I am much afraid that when he comes to the crown he will be obliged to travel again."—Sir Richard Bulstrode's Memoirs, 424.

the partiality that was evident in managing this plot, different from what had appeared in managing the popish plot. The same men, who were called rogues when they swore against papists, were looked on as honest men, when they turned their evidence against protestants. In all his answers to the sheriffs, who, at the place of execution, troubled him with many impertinent questions, he answered them with so much life, and yet with so much temper, that it appeared he was no ordinary man. His speech was suppressed for some days, but it broke out at last. In it he expressed a deep sense of religion. His prayer was an excellent composure. The credit of the Rye-plot received a great blow by his confession. All that discourse about an insurrection, in which the day was said to be set, appeared now to be a fiction, since Bristol had been so little taken care of, that three persons had only undertaken to dispose people to that design, but had not yet let it out to any of them. So that it was plain that, after all the story they had made of the plot, it had gone no further than that a company of seditious and inconsiderable persons were framing among themselves some treasonable schemes that were never likely to come to anything; and that Rumsey and West had pushed on the execrable design of the assassination; in which, though there were few that agreed to it, yet too many had heard it from them, who were both so foolish and so wicked as not to discover them.

But if the court lost much by the death of Halloway, whom they had brought from the West Indies, they lost much more by their proceedings against sir Thomas Armstrong, who was surprised at Leyden, by virtue of a warrant, that Chudleigh, the king's envoy, had obtained from the States, for seizing on such as should fly out of England on the account of the plot. So the scout at Leyden, for 5,000 gilders, seized on him; and delivered him to Chudleigh, who sent him over in great haste. Armstrong in that confusion forgot to claim that he was a native of the States: for he was born at Nimeguen: and that would have obliged the Dutch to have protected him, as one of their natural born subjects. He was trusted in every thing by the duke of Monmouth: and he having led a very vicious life, the court hoped that he, not being able to bear the thoughts of dying, would discover every thing. He shewed such a dejection of mind, while he was concealing himself before he escaped out of England, that Hampden, who saw him at that time, told me, he believed he would certainly do any thing that would save his life. Yet all were disappointed in him; for when he was examined before the council, he said, he knew of no plot but the popish plot: he desired he might have a fair trial for his life; that was all he asked. He was loaded with irons; though that was not ordinary for a man who had served in such posts, as to be lieutenant of the first troop of guards, and gentleman of the horse to the king. There was nothing against him, but what Rumsey and Shepherd had sworn of the discourses at Shepherd's, for which lord Russel had suffered. But by this time the credit of the witnesses was so blasted, that it seems the court was afraid that juries would not now be so easy as they had been. The thing that Rumsey had sworn against him seemed not very credible; for he swore that at the first meeting, Armstrong undertook to go and view the guards, in order to the seizing them; and that upon a view he said at a second meeting, that the thing was very feasible. But Armstrong, who had commanded the guards so long, knew every thing that related to them so well, that without such a transient view, he could of the sudden have answered every thing relating to them. The court had a mind to proceed in a summary way with him, that he should by the hurry of it be driven to saying any thing that could save him. He was now in an outlawry; but though the statute was express, that if an outlawed person came in at any time within the year, he was to have a trial, notwithstanding his outlawry: it was pretended in answer to this, that he not coming in, but being taken, had not a right to the benefit of the statute. But there were several months of the year yet to run: and since a trial was a demand founded on natural justice, he insisted on it. And when he was brought to the king's bench bar, and asked what he had to say why sentence should not be executed, he claimed the benefit of the statute. He said, he had yet, when he was taken, several months to deliberate upon his coming in: and the seizing on him before his time was out, ought not to bar him a right that the law gave him. He also mentioned Halloway, to whom a trial was offered the former term: and, since it was a point of law, he desired counsel might be heard to argue it. Jeffreys rejected all this: he said, the king might either offer a trial or not, as he saw cause; and he refused to hear counsel: which being demanded upon a point of law, the denying it was thought a very impudent piece of injustice. And when Armstrong insisted that he asked nothing but the law, Jeffreys in his brutal way said, he should have it to the full; and so ordered his execution within six days. And the law was executed on him with the utmost rigour; for he was carried to Tyburn on a sledge, and was quartered, and his quarters were set up. His carriage, during his imprisonment and at his death, was far beyond what could have been imagined. He turned himself wholly to the thoughts of God, and of another state; and was praying continually. He rejoiced that he was brought to die in such a manner. He said, it was scarcely possible for him to have been awakened into a due sense of his sins by any other method. His pride and his resentments were then so entirely conquered, that one who saw him said to me, that it was not easy to think it was the same person whom he had known formerly. He received the sacrament; and died in so good a temper, and with so much quiet in his mind, and so serene a deportment, that we have scarcely known in our time a more eminent instance of the grace and mercy of God. Armstrong in his last paper denied, that he ever knew of any design against the king's or the duke's life, or was in any plot against the government. There were no remarks published on his speech, which it was believed the court ordered; for they saw how much ground they had lost by this stretch of law, and how little they had gained by his death. One passage in it was the occasion of their ordering no such reflections to be made on it, as had been made on the other speeches. The king had published a story all about the court, and had told it to the foreign ministers, as the reason of this extreme severity against Armstrong: he said, that he was sent over by Cromwell to murder him beyond sea, and that he was warned of it, and challenged him on it; and that upon his confessing it, he had promised him never to speak of it any more, as long as he lived. So the king, counting him now dead in law, thought he was free from that promise. Armstrong took this heavily: and in one paper which I saw, written in his own hand, the resentments upon it were sharper than I thought became a dying penitent. So, when that was represented to him, he changed it: and in the paper he gave the sheriffs, he had softened it much. But yet he shewed the falsehood of that report; for he never went beyond sea but once, sent by the earl of Oxford, and some other cavaliers, with a considerable present to the king in money, which he delivered; and brought back letters of thanks from the king to those who made the present. But Cromwell having a hint of this clapped him up in prison, where he was kept almost a year: and upon the merit of that service, he was made a captain of horse soon after the restoration*. When Jeffreys came to the king at Windsor, soon after this trial, the king took a ring of good value from his finger, and gave it him for these services: the ring upon that was called his "blood stone." The king gave him one advice, which was somewhat extraordinary from a king to a judge; but it was not the less necessary to him. The king said, it was a hot summer, and he was going the circuit; he therefore desired he would not drink too much. With this I leave the affairs of England, to look towards Scotland.

Great pains were taken there to make a further discovery of the negotiation between the English and the Scots. A gentleman, who had been at Bothwell-bridge, was sent over by the Cargillites to some of their friends in Holland: and he carried with him some letters written in an odd cant. He was seized at Newcastle together with his letters; and was so frightened, that he was easily managed to pretend to discover any thing that was suggested to him: but he had never been at London, so he could speak of that negotiation but upon hearsay. His story was so ill laid together, that the court was ashamed to make any use of it: but it turned heavily on himself, for he went mad upon it. Two others came in, and charged sir Hugh Campbell, of Cesnock, an ancient gentleman of a good estate, that he had set on the rebellion of Bothwell-bridge, and had chid them for deserting it. Upon this he

* When sir Thomas Armstrong saw no reasoning was so strong, no law so explicit, but that in their despite his life was determined to be taken away, he denounced Jeffreys with the appalling words—"My blood be upon your head!" "Let it," said the hardened dictator of injustice,

"I am clamour proof." After the revolution, an effort was made to obtain 5,000*l.* for the widow and children of sir Thomas, out of the estates of his persecutors; but the bill was lost, and some years elapsed before even his attainder was reversed.—Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys.

was brought to a trial. In Scotland the law allows of an exculpation, by which the prisoner is suffered, before his trial, to prove the thing to be impossible. This was prayed by that gentleman, who had full proofs of his being elsewhere, and at a great distance from the place, at that time. But that is a favour which the court may grant, or not : so that was denied him. The first witness that was examined at his trial began with a general story : and when he came to that, in which the prisoner was concerned, Campbell charged him to look him full in the face, and to consider well what he was to say of him ; for he took God to witness, he never saw his face before, as far as he could remember. Upon that the witness was struck, and stopped ; and said, he could say nothing of him. The earl of Perth was then justice-general, and offered to lead him into his story. But the jury stopped that ; and said, that he upon his oath had declared he knew nothing of the prisoner, and that after that they could have no regard to any thing that he might say. Upon which some sharp words passed between lord Perth and them, in which he shewed how ready he was to sacrifice justice and innocent blood to his ambition. And that was yet grosser in this case, because his brother was promised that gentleman's estate, when it should be confiscated. The second witness said nothing, but seemed confounded : so Campbell was acquitted by the jury, but was still kept in prison. These witnesses were again examined before the council : and they adhered to their first deposition against the prisoner. The law in Scotland is very severe against false witnesses, and treats them as felons : but the government there would not discourage such practices ; of which, when they should be more lucky, they intended to make good use. The circuits went round the country, as was directed by the proclamation of the former year. Those who were most guilty compounded the matter, and paid liberally to a creature of the lord chancellor's, that their names might be left out of the citations. Others took the test, and that freed them from all further trouble. They said openly, that it was against their conscience ; but they saw they could not live in Scotland unless they took it. Others observed, that the severity which the presbyterians formerly had used, forcing all people to take their covenant, was now returned back on them in this test, that they were thus forced to take.

In the mean while a great breach was formed, and appeared on all occasions, between the earls of Aberdeen and Queensbury. The latter was very exact in his payments, both of the soldiers and of the pensions ; so his party became the strongest. Lord Aberdeen's method was this : he wrote up letters to the duke of all affairs, and offered expedients, which he pretended were concerted at Edinburgh ; and sent with them the draughts of such letters as he desired should be sent down from the king. But these expedients were not concerted, as he said ; they were only his own conceits. Lord Queensbury, offended with this, let the duke understand how he had been deceived. So an order was sent down, that all expedients should be concerted by a junto, consisting of lord Queensbury's creatures. Lord Aberdeen saw that by this he came to signify little : and seeing he was losing ground at court, he intended to recover himself a little with the people. So he resolved for the future to keep to the law, and not to go beyond it. And such was the fury of that time, that this was called moderation and popularity. The churches were now all well kept by the men ; but their wives not being named in the act of parliament, none of them went to church. The matter was laid before the council ; and a debate arose upon it, whether man and wife making one person in law, husbands should not be fined for their wives' offence, as well as for their own. Lord Aberdeen stood upon this, that the act did not mention the wives : it did indeed make the husbands liable to a fine, if their wives went to conventicles ; for they had it in their power to restrain them : and since the law provided in the one case, that the husband should suffer for his wife's fault, but had made no provision in the other case, as to their going to church, he thought the fining them on that account could not be legally done. Lord Queensbury was for every thing that would bring money into the treasury : so, since in those parts, the ladies had for many years withdrawn wholly from the churches, he reckoned the setting fines on their husbands to the rigour, would make all the estates of the country be at mercy ; for the selling them outright would not have answered this demand, for the offences of so many years. The earl of Perth struck in with this, and seemed to set it up for a maxim, that the presbyterians could not be governed, but with the extremity of rigour ; and that they were irreconcilable enemies to the king and the duke, and that therefore they ought to be extirpated. The ministry in Scotland being thus divided, they referred the decision of the point to the king : and lord Perth came up to have his resolution upon it. The king determined against the ladies, which was thought very indecent ; for in dubious cases the nobleness of a prince's temper should always turn him to the merciful side. This was the less expected from the king, who had all his life time expressed as great a neglect of women's consciences, as regard for their persons.

But to do him right, he was determined to it by the duke ; who since the breaking out of the plot had got the whole management of affairs, English as well as Scotch, into his hands. Scotland was so entirely in his dependance, that the king would seldom ask what the papers imported, which the duke brought to be signed by him. In England, the application and dependance was visibly on the duke. The king had scarcely company about him to entertain him, when the duke's levees and couchees were so crowded, that the anti-chambers were full. The king walked about with a small train of the necessary attendants, when the duke had a vast following : which drew a lively reflection from Waller, the celebrated wit *. He said, the house of commons had resolved that the duke should not reign after the king's death : but the king in opposition to them was resolved he should reign even during his life. The breach grew to that height between lord Aberdeen and lord Queensbury, that both were called up to give an account of it. It ended in dismissing lord Aberdeen, and making lord Perth chancellor, to which he had been long aspiring in a most indecent manner. He saw into the duke's temper, that his spirit was turned to an unrelenting severity : for this had appeared very indecently in Scotland.

When any are to be struck in the boots, it is done in the presence of the council ; and upon that occasion almost all offer to run away. The sight is so dreadful, that without an order restraining such a number to stay, the board would be forsaken. But the duke, while he had been in Scotland, was so far from withdrawing, that he looked on all the while with an unmoved indifference, and with an attention, as if he had been to look on some curious experiment. This gave a terrible idea of him to all that observed it, as of a man that had no bowels nor humanity in him. Lord Perth, observing this, resolved to let him see how well qualified he was to be an inquisitor-general. The rule about the boots in Scotland was, that upon one witness, and presumptions, both together, the question might be given ; but it was never known to be twice given, or that any other species of torture, besides the boots, might be used at pleasure. In the court of inquisition they do upon suspicion, or if a man refuses to answer upon oath, as he is required, give him the torture ; and repeat it, or vary it, as often as they think fit ; and do not give over till they have got out of their mangled prisoners, all that they have a mind to know from them.

This lord Perth resolved to make his pattern, and was a little too early in letting the world see, what a government we were to expect, under the influence of a prince of that religion. So, upon his going to Scotland, one Spence, who was a servant of lord Argyle's, and was taken up at London, only upon suspicion, and sent down to Scotland, was required to take an oath, to answer all the questions that should be put to him. This was done in direct contradiction to an express law, against obliging men to swear, that they will answer super inquirendis. Spence likewise said, that he himself might be concerned in what he might know : and it was against a very universal law, that excused all men from swearing against themselves, to force him to take such an oath. So he was struck in the boots, and continued firm in his refusal. Then a new species of torture was invented : he was kept from sleep eight or nine nights. They grew weary of managing this. So a third species was invented : little screws of steel were made use of, that screwed the thumbs with so exquisite a torment, that he sunk under this ; for lord Perth told him, they would screw every joint of his whole body, one after another, till he took the oath. Yet such was the firmness and fidelity of this poor man, that even in that extremity he capitulated, that no new questions should be put to him, but those already agreed on ; and that he should not be obliged to be a witness against any person, and that he himself should be pardoned ; so all he could tell them was, who were lord Argyle's correspondents. The chief of them was Holmes at London, to whom lord Argyle wrote in a cypher, that had a peculiar curiosity in it: a double key was necessary; the one was, to shew the way of placing the words or cypher, in an order very different from that in which they lay in the paper: the other was, the key of the cyphers themselves, which was found among Holmes's papers, when he absconded. Spence knew only the first of these: but he putting all in its true order, then by the other key they were deciphered. In these it appeared, what Argyle had demanded, and what he undertook to do upon the granting his demands: but none of his letters spoke any thing of any agreement then made*.

When the torture had this effect on Spence, they offered the same oath to Carstairs; and, upon his refusing to take it, they put his thumbs in the screws, and drew them so hard, that as they put him to extreme torture, so they could not unscrew them, till the smith that made them was brought with his tools to take them off. So he confessed all he knew, which amounted to little more than some discourses of taking off the duke; to which he said that he answered, his principles could not come up to that: yet in this he, who was a preacher among them, was highly to blame, for not revealing such black propositions; though it cannot be denied, but that it is a hard thing to discover any thing that is said in confidence: and therefore I saved myself out of those difficulties, by saying to all my friends, that I would not be involved in any such confidence; for as long as I thought our circumstances were such, that resistance was not lawful, I thought the concealing any design in order to it, was likewise unlawful: and by this means I had preserved myself. But Carstairs had at this time some secrets of great consequence from Holland, trusted to him by Fagel, of which they had no suspicion; and so they asked him no questions about them. Yet Fagel saw by that, as he himself told me, how faithful Carstairs was, since he could have saved himself from torture, and merited highly, if he had discovered them. And this was the foundation of his favour with the prince of Orange, and of the great confidence he put in him to his death†.

Upon what was thus screwed out of these two persons, the earl of Tarras, who had married the duchess of Monmouth's elder sister, and six or seven gentlemen of quality, were clapped up. The ministers of state were still most earnestly set on Baillie's destruction; though he was now in so languishing a state, occasioned chiefly by the bad usage he met with in prison, that if his death would have satisfied the malice of the court, that seemed to be very near: but they knew how acceptable a sacrifice his dying in a more violent way would prove. So they continued even in that extremity to use him barbarously. They were also trying what could be drawn from those gentlemen against him. Tarras had married his niece, who was his second wife. So they concluded that their confidence was entire. Baillie's illness increased daily; and his wife prayed for leave to attend on him; and, if they feared an escape, she was willing to be put in irons: but that was denied. Nor would they suffer his daughter, a child of twelve years old, to attend him, even when he was so low, that it was not probable he could live many weeks, his legs being much swelled. But upon these examinations a new method of proceeding against him was taken. An accusation was sent him, not in the form of an indictment, nor grounded on any law, but on a letter of the king's, in which he charged him not only for a conspiracy to raise rebellion, but for being engaged in the Rye-plot; of all which he was now required to purge himself by oath, otherwise the council would hold him guilty of it, and proceed accordingly. He was not, as they said, now in a criminal court upon his life, but before the council, who did only fine and imprison. It was to no purpose for him to say, that by no law, unless it was in a court of inquisition, a man could be required to swear against himself, the temptation to perjury being so strong, when self-preservation was in the case, that it seemed against all law and religion to lay such a snare in a man's way. But to answer all this, it was pretended he was not now on his life, and that whatsoever he confessed was not to be made use of against his life; as if the ruin of his family, which consisted of nine children, and perpetual imprisonment, were not more terrible, especially to one so near his end as he was, than death itself. But he had to do with inexorable men: so he was required to take this oath within two days. And by that time, he not being able to appear before the council, a committee of council was sent to tender him the oath, and to take his examination. He told them, he was not able to speak by reason of the low state of his health, which appeared very evidently to them: for he had almost died while they were with him. He in general protested his innocence, and his abhorrence of all designs against the king's or the duke's life: for the other interrogatories, he desired they might be left with him, and he would consider them. They persisted to require him to take his oath: but he as firmly refused it. So, upon their report, the council construed this refusal to be a confession, and fined him 6,000*l.*, and ordered him to lie still in prison till it was paid. After this it was thought that this matter was at an end, and that this was a final sentence: but he was still kept shut up, and denied all attendance or assistance. He seemed all the while so composed, and even so cheerful, that his behaviour looked like the reviving of the spirit of the noblest of the old Greeks or Romans, or rather of the primitive Christians, and first martyrs in those best days of the church. But the duke was not satisfied with all this. So the ministry applied their arts to Tarras, and the other prisoners, threatening them with all the extremities of misery, if they would not witness treasonable matter against Baillie. They also practised on their wives, and frightening them, set them on their husbands. In conclusion, they gained what had been so much laboured. Tarras, and one Murray, of Philipshaugh, did depose some discourses, that Baillie had with them before he went up to London, disposing them to a rebellion. In these they swelled up the matter beyond the truth. Yet all did not amount to a full proof. So the ministers, being afraid that a jury might not be so easy as they expected, ordered Carstairs's confession to be read in court, not as an evidence, (for that had been promised him should not be done,) but as that which would fully satisfy the jury, and dispose them to believe the witnesses. So Baillie was hurried on to a trial. And upon the evidence he was found guilty, and condemned to be executed that same day: so afraid they were lest death should be too quick for them. He was very little disturbed at all this: his languishing in so solitary a manner made death a very acceptable deliverance to him. He in his last speech shewed, that in several particulars the witnesses had wronged him: he still denied all knowledge of any design against the king's life, or the duke's; and denied any plot against the government: he thought it was lawful for subjects, being under such pressures, to try how they might be relieved from them: and their design never went further; but he would enter into no particulars. Thus a learned and a worthy gentleman, after twenty months' hard usage, was brought to such a death, in a way so full in all the steps of it of the spirit and practice of the courts of inquisition, that one is tempted to think, that the methods taken in it, were suggested by one well studied, if not practised in them. The only excuse that was ever pretended for this infamous prosecution was, that they were sure he was guilty; and that the whole secret of the negociation between the two kingdoms was trusted to him; and that, since he would not discover it, all methods might be taken to destroy him: not considering what a precedent they made on this occasion, by which, if men were once possessed of an ill opinion of a man, they were to spare neither artifice nor violence, but to hunt him down by any means. I have been perhaps too long in this particular, but the case was so singular, and my relation to the person was so near, and my value for him was so great, that I hope I need make no apology for it.

In this I saw how ambition could corrupt one of the best tempered men that I had ever known: I mean lord Perth, who for above ten years together seemed to me incapable of an immoral or cruel action, and yet was now deeply engaged in the foulest and blackest of crimes. I had not now seen him for two years; but I hoped, that still some good impressions had been left in him: and now, when he came to London to be made lord chancellor, I had a very earnest message from him, desiring by my means to see Leighton. I thought, that angelical man might have awakened in him some of those good principles, which he seemed once to have had, and which were now totally extinguished in him. I wrote so earnestly to Leighton, that he came to London. Upon his coming to me, I was amazed to see him at above seventy look so fresh and well, that age seemed as it were to stand still with him : his hair was still black, and all his motions were lively : he had the same quickness of thought, and strength of memory ; but above all, the same heat and life of devotion, that I had ever seen in him. When I took notice to him, upon my first seeing him, how well he looked, he told me, he was very near his end for all that ; and his work and journey both were now almost done. This at that time made no great impression on me. He was the next day taken with an oppression, and as it seemed with a cold and with stitches, which was indeed a pleurisy.

The next day Leighton sunk so, that both speech and sense went away of a sudden : and he continued panting about twelve hours, and then died without pangs or convulsions. I was by him all the while. Thus I lost him, who had been for so many years the chief guide of my whole life. He had lived ten years in Sussex, in great privacy, dividing his time wholly between study and retirement, and the doing of good : for in the parish where he lived, and in the parishes round about, he was always employed in preaching, and in reading prayers. He distributed all he had in charities, choosing rather to have it go through other people's hands than his own : for I was his almoner in London. He had gathered a well chosen library of curious, as well as useful books ; which he left to the diocess of Dunblane, for the use of the clergy there, that country being ill provided with books. He lamented oft to me the stupidity that he observed among the commons of England, who seemed to be much more insensible in the matters of religion, than the commons of Scotland were. He retained still a peculiar inclination to Scotland ; and if he had seen any prospect of doing good there, he would have gone and lived and died among them. In the short time that the affairs of Scotland were in the duke of Monmouth's hands, that duke had been possessed with such an opinion of him, that he moved the king to write to him, to go, and at least live in Scotland, if he would not engage in a bishopric there. But that fell with that duke's credit. He was in his last years turned to a greater severity against popery than I had imagined a man of his temper, and of his largeness in point of opinion, was capable of. He spoke of the corruptions, of the secular spirit, and of the cruelty that appeared in that church, with an extraordinary concern ; and lamented the shameful advances that we seemed to be making towards popery. He did this with a tenderness, and an edge, that I did not expect from so recluse and mortified a man. He looked on the state the church of England was in, with very melancholy reflections, and was very uneasy at an expression then much used, that it was the best constituted church in the world. He thought it was truly so, with relation to the doctrine, the worship, and the main part of our government. But as to the administration, both with relation to the ecclesiastical courts, and the pastoral care, he looked on it as one of the most corrupt he had ever seen. He thought we looked like a fair carcase of a body without a spirit ; without that zeal, that strictness of life, and that laboriousness in the clergy, that became us.

There were two remarkable circumstances in his death. He used often to say, that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn ; it looked like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all as an inn, and who was weary of the noise and confusion in it. He added, that the officious tenderness and care of friends was an entanglement to a dying man ; and that the unconcerned attendance of those that could be procured in such a place, would give less disturbance. And he obtained what he desired ; for he died at the Bell inn, in Warwick-lane. Another circumstance was, that while he was bishop in Scotland, he took what his tenants were pleased to pay him : so that there was a great arrear due, which was raised slowly by one whom he left in trust with his affairs there : and the last payment that he could expect from thence was returned up to him about six weeks before his death : so that his provision and journey failed both at once. And thus in the several parts of this history, I have given a very particular account of every thing relating to this apostolical man ; whose life I would have written, if I had not found proper places to bring the most material parts of it within this work. I reckon that I owed this to that perfect friendship and fatherly care, with which he had always treated me.

The mentioning his death leads me to name some other clergymen of note, that died in this and in the former year. Burnet died in Scotland: and Ross, a poor, ignorant, worthless man, but in whom obedience and fury were so eminent, that these supplied all other defects, was raised to be the primate of that church: which was indeed a sad omen, as well as a step to its fall and ruin. Sterne, archbishop of York, died in the eighty-sixth year of his age: he was a sour, ill tempered man, and minded chiefly the enriching his family. He was suspected of popery, because he was more than ordinarily compliant in all things to the court, and was very zealous for the duke. Dolben, bishop of Rochester, succeeded him, a man of more spirit than discretion, and an excellent preacher, but of a free conversation, which laid him open to much censure in a vicious court. And indeed he proved a much better archbishop than he had been a bishop*. Gunning, of Ely, died this summer, a man of great reading: he had in him all the subtilty, and the disputing humour of a schoolman: and he studied to infuse that into all those who were formed by him. He was strict in the whole course of his life: but was a dry man, and much inclined to superstition. He had a great confusion of things in his head, and could bring nothing into method; so that he was a dark and perplexed preacher. His sermons were full of Greek and Hebrew, and of the opinions of the fathers. Yet many of the ladies of a high form loved to hear him preach; which the king used to say, was because they did not understand him. Turner succeeded him. He had been long in the duke's family, and was in high favour with him. He was a sincere and good-natured man, of too quick an imagination, and too defective a judgment. He was but moderately learned, having conversed more with men than with books: and so he was not able to do the duke great service. But he was so zealous for his succession, that this raised him high upon no great stock of sufficiency. Old Morley, bishop of Winchester, died this winter, in the eighty-seventh year of his age. He was in many respects a very eminent man, zealous against popery, and yet a great enemy to the dissenters; he was considerably learned, and had a great vivacity of thought: but he was too soon provoked, and too little master of himself upon those occasions. Mew, bishop of Bath and Wells, succeeded him: he had been a captain during the wars, and had been Middleton's secretary, when he was sent to command the insurrection, that the Highlanders of Scotland made for the king in fifty-three. After that he came into orders; and, though he knew very little of divinity, or of any other learning, and was weak to a childish degree, yet obsequiousness and zeal raised him through several steps to this great see. Ken succeeded him in Bath and Wells; a man of an ascetic course of life, and yet of a very lively temper, but too hot and sudden. He had a * Dr. Richard Sterne was born at Mansfield, in Nottinghamshire, during the year 1596. He was of Trinity and Bennet colleges, Cambridge. He became chaplain to archbishop Laud, and master of Jesus College in 1633. Being very active in sending the plate of the university to Charles the First, to support him during the civil struggle, Cromwell seized and imprisoned him, and others, finally sending them on board ship, for the purpose, it is said, of selling them as slaves; but this is hardly credible. He kept a school until the Restoration, when he was restored to his mastership, and made bishop of Carlisle, and finally archbishop of York. He published several works; had a share in preparing the Polyglot Bible, and in revising the liturgy. A correspondent of the earl of Strafford describes him as "a solid scholar, who first summed up the 3600 faults that were in our printed bibles." He once had the reputation of being the author of the "Whole Duty of Man;" but this has now been ascribed with more certainty to Iuliy Packington.—Strafford Papers; Le Neve's Bishops; Masters's Hist. of C. C. C. Cambridge.

Dr. John Dolben was a native of Stonewick, Northamptonshire, where he was born in 1623. His education was conducted at Westminster, and Christ-church, Oxford.

During the civil contest he took arms in support of the royal cause, and was severely wounded at the battle of Marston Moor, and in the siege of York. When resistance became of no avail, he returned to college, but was ejected by the parliamentary visitors in 1648. At the Restoration he was made a canon of Christchurch; in 1666, bishop of Rochester; in 1675, lord high almoner; and in 1683, archbishop of Canterbury; but this last preferment he enjoyed only for a brief period. He was most culpably allowed to sleep at an inn in a bed not freed from the contagion of small-pox; with this disease he was infected, and died in 1686. All authorities unite in praising his eloquence, both as a preacher and debater; and Burnet is too cold in his praise, seeming as if resolved not to commend, yet without anything specific to blame. The high character given him by sir William Trumbull is in print, as is that by another of his friends, Dr. Sprat: the latter says of him, in his Life of Cowley, "in him we lost the greatest abilities, the most useful conversation, the most faithful friendship, and one who had a mind that practised the best virtues itself, and a wit that was best able to recommend them to others."—Kippis's Biog. Britannica, Ganger, &c.

very edifying way of preaching; but it was more apt to move the passions, than to instruct; so that his sermons were rather beautiful than solid; yet his way in them was very taking. The king seemed fond of him; and by him, and Turner, the papists hoped, that great progress might be made in gaining, or at least deluding the clergy. It was observed, that all the men in favour among the clergy were unmarried; from whom, they hoped, they might more probably promise themselves a disposition to come over to them *.

The prosecution of the dissenters was carried very high all this year; they were not only proceeded against for going to conventicles, but for not going to church, and for not receiving the sacrament; the laws made against papists with relation to those particulars being now applied to them. Many were excommunicated, and ruined by the prosecutions. The earl of Danby, for all his severity against lord Shaftesbury, for moving in the King's Bench to be bailed, though committed by the lords only for a contempt, yet had been forced to move often for his being let out upon bail. It was certainly a very great hardship that he lay under; for he had been now five years in the Tower: and three parliaments had sat. The two last had not mentioned him; and now a parliament seemed out of sight. Yet, though he offered a very long and learned argument for their bailing him, the judges of the King's Bench, even Saunders himself, were afraid to meddle in it. But Jeffreys was bolder; so he bailed him: and upon the same grounds all the popish lords were also bailed. Oates was prosecuted at the duke's suit for scandalous words: rogue and traitor were very freely bestowed on the duke by him: so 100,000*l.* was given, which shut him up in a perpetual imprisonment, till they saw a fit opportunity to carry matters further against him †. The * Dr. Peter Gunning was born at Hoo, in Kent, during the year 1613. His education was pursued at the Canterbury free school, and Clare Hall, Cambridge; but being persecuted there as a loyalist, he, with his friend Mr. Barrow, came to Oxford in 1644, and took his degree of M. A. At the Restoration he was instituted regius professor of divinity, and master of St. John's, Cambridge, upon the ejection of Dr. Tuckney, to whom, however, he generously allowed a life annuity. In 1669 he was enthroned bishop of Chichester; and in 1674, bishop of Ely. The doctor was handsome in his person, and graceful, which will perhaps account for the admiration he won from the court ladies, without libelling their understandings. He was deeply versed in the scriptures, so as to be hardly excelled as a textuary; and this, aided by an enlarged acquaintance with ecclesiastical history, made him one of the most powerful opponents that the papists and sectarians of his period had to encounter. One anecdote is worth repeating. An enthusiast had been disseminating widely a prophecy that the end of the world would be within the space of twelvemonths, and his followers were numerous. The man had some landed property, for which Gunning offered him a price equal to two years' purchase; this was refused, and twenty required, which convinced his followers that he did not believe his own prediction.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Masters's Hist. of C. C. C. Cambridge; Salmon's English Bishops, &c.

Dr. Francis Turner was the son of Dr. Thomas Turner, dean of Canterbury, by Margaret, daughter of Sir Francis Windebank, secretary of state to Charles the First. He was a scholar of Winchester, and New College, Oxford. He was successively chaplain to the duke of York, master of St. John's, dean of Windsor, bishop of Rochester, and bishop of Ely. He was an unflinching advocate of the protestant cause, being one of the seven bishops imprisoned by James the Second for petitioning that monarch against his declaration in favour of popery. He appears to have been equally uncompromising in his opinions relative to hereditary monarchy, for he refused to take the oaths required at the revolution, and consequently was deprived of his bishopric. Finally, in 1691, being accused of plotting to restore the Stuart dynasty, he thought it most prudent to leave England, and a proclamation was issued for his apprehension. He was satirized by Marvell in his "Mr. Skunk, or the Divine in mode." His "Vindication of the late archbishop San-croft, and the rest of the deprived Bishops," is worth notice as a piece of contemporary history. He died in 1700.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon.

Dr. Peter Mews, or Meaux, was of a more accommodating conscience than his contemporary last mentioned. He fought for Charles the First; appeared in arms for James the Second; and finally adhered to William the Third. He was born at Purse Caundell, Dorsetshire, in the year 1619; passed through the discipline of merchant tailor's, and St. John's, Oxford; lived many years in exile during the interregnum; and in the reign of Charles became successively the diocesan of Bath and Wells, and Winchester. Wood says, he was "much beloved and admired for his hospitality, generosity, justice, and frequent preaching." He died in 1706.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Grainger, and Reresby's Memoirs.

Dr. Thomas Ken was the son of a London attorney, but born at Little Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, during the year 1635. He was educated at Winchester, Hart Hall, and New College, Oxford. Having duly graduated and held various livings, he in 1679 was appointed chaplain to Mary, princess of Orange. Whilst in this office he compelled one of the prince's favourite officers to marry a lady of her highness's train, whom he had seduced by giving her a contract of marriage. The prince is said to have been greatly offended with Ken, for being so officious. But Charles the Second was not offended at his boldness, when he peremptorily refused Nell Gwyn admittance to his lodgings, when the court was at Winchester. "The king's good sense told him, though the prince of Orange's did not, that if a man is really a Christian, his conduct ought to be uniformly consistent with his character." In 1684, he became bishop of Bath and Wells; in 1688, was committed to the Tower with six other prelates for petitioning the king; and in 1690 was deprived for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance to William the Third. His writings and his life fully entitled him to the epithet he acquired of "good Bishop Ken." Wood describes him as greatly charitable, very devout, and extremely obliging in his demeanour. Queen Anne gave him a pension of 200*l.* a year.—Life prefixed to his works; Wood's Athenæ; Grainger.

† The evidence adduced at this trial shews conclusively the violent temper and infamous character of Oates.—See the State Trials.

duke of Beaufort, lord Peterborough, and some others, brought actions of scandalum magnatum against those, who in the time of our great heat had spoken foul things of them : and great damages were given by obsequious and zealous juries. An information of a higher nature was brought against Williams, who, though he was a worthless man, yet was for his zeal chosen speaker of the house of commons in the two last parliaments. He had licensed the printing the votes, which had in them matters of scandal relating to some lords. So an information was brought against him ; and he upon it demurred to the jurisdiction of the court. This was driven on purpose by the duke's party, to cut off the thoughts of another parliament ; since it was not to be supposed that any house of commons could bear the punishing the speaker for obeying their orders.

Jenkins had now done all the drudgery that the court had occasion for from him ; and being capable to serve them in nothing else, he was dismissed from being secretary of state ; and Godolphin, one of the commissioners of the treasury, succeeded him. Another commissioner of the treasury, Deering, dying at the same time, the earl of Rochester hoped to have been made lord-treasurer. He had lost much ground with the king ; and the whole court hated him, by reason of the stop of all payments, which was chiefly imputed to him. Lord Halifax and lord North joined their interest to bring in two other commissioners upon him, without so much as letting him know of it till it was resolved on. These were Thynd and North. This last was to be rewarded for his service during his shrievalry in London. Lord Rochester engaged both the duke and the lady Portsmouth to divert this, if it was possible. But the king was not to be shaken. So he resolved to quit the treasury. The earl of Radnor was discharged from being lord president of the council, where he had for some years acted a very mean part, in which he had lost the character of a steady cynical Englishman, which he had maintained in the former course of his life. And lord Rochester was made lord president ; which being a post superior in rank, but much inferior both in advantage and credit to that he held formerly, drew a jest from lord Halifax that may be worth remembering : he said, he had heard of many kicked down stairs, but never of any that was kicked up stairs before. Godolphin was weary of the drudgery that lay on a secretary of state. He chose rather to be the first commissioner of the treasury : and he was made a baron. The earl of Middleton, son to him that had governed Scotland, was made secretary of state, a man of a generous temper, but without much religion, well learned, of a good judgment, and a lively apprehension *.

If foreign affairs could have awakened the king, the French did enough this summer in order to it. Besides their possessing themselves of Luxemburg, they sent a fleet against Genoa upon no sort of provocation, but because Genoa would not comply with some demands, that were both unjust and unreasonable : the king of France ordered it to be bombarded, hoping that in that confusion he might by landing a few men have made himself easily master of that state. This would very probably have succeeded, if the attempt had been made upon the first consternation they were in, when the bombardment began. But the thing was delayed a day or two ; and by that time the Genoese not only recovered themselves out of their first fright, but putting themselves in order, they were animated with that indignation and fury, that they beat off the French, with a courage that was not expected from them. Such an assault, that looked more like the violence of a robber, than the attack of one that would observe forms in his conquests, ought to have provoked all princes, especially such as were powerful at sea, to have joined against a prince, who by these practices was become the common enemy of mankind. But we were now pursuing other designs, from which it was resolved that nothing from beyond sea should divert us.

After the king had kept Tangier about twenty years, and had been at a vast charge in making a mole before it, in which several sets of undertakers had failed indeed in the main

* All these arrangements were effected by lord Halifax, notwithstanding the united interests of the earl of Rochester, the duke of York, and the duchess of Portsmouth, who wished the offices otherwise filled. Lord Halifax, writing to sir John Reresby, thus rejoiced over Rochester's removal from the Treasury. " You may believe I am not at all displeased to see such an adversary removed from the only place that could give him power and advantage ; and he bears it with so little philosophy, that, if I had ill-nature enough, he gives me sufficient occasion to triumph."—(Reresby's Memoirs, 185.) At the accession of James the Second, lord Rochester more than retaliated these vexations upon his rival. The king it appears was in much doubt who to appoint as secretary of state in the place of lord Godolphin.—Singer's Clarendon Correspondence, i. 95.

designs, but had succeeded well in the enriching of themselves, and the work was now brought near perfection, which seemed to give us the key of the Mediterranean, he, to deliver himself from that charge, sent lord Dartmouth with a fleet to destroy all the works, and to bring home all our men. The king, when he communicated this to the cabinet council, charged them to be secret. But it was believed that he himself spoke of it to the lord Arlington, and that lord Arlington told it to the Portugal ambassador; for the ambassador took fire upon it, and desired that, if the king was weary of keeping it, he would restore it to his master. And he undertook to pay a great sum for the charge the king had been at all these years that he had it. But the king believed that as the money would never be paid, so the king of Portugal would not be able to maintain that place against the Moors; so that it would fall in their hands, and by that means prove too important to command the Straits. The thing was boldly denied by the ministers, when pressed by the ambassador upon that subject. Lord Dartmouth executed the design as he was ordered. So an end was put to our possessing that place. This was done only to save charge, that the court might hold out the longer without a parliament. So the republic of Genoa, seeing that we would not, and that, without us, the Dutch could not, undertake their protection, were forced to make a very abject compliment to the king of France; if anything could be abject that was necessary to save their country. The doge and some of the senators were sent to Versailles to ask the king pardon, though it was not easy to tell for what: unless it was, because they presumed to resist his invasion. I happened to be at Paris when the doge was there. One saying of his was much repeated. When all the glory of Versailles was set open to him, and the flatterers of the court were admiring everything, he seemed to look at them with a coldness that became a person who was at the head of a free commonwealth; and when he was asked if the things he saw were not very extraordinary, he said, the most extraordinary thing that he saw there was himself.

The affairs of Holland were much broken. The prince of Orange and the town of Amsterdam were in very ill terms by the French management, to which Chudleigh, the English envoy, joined his strength to such a degree of insolence, that he offered personal affronts to the prince, who upon that would see him no more. Yet the prince was not considered enough at our court to get Chudleigh to be recalled upon it. The town of Amsterdam went so far, that a motion was made of setting up the prince of Friezeland as their stadtholder; and he was invited to come to their town in order to it. But the prince of Orange prevented this by coming to a full agreement with that town. So he and his princess were invited thither; and that misunderstanding was removed, or at least laid asleep for that time. The war of Hungary went on with slow success on the emperor's side; he was poor, and his revenue was exhausted, so that he could not press so hard upon the Turks, as he might have done with advantage; for they were in great confusion. The king of Poland had married a French wife, and she had a great ascendancy over him; and not being able to get her family raised in France, she had turned that king to the emperor's interests; so that he had the glory of raising the siege of Vienna. The French saw their error, and were now ready to purchase her at any rate; so that all the rest of that poor king's inglorious life, after that great action at Vienna, was a perpetual going backwards and forwards between the interests of France and Vienna; which depended entirely upon the secret negotiations of the court of France with his queen, as they came to her terms, or as they did not quite comply with them.

The misunderstanding between the court of Rome and France went on still. The pope declared openly for the house of Austria against the Turk; and made great returns of money into Germany. He engaged the Venetians into the alliance. He found also fault with many of the proceedings in France, with relation to the Regale. And now the tables were turned. The Jesuits, who were wont to value themselves on their dependence on the court of Rome, were now wholly in the interest of France; for they resolved to be on the stronger side. And the Jansenists, whom Rome had treated very ill, and who were looked on as the most zealous assertors of the liberties of the Gallican church, were now the men that admired the pope, and declared for him. The persecution of the protestants went on still in France; and no other care was had of them here, but that we sheltered them, and so had great numbers of them coming over to us. A quarrel was depending between the English and the Dutch East India company. The Dutch had a mind to drive us out of Bantam; for they did not love to see the English settle so near Batavia. So they engaged the old king of Bantam into a war with his son, who was in possession of Bantam; and the son was supported by the English. But the old king drove out his son by the help that the Dutch gave him; and he drove out the English likewise, as having espoused his son's rebellion against him; though we understood that he had resigned the kingdom to his son, but that by the instigation of the Dutch he had now invaded him. It is certain, our court laid up this in their heart, as that upon which they would lay the foundation of a new war with the States, as soon as we should be in a condition to undertake it. The East India company saw this, and that the court pressed them to make public remonstrances upon it, which gave a jealousy of an ill design under it; so they resolved to proceed rather in a very slow negotiation than in anything that might give a handle to a rupture.

I must now mix in somewhat with relation to myself, though it may seem too inconsiderable to be put into a series of matters of such importance. But it is necessary to give some account of that which set me at liberty to go round some parts of Europe, and to stay some years out of England. I preached a lecture at St. Clement's on the Thursdays; but after the lord Russel's death, the king sent an order to Dr. Hascard, then rector of the parish, to discharge me from it. I continued at the Rolls, avoiding very cautiously everything that related to the public; for I abhorred the making the pulpit a stage for venting of passion, or for the serving of interests. There was a parish in London vacant, where the election lay in the inhabitants, and it was probable it would have fallen on me; though London was in so divided a state, that everything was managed by the strength of parties. Yet the king, apprehending the choice might have fallen on me, sent a message to them, to let them know he would take it amiss if they chose me. Old sir Harbottle Grimstone lived still to the great indignation of the court. When the fifth of November, being Gunpowder Treason day, came, in which we had always sermons at the chapel of the Rolls, I begged the master of the Rolls (sir H. Grimstone) to excuse me then from preaching; for that day led one to preach against popery, and it was indecent not to do it. He said he would end his life as he had led it all along, in an open detestation of popery. So, since I saw this could not be avoided, though I had not meddled with any point of popery for above a year together, I resolved, since I did it so seldom, to do it to purpose. I chose for my text these words: "Save me from the lion's mouth, thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns*." I made no reflection in my thoughts on the lion and unicorn, as being the two supporters of the king's scutcheon (for I had ever hated all points of that sort, as a profanation of Scriptures); but I showed how well popery might be compared to the lion's mouth, then open to devour us; and I compared our former deliverance from the extremities of danger to the being on the horn of a rhinoceros. And this leading me to the subject of the day, I mentioned that wish of king James the First against any of his posterity, that should endeavour to bring that religion in among us. This was immediately carried to the court. But it only raised more anger against me; for nothing could be made of it. They talked most of the choice of the text, as levelled against the king's coat of arms. That had never been once in my thoughts. Lord-keeper North diverted the king from doing anything on the account of my sermon. And so the matter slept till the end of the term. And then North wrote to the master of the Rolls, that the king considered the chapel of the Rolls as one of his own chapels; and, since he looked on me as a person disaffected to his government, and had for that reason dismissed me from his own service, he therefore required him not to suffer me to serve any longer in that chapel. And thus all my service in the church was now stopped; for upon such a public declaration made against me, it was not fit for any clergyman to make use of my assistance any more. And by these means I was set at liberty by the procurement of my enemies. So that I did not abandon my post either out of fear, or out of any giddiness to ramble about Europe. But being now under such public marks of jealousy, and put out of a capacity of serving God and the church in the way of my function, it seemed a prudent and a decent thing for me to withdraw myself from that fury which I saw was working so strongly, and in so many repeated instances, against me.

* Psalm xxii. 21.

These disgraces from the court were the occasion of my going out of England, which both preserved me from what I had reason to apprehend, when the duke, by the change that happened soon after, might have had it in his power to make me feel all that displeasure which had been growing upon him in a course of so many years against me, and it also put me in a way to do the greatest services I was capable of, both to the interest of religion, and of these nations. So that what was intended as a mischief to me proved my preservation. My employment at the Rolls would have fallen in course within a month, if the court had delayed the putting me from it in such an open manner; for that worthy man, sir Harbottle Grimstone, died about Christmas. Nature sank all at once, he being then eighty-two. He died, as he had lived, with great piety and resignation to the will of God.

There were two famous trials in Michaelmas term. Three women came and deposed against Roswell, a presbyterian preacher, treasonable words that he had delivered at a conventicle. They swore to two or three periods, in which they had agreed so exactly together, that there was not the smallest variation in their depositions. Roswell, on the other hand, made a strong defence. He proved that the witnesses were lewd and infamous persons. He proved that he had always been a loyal man, even in Cromwell's days: that he prayed constantly for the king in his family: and that in his sermons he often insisted on the obligations to loyalty. And as for that sermon in which the witnesses swore he delivered those words, he showed what his text was, which the witnesses could not remember, as they remembered nothing else in his sermon besides the words they had deposed. That text, and his sermon upon it, had no relation to any such matter. Several witnesses who heard the sermon, and some who wrote it in short-hand, declared he said no such words, nor anything to that purpose. He offered his own notes to prove this further; but no regard was had to them. The women could not prove by any circumstance that they were at his meeting, or that any person saw them there on that day. The words they swore against him were so gross, that it was not to be imagined any man in his wits could express himself so, were he ever so wickedly set, before a mixed assembly. It was also urged, that it was highly improbable that three women could remember so long a period upon one single hearing; and that they should all remember it so exactly as to agree in the same deposition. He offered to put the whole upon this issue: he would pronounce a period, as long as that which they had sworn, with his usual tone of voice with which he preached, and then leave it to them to repeat it, if they could. I set down all this defence more particularly, that it may appear what a spirit was in that time, when a verdict could be brought in upon such an evidence, and against such a defence. Jeffreys urged the matter with his ordinary vehemence: he laid it for a foundation, that all preaching at conventicles was treasonable, and that this ought to dispose the jury to believe any evidence whatsoever upon that head, and that here were three positive concurring witnesses. So the jury brought him in guilty. And there was a shameful rejoicing upon this. It was thought now conventicles would be all suppressed by it; since any person that would witness that treasonable words were delivered at them would be believed, how improbable soever it might be. But when the importance of the words came to be examined by men learned in the law, they were found not to be treason by any statute. So Roswell moved for an arrest of judgment, till counsel should be heard to that point, whether the words were treason or not. In Sidney's case, they refused to grant that, unless he would first confess the fact. And though that was much censured, yet it was more doubtful whether counsel ought to be heard after the jury had brought in the verdict. But the king was so put out of countenance with the many stories that were brought him of his witnesses, that the attorney-general had orders to yield to the arrest of judgment; though it had been more to the king's honour to have put an end to the business by a pardon. It was thought a good point gained, which might turn to the advantage of the subject, to allow that a point of law might be argued after conviction. The impudence of this verdict was the more shameful, since, though we had a popish successor in view, here was a precedent made, by which positive witnesses, swearing to anything as said in a sermon, were to be believed against so many probabilities, and so much proof to the contrary; which might have been at another time very fatal to the clergy.

The other trial was of more importance to the court. In Armstrong's pocket, when he was taken, a letter was found written by Haies, a banker in London, directed to another name, which was believed a feigned one. In it credit was given him upon Haies's correspondent in Holland for money ; he was desired not to be too lavish ; and he was promised that he should be supplied as he needed it. Here was an abetting of a man outlawed for treason. Much pains was taken on Haies, both by persuasion and threatening, to induce him to discover that whole cabal of men, that, it seemed, joined in a common purse to supply those who had fled beyond sea on the account of the plot. And they hoped to know all Monmouth's friends ; and either to have attainted them, or at least to have fined them severely for it. But Haies shewed a fidelity and courage far beyond what could have been expected from such a man : so he was brought to a trial. He made a strong defence. The letter was not exactly like his hand. It was not addressed to Armstrong, but to another person, from whom he perhaps had it. No entry was made of it in his books, nor of any sum paid in upon it. But his main defence was, that a banker examined into no person's concerns ; and, therefore, when money or good security was brought him, he gave bills of exchange, or letters of credit, as they were desired. Jeffreys pressed the jury, in his impetuous way, to find Haies guilty of high treason ; because, though there was not a witness against Haies, but only presumptions appeared upon the proof, yet, Jeffreys said, it was proved by two witnesses that the letter was found in Armstrong's pocket ; and that was sufficient, the rest appearing by circumstances. The little difference between the writing in the letter and his ordinary hand, was said to be only a feint to hide it, which made him the more guilty. He required the jury to bring him in guilty ; and said, that the king's life and safety depended upon this trial : so that if they did it not, they exposed the king to a new Rye-plot ; with other extravagancies with which his fury prompted him. But a jury of merchants could not be wrought up to this pitch. So he was acquitted, which mortified the court a little ; for they had reckoned that now juries were to be only a point of form in a trial, and that they were always to find bills as they were directed.

A trial in a matter of blood came on after this*. A gentleman of a noble family being at a public supper with much company, some hot words passed between him and another gentleman, which raised a sudden quarrel, none but three persons being engaged in it. Swords were drawn, and one was killed outright ; but it was not certain by whose hand he was killed. So the other two were both indicted upon it. The proof did not carry it beyond manslaughter, no marks of any precedent malice appearing. Yet the young gentleman was prevailed on to confess the indictment, and to let sentence pass on him for murder : a pardon being promised him if he should do so, and he being threatened with the utmost rigour of the law, if he stood upon his defence. After the sentence had passed, it appeared on what design he had been practised on. It was a rich family, and not well affected to the court ; so he was told that he must pay well for his pardon. And it cost him 16,000*l.* : of which the king had the one half, the other half being divided between two ladies that were in great favour. It is a very ill thing for princes to suffer themselves to be prevailed on by importunities to pardon blood which cries for vengeance. Yet an easiness to such importunity is a feebleness of good nature, and so is in itself less criminal. But it is a monstrous perverting of justice, and a destroying the chief end of government, which is the preservation of the people, when their blood is set to sale ; and that not as a compensation to the family of the person murdered, but to the prince himself, and to some who are in favour with him upon unworthy accounts ; and it was robbery if the gentleman was innocent.

Another thing of a strange nature happened about this time. The earl of Clancarty in Ireland, when he died, had left his lady the guardian of his children. It was one of the noblest and richest families of the Irish nation, which had always been papists ; but the lady was a protestant. And she, being afraid to trust the education of her son in Ireland, though in protestant hands, considering the danger he might be in from his kindred of that religion, brought him over to Oxford, and put him into Fell's hands, who was both bishop of Oxford and dean of Christchurch, where she reckoned he would be safe. Lord Clancarty had an uncle, col. Maccarthy, who was in most things, where his religion was not concerned, a man of honour. So he, both to pervert his nephew and to make his own court, got the king to write to the bishop of Oxford to let the young lord come up and see the diversions of the town in the Christmas time: to which the bishop did too easily consent. When he came to town, he, being then at the age of consent, was married to one of the lord Sunderland's daughters. And so he broke through all his education, and soon after turned papist. Thus the king suffered himself to be made an instrument in one of the greatest of crimes, the taking an infant out of the hand of a guardian, and marrying him secretly; against which the laws of all nations have taken care to provide very effectually. But this leads me into a further view of the designs at court.

The earl of Rochester grew weary of the insignificant place of president, which procured him neither confidence nor dependence. And, since the government of Ireland was the greatest post next to the treasury, he obtained by the duke's favour to be named lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The king seemed to be so uneasy with him, that he was glad to send him away from the court*. And the king intended to begin in his person a new method in the government of Ireland. Formerly the lords-lieutenants were generals of the army, as well as the governors of the kingdom. Their interest in recommending to posts in the army, and the giving the commissions for them, brought the army into their dependence, and increased the profits of their secretaries. It was now suggested by lord Sunderland that this was too much in one person, and therefore he proposed, that there should be a general of the army, independent on the lord-lieutenant, and who should be a check upon him. When there were but a few troops kept up there, it might be more reasonable to leave them in the lord-lieutenant's hands; but now that an army was kept, it seemed too much to put that, as well as the civil administration of the kingdom, into the power of one man. In this the earl of Sunderland's design was to keep that kingdom in a dependence upon himself. And he told the king, that if he thought that was a good maxim for the government of Ireland, he ought to begin it when a creature of his own was sent thither, who had not such a right to dispute points of that kind with him, as ancient noblemen might pretend to. Lord Rochester was much mortified with this. He said, the chief governor of Ireland could not be answerable for the peace of that kingdom, if the army was not in a dependence on him. Yet little regard was had to all that he could object to this new method; for the king seemed to be the more pleased with it, because it afflicted him so much. The first instance, in which the king intended to begin the immediate dependence of the Irish army on himself, was not so well chosen as to make it generally acceptable: for it was, that colonel Maccarthy was to have a regiment there. He had a regiment in the French service for several years, and was called home upon that appearance that we had put on of engaging with the allies in a war with France in the year 1678. The popish plot had kept the king from employing him for some years, in which the court was in some management with the nation. But now that being at an end, the king intended to employ him upon this acceptable service he had done with relation to his nephew. The king spoke of it to lord Halifax; and he, as he told me, asked the king, if he thought that was to govern according to law. The king answered, he was not tied up by the laws of Ireland as he was by the laws of England. Lord Halifax offered to argue that point with any person that asserted it before him. He said, that army was raised by a protestant parliament, to secure the protestant interest: and would the king give occasion to any to say, that where his hands were not bound up, he would show all the favour he could to the papists? The king answered, he did not trouble himself with what people said, or would say. Lord Halifax replied to this, that it was a just piece of greatness in the king not to mind what his enemies said; but he hoped he would never despise what his friends said, especially when they seemed to have reason on their side; and he wished the king would choose rather to make up Maccarthy's losses for his service in pensions and other favours, than in a way that would raise so much clamour and jealousy. In all this, lord Halifax only offered his advice to the king, upon the king's beginning the discourse with him. Yet the king told it all to Maccarthy, who came and expostulated the matter with that lord. So he saw by that how little safe a man was, who spoke freely to the king, when he crossed the king's own inclinations.

There was a great expectation in the court of France that at this time the king would declare himself a papist. They did not keep the secret very carefully there; for the archbishop of Rheims had said to myself, that the king was as much theirs as his brother was, only he had not so much conscience. This I reported to lord Halifax to tell the king. Whether he did it, or not, I know not. But it was written over at this time from Paris, that the king of France had said at his levee, or at table, that a great thing would quickly break out in England with relation to religion. The occasion of that was afterwards better known. One of our East India ships had brought over one of the missionaries of Siam, who was a man of a warm imagination, and who talked of his having converted and baptized many thousands in that kingdom. He was well received at court; and the king diverted himself with hearing him relate the adventures and other passages of his travels. Upon this encouragement he desired a private audience, in which, in a very inflamed speech, and with great vehemence, he pressed the king to return to the bosom of the church. The king entertained this civilly, and gave him those answers, that he, not knowing the king's way, took them for such steps and indications as made him conclude the thing was very near done. And upon that he wrote to P. de la Chaise, that they would hear the news of the king's conversion very quickly. The confessor carried the news to the king, who, not doubting it, gave the general hint of that great turn, of which he was then full of hopes.

That priest was directed by some to apply himself to lord Halifax, to try if he could convert him. Lord Halifax told me he was so vain and so weak a man, that none could be converted by him, but such as were weary of their religion and wanted only a pretence to throw it off. Lord Halifax put many questions to him, to which he made such simple answers, as furnished that lord with many very lively sallies upon the conversions so much boasted of, when made by such men. Lord Halifax asked him how it came that, since the king of Siam was so favourable to their religion, they had not converted him? The missionary upon that told him, that the king had said he would not examine into the truth of all that they had told him concerning Jesus Christ. He thought it was not reasonable to forsake the religion of his fathers, unless he saw good grounds to justify the change. And, since they pretended that the author of their religion had left a power of working miracles with his followers, he desired they would apply that to himself. He had a palsy both in his arm and in his leg; and if they could deliver him from that, he promised to them he would change immediately. Upon which the missionary said, that the bishop, who was the head of that mission, was bold enough (assez hardi were the priest's own words) to undertake it. A day was set for it. And the bishop, with his priest and some others, came to the king. And after some prayers, the king told them he felt some heat and motion in his arm; but the palsy was more rooted in his thigh; so he desired the bishop would go on, and finish that which was so happily begun. The bishop thought he had ventured enough, and would engage no further, but told the king that, since their God had made one step towards him, he must make the next to God, and at least meet him half way. But the king was obstinate, and would have the miracle finished before he would change. On the other hand, the bishop stood his ground. And so the matter went no further. Upon which lord Halifax said, since the king was such an infidel, they ought to have prayed the palsy into his arm again, as well as they prayed it out; otherwise, here was a miracle lost on an obstinate infidel; and, if the palsy had immediately returned into his arm, that would perhaps have given him a full conviction. This put the missionary into some confusion. And lord Halifax repeated it both to the king and to the duke with that air of contempt, that the duke was highly provoked by it; and the priest appeared at court no more.

There was at this time a new scheme formed, that very probably would have for ever broken the king and the duke. But how it was laid was so great a secret, that I could never penetrate into it. It was laid at lady Portsmouth's. Barillon and lord Sunderland were the chief managers of it. Lord Godolphin was also in it. The duke of Monmouth came over secretly. And though he did not see the king, yet he went back very well pleased with his journey. But he never told his reason to any that I know of. Mr. May of the privy purse told me, that he was told there was a design to break out, with which he himself would be well pleased ; and when it was ripe, he was to be called on to come and manage the king's temper, which no man understood better than he did : for he had been bred about the king ever since he was a child ; and by his post he was in the secret of all his amours ; but was contrary to his notions in everything else, both with relation to popery, to France, and to arbitrary government. Yet he was so true to the king in that lewd confidence in which he employed him, that the king had charged him never to press him in anything, so as to provoke him. By this means he kept all this while much at a distance ; for he would not enter into any discourse with the king on matters of state, till the king began with him. And he told me, he knew by the king's way things were not yet quite ripe, nor he thoroughly fixed on the design. That with which they were to begin was the sending the duke to Scotland. And it was generally believed, that if the two brothers should be once parted, they would never meet again. The king spoke to the duke concerning his going to Scotland, and he answered that there was no occasion for it ; upon which the king replied, that either the duke must go, or that he himself would go thither.

The king was observed to be more than ordinarily pensive. And his fondness to lady Portsmouth increased, and broke out in very indecent instances. The grand prior of France, the duke of Vendome's brother, had made some applications to that lady, with which the king was highly offended. It was said, the king came in on a sudden, and saw that which provoked him ; so he commanded him immediately to go out of England. Yet after that the king caressed her in the view of all people, which he had never done on any occasion, or to any person formerly. The king was observed to be colder and more reserved to the duke than ordinary. But what was under all this was still a deep secret. Lord Halifax was let into no part of it. He still went on against lord Rochester. He complained in council that there were many razures in the books of the treasury, and that several leaves were cut out of those books ; and he moved the king to go to the treasury chamber, that the books might be laid before him, and that he might judge of the matter upon sight. So the king named the next Monday. And it was then expected that the earl of Rochester would have been turned out of all, if not sent to the Tower. And a message was sent to Mr. May, then at Windsor, to desire him to come to court that day, which it was expected would prove a critical day. And it proved to be so indeed, though in a different way.

All this winter the king looked better than he had done for many years. He had a humour in his leg which looked like the beginning of the gout ; so that for some weeks he could not walk, as he used to do generally for three or four hours a day in the park, which he did commonly so fast, that as it was really an exercise to himself, so it was a trouble to all about him to hold up with him. In the state the king was in, he, not being able to walk, spent much of his time in his laboratory, and was running a process for the fixing of mercury. On the first of February, being a Sunday, he eat little all day, and came to lady Portsmouth at night, and called for a porringer of spoon-meat. It was made too strong for his stomach, so he eat little of it ; and he had an unquiet night. In the morning, one Dr. King, a physician, and a chymist, came, as he had been ordered, to wait on him. All the king's discourse to him was so broken, that he could not understand what he meant. And the doctor concluded he was under some great disorder, either in his mind or in his body. The doctor, amazed at this, went out, and, meeting with the lord Peterborough, he said the king was in a strange humour, for he did not speak one word of sense. Lord Peterborough desired he would go in again to the bedchamber, which he did. And he was scarce come in, when the king, who seemed all the while to be in great confusion, fell down all of a sudden in a fit like an apoplexy ; he looked black, and his eyes turned in his head. The physician, who had been formerly an eminent surgeon, said it was impossible to save the king's life, if one minute was lost ; he would rather venture on the rigour of the law than leave the king to perish. And so he let him blood. The king came out of that fit ; and the physicians approved what Dr. King had done. Upon which the privy council ordered him a thousand pounds, which yet was never paid him. Though the king came out of that fit, yet the effects of it hung still upon him, so that he was much oppressed. And the physicians did very much apprehend the return of another fit, and that it would carry him off ; so they looked on him as a dead man. The bishop of London spoke a little to him, to dispose him to prepare for whatever might be before him; to which the king answered not a word. But that was imputed partly to the bishop's cold way of speaking, and partly to the ill opinion they had of him at court, as too busy in opposition to popery. Sancroft made a very weighty exhortation to him: in which he used a good degree of freedom, which he said was necessary, since he was going to be judged by one who was no respecter of persons. To him the king made no answer neither; nor yet to Ken, though the most in favour with him of all the bishops. Some imputed this to an insensibility, of which too visible an instance appeared, since lady Portsmouth sat in the bed taking care of him as a wife of a husband. Others guessed truer, that it would appear he was of another religion. On Thursday a second fit returned; and then the physicians told the duke that the king was not likely to live a day to an end.

The duke immediately ordered Hudleston, the priest that had a great hand in saving the king at Worcester fight (for which he was excepted out of all severe acts that were made against priests), to be brought to the lodgings under the bed-chamber. And when he was told what was to be done, he was in great confusion, for he had no hostie about him. But he went to another priest that lived in the court, who gave him the pix with an hostie in it. But that poor priest was so frightened, that he ran out of Whitehall in such haste that he struck against a post, and seemed to be in a fit of madness with fear. As soon as Hudleston had prepared everything that was necessary, the duke whispered the king in the ear. Upon that the king ordered that all who were in the bed-chamber should withdraw, except the earls of Bath and Feversham; and the door was double locked. The company was kept out half an hour: only lord Feversham opened the door once, and called for a glass of water. Cardinal Howard told me at Rome, that Hudleston, according to the relation that he sent thither, made the king go through some acts of contrition, and, after such a confession as he could then make, he gave him absolution and the other sacraments. The hostie stuck in his throat, and that was the occasion of calling for a glass of water. He also gave him extreme unction. All must have been performed very superficially, since it was so soon ended. But the king seemed to be at great ease upon it. It was given out, that the king said to Hudleston that he had saved him twice: first his body, and now his soul; and that he asked him if he would have him declare himself to be of their church. But it seems he was prepared for this, and so diverted the king from it; and said, he took it upon him to satisfy the world in that particular. But though by the principles of all religions whatsoever he ought to have obliged him to make open profession of his religion, yet, it seems, the consequences of that were apprehended; for without doubt that poor priest acted by the directions that were given him. The company was suffered to come in. And the king went through the agonies of death with a calm and a constancy that amazed all who were about him, and knew how he had lived. This made some conclude that he had made a will, and that his quiet was the effect of that. Ken applied himself much to the awaking the king's conscience. He spoke with a great elevation, both of thought and expression, like a man inspired, as those who were present told me. He resumed the matter often, and pronounced many short ejaculations and prayers, which affected all that were present, except him that was the most concerned, who seemed to take no notice of him, and made no answers to him. He pressed the king six or seven times to receive the sacrament; but the king always declined it, saying he was very weak. A table with the elements upon it ready to be consecrated was brought into the room, which occasioned a report to be then spread about, that he had received it. Ken pressed him to declare that he desired it, and that he died in the communion of the church of England. To that he answered nothing. Ken asked him if he desired absolution of his sins. It seems the king, if he then thought anything at all, thought that would do him no hurt. So Ken pronounced it over him; for which he was blamed, since the king expressed no sense of sorrow for his past life, nor any purpose of amendment. It was thought to be a prostitution of the peace of the church, to give it to one, who, after a life led as the king's had been, seemed to harden himself against everything that could be said to him. Ken was also censured for another piece of indecency: he presented the duke of Richmond, lady Portsmouth's son, to be blessed by the king. Upon this, some that were in the room cried out, the king was their common father. And upon that all kneeled down for his blessing, which he gave them. The king suffered much inwardly, and said, he was burnt up within ; of which he complained often, but with great decency. He said once, he hoped he should climb up to heaven's gates, which was the only word savouring of religion that he was heard to speak.

He gathered all his strength to speak his last words to the duke, to which every one hearkened with great attention. He expressed his kindness to him, and that he now delivered all over to him with great joy. He recommended lady Portsmouth over and over again to him. He said, he had always loved her, and he loved her now to the last ; and besought the duke, in as melting words as he could fetch out, to be very kind to her, and to her son. He recommended his other children to him : and concluded, " Let not poor Nelly starve : " that was Mrs. Gwyn. But he said nothing of the queen, nor any one word of his people, or of his servants : nor did he speak one word of religion, or concerning the payment of his debts, though he left behind him about 90,000 guineas, which he had gathered, either out of the privy purse, or out of the money which was sent him from France, or by other methods, and which he had kept so secretly that no person whatsoever knew any thing of it.

He continued in the agony till Friday at eleven o'clock, being the sixth of February, 1684-5, and then died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, after he had reigned, if we reckon from his father's death, thirty-six years, and eight days ; or, if we reckon from his restoration, twenty-four years, eight months, and nine days. There were many very apparent suspicions of his being poisoned ; for though the first access looked like an apoplexy, yet it was plain in the progress of it that it was no apoplexy. When his body was opened, the physicians who viewed it were, as it were, led by those who might suspect the truth, to look upon the parts that were certainly sound. But both Lower and Needham, two famous physicians, told me, they plainly discerned two or three blue spots on the outside of the stomach. Needham called twice to have it opened ; but the surgeons seemed not to hear him : and when he moved it the second time, he, as he told me, heard Lower say to one that stood next him, " Needham will undo us, calling thus to have the stomach opened, for he may see they will not do it." They were diverted to look to somewhat else : and when they returned to look upon the stomach, it was carried away : so that it was never viewed. Le Fevre, a French physician, told me, he saw a blackness in the shoulder : upon which he made an incision, and saw it was all mortified. Short, another physician, who was a papist, but after a form of his own, did very much suspect foul dealing : and he had talked more freely of it than any of the protestants durst do at that time. But he was not long after taken suddenly ill, upon a large draught of wormwood wine, which he had drank in the house of a popish patient, that lived near the Tower, who had sent for him, of which he died. And, as he said to Lower, Millington, and some other physicians, he believed that he himself was poisoned, for his having spoken so freely of the king's death. The king's body was indecently neglected. Some parts of his inwards, and some pieces of the fat, were left in the water in which they were washed : all which were so carelessly looked after, that the water being poured out at a scullery hole that went to a drain, in the mouth of which a grate lay, these were seen lying on the grate many days after. His funeral was very mean. He did not lie in state : no mournings were given ; and the expense of it was not equal to what an ordinary nobleman's funeral will rise to. Many upon this said, that he deserved better from his brother, than to be thus ungratefully treated in ceremonies that are public, and that make an impression on those who see them, and who will make severe observations and inferences upon such omissions. But since I have mentioned the suspicions of poison, as the cause of his death, I must add, that I never heard any lay those suspicions on his brother. But his dying so critically, as it were in the minute in which he seemed to begin a turn of affairs, made it to be generally the more believed, and that the papists had done it, either by the means of some of lady Portsmouth's servants, or, as some fancied, by poisonous snuff ; for so many of the small veins of the brain were burst, that the brain was in great disorder, and no judgment could be made concerning it. To this I shall add a very surprising story, that I had in November, 1709, from Mr. Henley, of Hampshire. He told me, that, when the duchess of Portsmouth came over to England in the year 1699, he heard, that she had talked as if king Charles had been poisoned; which he desiring to have from her own mouth, she gave him this account of it. She was always pressing the king to make both himself and his people easy, and to come to a full agreement with his parliament: and he was come to a final resolution of sending away his brother, and of calling a parliament; which was to be executed the next day after he fell into that fit of which he died. She was put upon the secret, and spoke of it to no person alive, but to her confessor: but the confessor, she believed, told it to some, who, seeing what was to follow, took that wicked course to prevent it. Having this from so worthy a person, as I have set it down without adding the least circumstance to it, I thought it too important not to be mentioned in this history. It discovers both the knavery of confessors, and the practices of papists, so evidently, that there is no need of making any further reflections on it<sup>a</sup>.

Thus lived and died king Charles the Second. He was the greatest instance in history of the various revolutions of which any one man seemed capable. He was bred up, the first twelve years of his life, with the splendour that became the heir of so great a crown. After that he passed through eighteen years in great inequalities, unhappy in the war, in the loss of his father, and of the crown of England. Scotland did not only receive him, though upon terms hard of digestion, but made an attempt upon England for him, though a feeble one. He lost the battle of Worcester with too much indifference; and then he shewed more care of his person, than became one who had so much at stake. He wandered about England for ten weeks after that, hiding from place to place: but, under all the apprehensions he had then upon him, he shewed a temper so careless, and so much turned to levity, that he was then diverting himself with little household sports, in as unconcerned a manner, as if he had made no loss, and had been in no danger at all. He got at last out of England; but he had been obliged to so many, who had been faithful to him, and careful of him, that he seemed afterwards to resolve to make an equal return to them all; and finding it not easy to reward them all as they deserved, he forgot them all alike. Most princes seem to have this pretty deep in them, and to think that they ought never to remember past services, but that their acceptance of them is a full reward. He, of all in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative in the amplest manner: for he never seemed to charge his memory, or to trouble his thoughts, with the sense of any of the services that had been done him†. While he was abroad at Paris, Cologne, or Brussels, he never seemed to lay any thing to heart. He pursued all his diversions, and irregular pleasures, in a free career; and seemed to be as serene under <sup>a</sup> A few corrections and additions are required to the above narrative of the king's death. The duchess of Portsmouth, it seems, was not with him in his last moments, although she was very anxious to be with him, and to have him reconciled to the papal religion. She would have been present if bishop Ken had not prevented her; (Ken's Life by a Relative, 17), and she probably assigned the reason when she told the French ambassador, "I cannot with decency enter the room—the queen is almost constantly there."—(Dalrymple's Memoirs, Append. i. 95<sup>a</sup>.) The earl of Aylesford, who attended the king at the time, thus describes the final scene. "My good king and master falling upon me in his fit, I ordered him to be blooded, and then I went to fetch the duke of York. When we came to the bed-side, we found the queen there; and the imposter (Burnet) says it was the duchess of Portsmouth."—(From an original letter published in the European Magazine, xxvii. 22.) King James, in his own Memoirs, styled "Life of James the Second," i. p. 749, says Charles spoke most tenderly to the queen in his dying hour. This is confirmed by the relation of bishop, Ken just quoted.

The earl of Dartmouth relates that the king was very fond of his buildings at Winchester, designed by sir Christopher Wren, but now converted into barracks, and that the 90,000 guineas mentioned by Burnet, were intended for their completion.—Oxford ed. of this work. The earl's authority was William Chiffins, the king's closet-keeper.

The suspicions of the king being poisoned, are sustained by the statement in the works of Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, ii. 65, and Wellwood's Memoirs.

Mr. Henley, quoted by Burnet, was the father of the lord keeper; he was esteemed a man of honour, as he certainly was talented, wealthy, and mixed in good society. To him Dr. Garth dedicated his "Dispensatory;" and he is the member of parliament who moved for an address to the queen for the promotion of Dr. Hoadley to some ecclesiastical dignity as a recompence for his writings in defence of liberty and the established church. The earl of Hardwicke related that he had heard the duke of Richmond, son of the duchess of Portsmouth, relate the narrative as Burnet tells it.—(Oxford ed. of this work.) The various opinions upon this point are well weighed by Ralph in his "History," and he impartially concludes that the evidence is so imperfect and conflicting, that "all decision must, and ought to be postponed to the general audit."

the loss of a crown, as the greatest philosopher could have been. Nor did he willingly hearken to any of those projects, with which he often complained that his chancellor persecuted him. That in which he seemed most concerned was, to find money for supporting his expense. And it was often said, that, if Cromwell would have compounded the matter, and have given him a good round pension, that he might have been induced to resign his title to him. During his exile he delivered himself so entirely to his pleasures, that he became incapable of application. He spent little of his time in reading, or study, and yet less in thinking: and, in the state his affairs were then in, he accustomed himself to say to every person, and upon all occasions, that which he thought would please most: so that words or promises went very easily from him. And he had so ill an opinion of mankind, that he thought the great art of living and governing was, to manage all things and all persons with a depth of craft and dissimulation. And in that few men in the world could put on the appearances of sincerity better than he could: under which so much artifice was usually hid, that in conclusion he could deceive none, for all were become mistrustful of him. He had great vices, but scarcely any virtues to correct them: he had in him some vices that were less hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones. He was, during the active part of life, given up to sloth and lewdness to such a degree, that he hated business, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much trouble, or put him under any constraint: and though he desired to become absolute, and to overturn both our religion and our laws, yet he would neither run the risk, nor give himself the trouble, which so great a design required. He had an appearance of gentleness in his outward deportment, but he seemed to have no bowels nor tenderness in his nature; and in the end of his life he became cruel. He was apt to forgive all crimes, even blood itself; yet he never forgave any thing that was done against himself, after his first and general act of indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done rather upon maxims of state than inclinations of mercy. He delivered himself up to a most enormous course of vice, without any sort of restraint, even from the consideration of the nearest relations: the most studied extravagancies that way seemed, to the very last, to be much delighted in, and pursued by him. He had the art of making all people grow fond of him at first, by a softness in his whole way of conversation, as he was certainly the best bred man of the age. But when it appeared how little could be built on his promise, they were cured of the fondness that he was apt to raise in them. When he saw young men of quality, who had something more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and set himself to corrupt them both in religion and morality; in which he proved so unhappily successful, that he left England much changed at his death from what he had found it at his restoration. He loved to talk over all the stories of his life to every new man that came about him. His stay in Scotland, and the share he had in the war of Paris, in carrying messages from the one side to the other, were his common topics. He went over these in a very graceful manner; but so often, and so copiously, that all those who had been long accustomed to them grew weary of them: and when he entered on those stories they usually withdrew; so that he often began them in a full audience, and before he had done there were not above four or five left about him: which drew a severe jest from Wilmot, earl of Rochester. He said, he wondered to see a man have so good a memory as to repeat the same story without losing the least circumstance, and yet not remember that he had told it to the same persons the very day before. This made him fond of strangers; for they hearkened to all his often repeated stories, and went away as in a rapture at such an uncommon condescension in a king.

His person and temper, his vices as well as his fortunes, resemble the character that we have given us of Tiberius so much, that it were easy to draw the parallel between them. Tiberius's banishment, and his coming afterwards to reign, makes the comparison in that respect come pretty near. His hating of business, and his love of pleasures; his raising of favourites, and trusting them entirely; and his pulling them down, and hating them excessively; his art of covering deep designs, particularly of revenge, with an appearance of softness, brings them so near a likeness, that I did not wonder much to observe the resemblance of their face and person. At Rome I saw one of the last statues made for Tiberius, after he had lost his teeth. But, abating the alteration which that made, it was so like king Charles, that prince Borghese, and Signior Dominico to whom it belonged, did agree with me in thinking that it looked like a statue made for him.

Few things ever went near his heart. The duke of Gloucester's death seemed to touch him much. But those who knew him best thought it was, because he had lost him by whom only he could have balanced the surviving brother, whom he hated, and yet embroiled all his affairs to preserve the succession to him.

His ill conduct in the first Dutch war, and those terrible calamities of the plague, and fire of London, with that loss and reproach which he suffered by the insult at Chatham, made all people conclude there was a curse upon his government. His throwing the public hatred at that time upon lord Clarendon was both unjust and ungrateful. And when his people had brought him out of all his difficulties upon his entering into the triple alliance, his selling that to France, and his entering on the second Dutch war with as little colour as he had for the first; his beginning it with the attempt on the Dutch Smyrna fleet; the shutting up the Exchequer; and his declaration for toleration, which was a step for the introduction of popery; made such a chain of black actions, flowing from blacker designs, that it amazed those who had known all this to see, with what impudent strains of flattery, addresses were penned during his life, and yet more grossly after his death. His contributing so much to the raising the greatness of France, chiefly at sea, was such an error, that it could not flow from want of thought, or of true sense. Rouvigné told me, he desired that all the methods the French took in the increase and conduct of their naval force might be sent him. And, he said, he seemed to study them with concern and zeal. He shewed what errors they committed, and how they ought to be corrected, as if he had been a viceroy to France, rather than a king that ought to have watched over and prevented the progress they made, as the greatest of all the mischiefs that could happen to him or to his people. They that judged the most favourably of this, thought it was done out of revenge to the Dutch, that, with the assistance of so great a fleet as France could join to his own, he might be able to destroy them. But others put a worse construction on it; and thought, that seeing he could not quite master, or deceive his subjects by his own strength and management, he was willing to help forward the greatness of the French at sea, that by their assistance he might more certainly subdue his own people; according to what was generally believed to have fallen from lord Clifford, that, if the king must be in a dependence, it was better to pay it to a great and generous king, than to five hundred of his own insolent subjects.

No part of his character looked more wicked, as well as meaner, than that he, all the while that he was professing to be of the church of England, expressing both zeal and affection to it, was yet secretly inclined to the church of Rome: thus, mocking God, and deceiving the world with so gross a prevarication. And his not having the honesty or courage to own it at the last; his not shewing any sign of the least remorse for his ill led life, or any tenderness either for his subjects in general, or for the queen and his servants; and his recommending only his mistresses and their children to his brother's care, would have been a strange conclusion to any other's life, but was well enough suited to all the other parts of his.

The two papers found in his strong box concerning religion, and afterwards published by his brother, looked like study and reasoning. Tennison told me, he saw the original in Pepys's hand, to whom king James trusted them for some time. They were interlined in several places. And the interlinings seemed to be written in a hand different from that in which the papers were written. But he was not so well acquainted with the king's hand, as to make any judgment in the matter, whether they were written by him or not. All that knew him, when they read them, did without any sort of doubting conclude, that he never composed them: for he never read the scriptures, nor laid things together, further than to turn them to a jest, or for some lively expression. These papers were probably written either by lord Bristol, or by lord Aubigny, who knew the secret of his religion, and gave him those papers, as abstracts of some discourses they had with him on those heads, to keep him fixed to them. And it is very probable that they, apprehending their danger if any such papers had been found about him written in their hand, might prevail with him to copy them out himself, though his laziness that way made it certainly no easy thing to bring him to give himself so much trouble. He had talked over a great part of them to myself: so that, as soon I saw them, I remembered his expressions, and perceived that he had made himself master of the argument, as far as those papers could carry him. But the publishing them shewed a want of judgment, or of regard to his memory, in those who did it: for the greatest kindness that could be shewn to his memory, would have been, to let both his papers and himself be forgotten.

Which I should certainly have done, if I had not thought that the laying open of what I knew concerning him and his affairs might be of some use to posterity. And therefore, how ungrateful soever this labour has proved to myself, and how unacceptable soever it may be to some, who are either obliged to remember him gratefully, or by the engagement of parties and interests are under other biasses, yet I have gone through all that I knew relating to his life and reign with that regard to truth, and what I think may be instructive to mankind, which became an impartial writer of history, and one who believes, that he must give an account to God of what he writes, as well as of what he says and does *.

* Another character of Charles the Second, agreeing closely with the preceding, yet in less severe terms, is given by Dr. Wellwood, another contemporary, in his "Memoirs." Both, and indeed all historians of his reign, shew that he was a selfish, witty profligate—totally without any fixed generous principle, and agreeing with his portrait so tersely drawn by the earl of Rochester, when he observed, that "the king never said a silly thing; and never did a wise one."

THE END OF KING CHARLES THE SECOND'S REIGN.

OF THE REIGN OF KING JAMES THE SECOND.

AM now to prosecute this work, and to give the relation of an inglorious and unprosperous reign, that was begun with great advantages; but these were so poorly managed, and so ill improved, that bad designs were ill laid, and worse conducted; and all came in conclusion to one of the strangest catastrophes that is in any history. A great king with strong armies, and mighty fleets, a vast treasure, and powerful allies, fell all at once: and his whole strength, like a spider's web, was so irrecoverably broken with a touch, that he was never able to retrieve, what for want both of judgment, and heart, he threw up in a day. Such an unexpected revolution deserves to be well opened; I will do it as fully as I can. But, having been beyond sea almost all this reign, many small particulars, that may well deserve to be remembered, may have escaped me; yet as I had good opportunities to be well informed, I will pass over nothing that seems of any importance to the opening such great and unusual transactions. I will endeavour to watch over my pen with more than ordinary caution, that I may let no sharpness, from any ill usage I myself met with, any way possess my thoughts, or bias my mind: on the contrary, the sad fate of this unfortunate prince will make me the more tender in not aggravating the errors of his reign. As to my own particular, I will remember how much I was once in his favour, and how highly I was obliged to him. And as I must let his designs and miscarriages be seen, so I will open things as fully as I can, that it may appear on whom we ought to lay the chief load of them: which indeed ought to be chiefly charged on his religion, and on those who had the management of his conscience, his priests, and his Italian queen: which last had hitherto acted a popular part with great artifice and skill, but came now to take off the mask, and to discover herself.

This prince was much neglected in his childhood, during the time he was under his father's care. The parliament, getting him into their hands, put him under the earl of Northumberland's government, who, as the duke himself told me, treated him with great respect, and a very tender regard. When he escaped out of their hands, by the means of colonel Bamfield, his father wrote to him a letter in cypher, concluding in these plain words, "Do this as you expect the blessing of your loving father." This was sent to William, duke of Hamilton, but came after he had made his escape: and so I found it among his papers; and I gave it to the duke of York in the year 1674. He said to me, he believed he had his father's cypher among his papers, and that he would try to decipher the letter; but I believe he never did it. I told him I was confident, that as the letter was written when his escape was under consideration, so it contained an order to go to the queen, and to be obedient to her in all things, except in matters of religion. The king appointed sir John Berkeley, afterwards lord Berkeley, to be his governor. It was a strange choice, if it was not, because in such a want of men who stuck then to the king, there were few capable in any sort of such a trust. Berkeley was bold, and insolent, and seemed to lean to popery: he was certainly very arbitrary, both in his temper and notions. The queen took such a particular care of this prince, that he was soon observed to have more of her favour than either of his two brothers; and she was so set on making proselytes, hoping that "to save a soul" would cover a "multitude of sins," that it is not to be doubted but she used more than ordinary arts to draw him over to her religion. Yet, as he himself told me, he stood out against her practices.

During his stay in France he made some campaigns under M. de Turenne, who took him so particularly under his care, that he instructed him in all that he undertook, and shewed him the reasons of every thing he did so minutely, that he had great advantages by being formed under the greatest general of the age. Turenne was so much taken with his application, and the heat that he shewed, that he recommended him out of measure. He said often of him: "There was the greatest prince, and like to be the best general of his time." This raised his character so much, that the king was not a little eclipsed by him. Yet he quickly ran into amours and vice; and that by degrees wore out any courage that had appeared in his youth. And in the end of his life he came to lose the reputation of a brave man and a good captain so entirely, that either he was never that which flatterers gave out concerning him, or his age and affairs wrought a very unusual change on him.

He seemed to follow his mother's maxims all the while he was beyond sea. He was the head of a party that was formed in the king's small court against lord Clarendon. And it was believed that his applications to lord Clarendon's daughter were made at first, on design to dishonour his family, though she had the address to turn it another way*.

After his brother's restoration he applied himself much to the marine, in which he arrived at great skill, and brought the fleet so entirely into his dependence, that even after he laid down the command, he was still the master of our whole sea force. He had now for these last three years directed all our counsels with so absolute an authority, that the king seemed to have left the government wholly in his hands: only the unlooked-for bringing in the duke of Monmouth put him under no small apprehensions, that at some time or other the king might slip out of his hands: now that fear was over.

The king was dead; and so all the court went immediately and paid their duty to him. Orders were presently given for proclaiming him king. It was a heavy solemnity; few tears were shed for the former, nor were there any shouts of joy for the present king. A dead silence, but without any disorder or tumult, followed it through the streets†. When the privy councillors came back from the proclamation, and waited on the new king, he made a short speech to them; which it seems was well considered, and much liked by him, for he repeated it to his parliament, and upon several other occasions.

He began with an expostulation for the ill character that had been entertained of him. He told them, in very positive words, that he would never depart from any branch of his prerogative: but with that he promised that he would maintain the liberty and property of the subject. He expressed his good opinion of the church of England, as a friend to monarchy. Therefore, he said, he would defend and maintain the church, and would preserve the government in church and state, as it was established by law.

This speech was soon printed, and gave great content to those who believed that he would stick to the promises made in it; and those few, who did not believe it, yet durst not seem to doubt of it. The pulpits of England were full of it, and of thanksgiving for it. It was magnified as a security far greater than any that laws could give. The common phrase was, We have now the "word of a king, and a word never yet broken."

Upon this a new set of addresses went round England, in which the highest commendations, that flattery could invent, were given to the late king; and assurances of loyalty and fidelity were renewed to the king, in terms that shewed there were no jealousies, nor fears left. The University of Oxford in their address promised to obey the king, "without limitations, or restrictions." The king's promise passed for a thing so sacred, that they were looked on as ill bred, that put in their address, "our religion established by law;" which looked like a tie on the king to maintain it: whereas the stile of the more courtly was, to put all our security upon the king's promise. The clergy of London added a word to this in their address, "our religion established by law, dearer to us than our lives." This had such

* The progress of this match, and the distress it caused lord Clarendon, are fully detailed in that nobleman's "Autobiography."

† This statement of Burnet is contradicted by other contemporaries. The earl of Dartmouth says, the commonalty especially deplored the loss of Charles, for they had lived in ease and plenty during his reign; and Colley Cibber, no friend of the Stuarts, bears a similar testimony in his autobiography. Sir John Keresby in his Memoirs, makes the same observation. Wellwood and Calamy in their Memoirs unite in agreeing that the accession of James was hailed with the loudest acclamations.

an insinuation in it, as made it very unacceptable. Some followed their pattern. But this was marked to be remembered against those that used so menacing a form.

All employments were ended of course with the life of the former king; but the king continued all in their places: only the posts in the household were given to those who had served the king, while he was duke of York. The marquis of Halifax had reason to look on himself as in ill terms with the king: so in a private audience he made the best excuses he could for his conduct of late. The king diverted the discourse, and said, he would forget every thing that was past, except his behaviour in the business of the exclusion. The king also added, that he would expect no other service of him than what was consistent with law. He prepared him for the exaltation of the earl of Rochester. He said, he had served him well, and had suffered on his account, and therefore he would now shew favour to him: and the next day he declared him lord treasurer. His brother, the earl of Clarendon, was made lord privy seal: and the marquis of Halifax was made lord president of the council. The earl of Sunderland was looked on as a man lost at court: and so was lord Godolphin. But the former of these insinuated himself so into the queen's confidence, that he was, beyond all people's expectation, not only maintained in his posts, but grew into great degree of favour.

The queen was made to consider the earl of Rochester as a person that would be in the interest of the king's daughters, and united to the church party. So she saw it was necessary to have one in a high post, who should depend wholly on her, and be entirely hers. And the earl of Sunderland was the only person capable of that. The earl of Rochester did upon his advancement become so violent and boisterous, that the whole court joined to support the earl of Sunderland, as the proper balance to the other. Lord Godolphin was put in a great post in the queen's household.

But before the earl of Rochester had the white staff, the court engaged the lord Godolphin, and the other lords of the treasury, to send orders to the commissioners of the customs, to continue to levy the customs, though the act that granted them to the late king was only for his life, and so was now determined with it. It is known how much this matter was contested in king Charles the First's time, and what had passed upon it. The legal method was to have made entries, and to have taken bonds for those duties, to be paid when the parliament should meet, and renew the grant. Yet the king declared, that he would levy the customs, and not stay for the new grant. But though this did not agree well with the king's promise of maintaining liberty and property, yet it was said in excuse for it, that, if the customs should not be levied in this interval, great importations would be made, and the markets would be so stocked, that this would very much spoil the king's customs. But in answer to this it was said again, entries were to be made, and bonds taken, to be sued, when the act granting them should pass. Endeavours were used with some of the merchants to refuse to pay those duties, and to dispute the matter in Westminster Hall; but none would venture on so bold a thing. He who should begin any such opposition would probably be ruined by it; so none would run that hazard. The earl of Rochester got this to be done before he came into the treasury; so he pretended, that he only held on in the course that was begun by others.

The additional excise had been given to the late king only for life. But there was a clause in the act, that empowered the Treasury to make a farm of it for three years, without adding a limiting clause, in case it should be so long due. And it was thought a great stretch of the clause, to make a fraudulent farm, by which it should continue to be levied three years after it was determined, according to the letter and intendment of the act. A farm was now brought out, as made during the king's life, though it was well known that no such farm had been made; for it was made after his death, but a false date was put to it. This matter seemed doubtful. It was laid before the judges. And they all, except two, were of opinion that it was good in law. So two proclamations were ordered, the one for levying the customs, and the other for the excise.

These came out in the first week of the reign, and gave a melancholy prospect. Such beginnings did not promise well, and raised just fears in the minds of those who considered the consequences of such proceedings. They saw, that, by violence and fraud, duties were now to be levied without law. But all people were under the power of fear, or flattery, to such a degree, that none durst complain, and few would venture to talk of those matters.

Persons of all ranks went, in such crowds, to pay their duty to the king, that it was not easy to admit them all. Most of the Whigs that were admitted were received coldly at best. Some were sharply reproached for their past behaviour. Others were denied access. The king began likewise to say, that he would not be served as his brother had been: he would have all about him serve him without reserve, and go thorough in his business. Many were amazed to see such steps made at first. The second Sunday after he came to the throne, he, to the surprise of the whole court, went openly to mass, and sent Caryl to Rome with letters to the Pope, but without a character.

In one thing only the king seemed to comply with the genius of the nation, though it proved in the end to be only a shew. He seemed resolved not to be governed by French counsels, but to act in an equality with that haughty monarch in all things. And, as he entertained all the other foreign ministers with assurances that he would maintain the balance of Europe with a more steady hand than had been done formerly, so when he sent over the lord Churchill to the court of France, with the notice of his brother's death, he ordered him to observe exactly the ceremony and state with which he was received, that he might treat him, who should be sent over with the compliment in return to that, in the same manner. And this he observed very punctually, when the marshal de Lorge came over. This was set about by the courtiers, as a sign of another spirit, that might be looked for in a reign so begun. And this made some impression on the court of France, and put them to a stand. But, not long after this, the French king said to the duke of Villeroy, (who told it to young Rouvigny, now earl of Galloway, from whom I had it,) that the king of England, after all the high things given out in his name, was willing to take his money, as well as his brother had done.

The king did also give out, that he would live in a particular confidence with the prince of Orange, and the States of Holland. And, because Chudleigh, the envoy there, had openly broken with the prince, (for he not only waited no more on him, but acted openly against him; and once in the Vorhaut had affronted him, while he was driving the princess upon the snow in a traineau, according to the German manner, and pretending they were masked, and that he did not know them, had ordered his coachman to keep his way, as they were coming towards the place where he drove;) the king recalled him, and sent Skelton in his room, who was the haughtiest, but withal the weakest man, that he could have found out. He talked out all secrets, and made himself the scorn of all Holland*. The courtiers now said every where, that we had a martial prince who loved glory, who would bring France into as humble a dependence on us, as we had been formerly on that court.

The king did, some days after his coming to the crown, promise the queen and his priests, that he would see Mrs. Sedley no more, by whom he had some children. And he spoke openly against lewdness, and expressed a detestation of drunkenness. He sat many hours a day about business with the council, the treasury, and the admiralty. It was upon this said, that now we should have a reign of action and business, and not of sloth and luxury, as the last was. Mrs. Sedley had lodgings in Whitehall: orders were sent to her to leave them. This was done to mortify her; for she pretended that she should now govern as absolutely as the duchess of Portsmouth had done: yet the king still continued a secret commerce with her. And thus he began his reign with some fair appearances. A long and great frost had so shut up the Dutch ports, that for some weeks they had no letters from England: at last the news of the king's sickness and death, and of the beginnings of the new reign, came to them all at once.

The first difficulty the prince of Orange was in, was with relation to the duke of Monmouth. He knew the king would immediately, after the first compliments were over, ask him to dismiss him, if not to deliver him up. And as it was no way decent for him to break with the king upon such a point, so he knew the States would never bear it. He thought it better to dismiss him immediately, as of himself. The duke of Monmouth seemed surprised at this. Yet at parting he made great protestations both to the prince and princess of an inviolable fidelity to their interests. So he retired to Brussels, where he knew he could be suffered to stay no longer than till a return should come from Spain, upon the notice of king Charles's death, and the declarations that the king was making of maintaining the balance of Europe. The duke was upon that thinking to go to Vienna, or to some court in Germany; but those about him studied to inflame him both against the king and the prince of Orange. They told him, the prince, by casting him off, had cancelled all former obligations, and set him free from them: he was now to look to himself; and instead of wandering about as a vagabond, he was to set himself to deliver his country, and to raise his party and his friends, who were now likely to be used very ill, for their adhering to him, and to his interest.

They sent one over to England to try men's pulses, and to see if it was yet a proper time to make an attempt. Wildman, Charlton, and some others, went about trying if men were in a disposition to encourage an invasion. They talked of this in so remote a way of speculation, that though one could not but see what lay at bottom, yet they did not run into treasonable discourse. I was in general sounded by them: yet nothing was proposed that ran me into any danger from concealing it. I did not think fears and dangers, nor some illegal acts in the administration, could justify an insurrection, as lawful in itself: and I was confident an insurrection undertaken on such grounds would be so ill seconded, and so weakly supported, that it would not only come to nothing, but it would precipitate our ruin. Therefore I did all I could to divert all persons with whom I had any credit from engaging in such designs. These were for some time carried on in the dark. The king, after he had put his affairs in a method, resolved to hasten his coronation, and to have it performed with great magnificence: and for some weeks he was so entirely possessed with the preparations for that solemnity, that all business was laid aside, and nothing but ceremony was thought on.

At the same time a parliament was summoned; and all arts were used to manage elections so, that the king should have a parliament to his mind. Complaints came up from all the parts of England, of the injustice and violence used in elections, beyond what had ever been practised in former times. And this was so universal over the whole nation, that no corner of it was neglected. In the new charters that had been granted, the election of the members was taken out of the hands of the inhabitants, and restrained to the corporation-men, all those being left out who were not acceptable at court. In some boroughs they could not find a number of men to be depended on: so the neighbouring gentlemen were made the corporation-men: and, in some of these, persons of other counties, not so much as known in the borough, were named. This was practised in the most avowed manner in Cornwall by the earl of Bath; who, to secure himself the groom of the stole's place, which he held all king Charles's time, put the officers of the guards' names in almost all the charters of that county; which sending up forty-four members, they were for most part so chosen, that the king was sure of their votes on all occasions.

These methods were so successful over England, that when the elections were all returned, the king said, there were not above forty members, but such as he himself wished for. They were neither men of parts, nor estates: so there was no hope left, either of working on their understandings, or of making them see their interest, in not giving the king all at once. Most of them were furious and violent, and seemed resolved to recommend themselves to the king, by putting every thing in his power, and by ruining all those who had been for the exclusion. Some few had designed to give the king the revenue only from three years to three years. The earl of Rochester told me, that was what he looked for, though the post he was in made it not so proper for him to move in it. But there was no prospect of any strength in opposing anything that the king should ask of them.

This gave all thinking men a melancholy prospect. England now seemed lost, unless some happy accident should save it. All people saw the way for packing a parliament now laid open. A new set of charters and corporation-men, if those now named should not continue to be still as compliant, as they were at present, was a certain remedy, to which recourse might be easily had. The boroughs of England saw their privileges now wrested out of their hands, and that their elections, which had made them so considerable before, were hereafter to be made as the court should direct ; so that from henceforth little regard would be had to them ; and the usual practices in courting, or rather in corrupting them, would be no longer pursued. Thus all people were alarmed ; but few durst speak out, or complain openly : only the duke of Monmouth's agents made great use of this to inflame their party. It was said, here was a parliament to meet, that was not the choice and representative of the nation, and therefore was no parliament. So they upon this possessed all people with dreadful apprehensions, that a blow was now given to the constitution, which could not be remedied, but by an insurrection. It was resolved to bring up petitions against some elections, that were so indecently managed, that it seemed scarcely possible to excuse them ; but these were to be judged by a majority of men, who knew their own elections to be so faulty, that to secure themselves they would justify the rest : and fair dealing was not to be expected from those who were so deeply engaged in the like injustice.

All that was offered on the other hand to lay those fears, which so ill an appearance did raise, was, that it was probable the king would go into measures against France. All the offers of submission possible were made him by Spain, the empire, and the States.

The king had begun with the prince of Orange upon a hard point. He was not satisfied with his dismissing the duke of Monmouth, but wrote to him to break all those officers who had waited on him while he was in Holland. In this they had only followed the prince's example ; so it was hard to punish them for that, which he himself had encouraged. They had indeed shewn their affections to him so evidently, that the king wrote to the prince, that he could not trust to him, nor depend on his friendship, as long as such men served under him. This was of a hard digestion. Yet, since the breaking them could be easily made up by employing them afterwards, and by continuing their appointments to them, the prince complied in this likewise. And the king was so well pleased with it, that when bishop Turner complained of some things relating to the prince and princess, and proposed rougher methods, the king told him, it was absolutely necessary that the prince and he should continue in good correspondence. Of this Turner gave an account to the other bishops, and told them very solemnly, that the church would be in no hazard during the present reign ; but that they must take care to secure themselves against the prince of Orange, otherwise they would be in great danger.

The submission of the prince and the States to the king made some fancy, that this would overcome him. All people concluded, that it would soon appear whether bigotry, or a desire of glory was the prevailing passion ; since if he did not strike in with an alliance, that was then projected against France, it might be concluded that he was resolved to deliver himself up to his priests, and to sacrifice all to their ends. The season of the year made it to be hoped, that the first session of parliament would be so short, that much could not be done in it, but that when the revenue should be granted, other matters might be put off to a winter session. So that, if the parliament should not deliver up the nation in a heat all at once, but should leave half their work to another session, they might come under some management, and either see the interest of the nation in general, or their own in particular ; and manage their favours to the court in such a manner as to make themselves necessary, and not to give away too much at once, but be sparing in their bounty ; which they had learned so well in king Charles's time, that it was to be hoped they would soon fall into it, if they made not too much haste at their first setting out. So it was resolved not to force them on too hastily in their first session, to judge of any election, but to keep that matter entire for some time, till they should break into parties.

The coronation was set for St. George's day. Turner was ordered to preach the sermon ; and both king and queen resolved to have all done in the protestant form, and to assist in all the prayers : only the king would not receive the sacrament, which is always a part of the ceremony. In this certainly his priests dispensed with him, and he had such senses given him of the oath, that he either took it as unlawful with a resolution not to keep it, or he had a reserved meaning in his own mind. The crown was not well fitted for the king's head : it came down too far, and covered the upper part of his face. The canopy carried over him did also break. Some other smaller things happened that were looked on as ill omens : and his son by Mrs. Sedley died that day. The queen with the peccesses made a more graceful figure. The best thing in Turner's sermon was, that he set forth that part of Constantius Chlorus's history very handsomely, in which he tried who would be true to their religion, and reckoned that those would be faithfullest to himself who were truest to their God.

I must now say somewhat concerning myself. At this time I went out of England. Upon king Charles's death, I had desired leave to come and pay my duty to the king, by the marquis of Halifax. The king would not see me. So, since I was at that time in no sort of employment, not so much as allowed to preach any where, I resolved to go abroad. I saw we were likely to fall into great confusion; and were either to be rescued, in a way that I could not approve of, by the duke of Monmouth's means, or to be delivered up, by a meeting that had the face and name of a parliament. I thought the best thing for me was to go out of the way. The king approved of this, and consented to my going; but still refused to see me. So I was to go beyond sea, as to a voluntary exile. This gave me great credit with all the mal-contents: and I made the best use of it I could. I spoke very earnestly to the lord Delamer, to Mr. Hambden, and such others as I could meet with, who I feared might be drawn in by the agents of the duke of Monmouth. The king had not yet done that which would justify extreme counsels; a raw rebellion would be soon crushed, and give a colour for keeping up a standing army, or for bringing over a force from France. I perceived many thought the constitution was so broken into, by the elections of the house of commons, that they were disposed to put all to hazard. Yet most people thought the crisis was not so near as it proved to be.

The deliberations in Holland, among the English and Scotch that fled thither, came to ripen faster than was expected. Lord Argyle had been quiet ever since the disappointment in the year eighty-three. He had lived for most part in Friezland, but came often to Amsterdam, and met with the rest of his countrymen that lay concealed there: the chief of whom were the lord Melvill, sir Patrick Hume, and sir John Cochran. With these lord Argyle communicated all the advices that were sent him. He went on still with his first project. He said, he wanted only a sum of money to buy arms, and reckoned, that as soon as he was furnished with these, he might venture on Scotland. He resolved to go to his own country, where he hoped he could bring five thousand men together. And he reckoned that the western and southern counties were under such apprehensions, that without laying of matters, or having correspondence among them, they would all at once come about him, when he had gathered a good force together in his own country. There was a rich widow in Amsterdam, who was full of zeal: so she, hearing at what his designs stuck, sent to him, and furnished him with ten thousand pounds*. With this money he bought a stock of arms and ammunition, which was very dexterously managed by one that traded to Venice, as intended for the service of that republic. All was performed with great secrecy, and put on board. They had sharp debates among them about the course they were to hold. He was for sailing round Scotland to his own country. Hume was for the shorter passage: the other was a long navigation, and subject to great accidents. Argyle said, the fastnesses of his own country made that to be the safer place to gather men together. He presumed so far on his own power, and on his management hitherto, that he took much upon him: so that the rest were often on the point of breaking with him.

The duke of Monmouth came secretly to them, and made up all their quarrels. He would willingly have gone with them himself; but Argyle did not offer him the command: on the contrary he pressed him to make an impression on England at the same time. This was not possible; for the duke of Monmouth had yet made no preparations. So he was hurried into a fatal undertaking before things were in any sort ready for it. He had been indeed much pressed to the same thing by Wade, Ferguson, and some others about him, but chiefly by the lord Grey, and the lady Wentworth, who followed him to Brussels desperately in love with him. And both he and she came to fancy, that he being married to his duchess, while he was indeed of the age of consent, but not capable of a free one, the marriage was null: so they lived together: and she had heated both herself and him with such enthusiastical conceits, that they fancied what they did was approved of God. With this small council he took his measures. Fletcher, a Scotch gentleman of great parts, and many virtues, but a most violent republican, and extravagantly passionate, did not like Argyle's scheme: so he resolved to run fortunes with the duke of Monmouth. He told me, that all the English among them were still pressing the duke of Monmouth to venture. They said, all the west of England would come about him, as soon as he appeared, as they had done five or six years ago. They reckoned there would be no fighting, but that the guards, and others who adhered to the king, would melt to nothing before him. They fancied the city of London would be in such a disposition to revolt, that, if he should land in the west, the king would be in great perplexity. He could not have two armies; and his fear of tumults near his person would oblige him to keep such a force about him, that he would not be able to send any against him. So they reckoned he would have time to form an army, and in a little while be in a condition to seek out the king, and fight him on equal terms.

This appeared a mad and desperate undertaking to the duke of Monmouth himself. He knew what a weak body a rabble was, and how unable to deal with troops long trained. He had neither money, nor officers, and no encouragement from the men of estates and interest in the country. It seemed too early yet to venture. It was the throwing away all his hopes in one day. Fletcher, how vehemently soever he was set on the design in general, yet saw nothing in this scheme that gave any hopes: so he argued much against it. And he said to me, that the duke of Monmouth was pushed on to it against his own sense and reason: but he could not refuse to hazard his person, when others were so forward. Lord Grey said, that Henry the seventh landed with a smaller number, and succeeded. Fletcher answered, he was sure of several of the nobility, who were little princes in those days. Ferguson in his enthusiastical way said, it was a good cause, and that God would not leave them unless they left him. And though the duke of Monmouth's course of life gave him no great reason to hope that God would appear signally for him, yet even he came to talk enthusiastically on the subject. But Argyle's going, and the promise he had made of coming to England with all possible haste, had so fixed him, that, all further deliberations being laid aside, he pawned a parcel of jewels, and bought up arms; and they were put aboard a ship freighted for Spain.

King James was so intent upon the pomp of his coronation, that for some weeks more important matters were not thought on. Both Argyle's and Monmouth's people were so true to them, that nothing was discovered by any of them. Yet some days after Argyle had sailed, the king knew of it: for the night before I left London, the earl of Arran came to me, and told me, the king had an advertisement of it that very day. I saw it was fit for me to make haste; otherwise I might have been seized on, if it had been only to put the affront on me, of being suspected of holding correspondence with traitors.

Argyle had a very prosperous voyage. He sent out a boat at Orkney to get intelligence, and to take prisoners. This had no other effect, but that it gave intelligence where he was: and the wind chopping, he was obliged to sail away, and leave his men to mercy. The winds were very favourable, and turned as his occasions required: so that in a very few days he arrived in Argyleshire. The misunderstandings between him and Hume grew very high; for he carried all things with an air of authority, that was not easy to those who were setting up for liberty. At his landing he found, that the early notice the council had of his designs had spoiled his whole scheme; for they had brought in all the gentlemen of his country to Edinburgh, which saved them, though it helped on his ruin. Yet he got above five-and-twenty hundred men to come to him. If with these he had immediately gone over to the western counties of Ayr and Renfrew, he might have given the government much trouble. But he lingered too long, hoping still to have brought more of his Highlanders together. He reckoned these were sure to him, and would obey him blindfold: whereas if he had gone out of his own country with a small force, those who might have come in to his assistance might also have disputed his authority: and he could not bear contradiction. Much time was by this means lost: and all the country was summoned to come out against him. At last he crossed an arm of the sea, and landed in the isle of Bute; where he spent twelve days more, till he had eat up that island, pretending still, that he hoped to be joined by more of his Highlanders.

He had left his arms in a castle, with such a guard as he could spare; but they were routed by a party of the king's forces: and with this he lost both heart and hope. And then, apprehending that all was gone, he put himself in a disguise, and had almost escaped; but he was taken. A body of gentlemen that had followed him stood better to it, and forced their way through; so that the greater part of them escaped. Some of these were taken: the chief of them were sir John Cochran, Ayloffe, and Rumbold. These two last were Englishmen: but I knew not upon what motive it was, that they chose rather to run fortunes with Argyle, than with the duke of Monmouth. Thus was this rebellion brought to a speedy end, with the effusion of very little blood. Nor was there much shed in the way of justice, for it was considered, that the Highlanders were under such ties by their tenure, that it was somewhat excusable in them to follow their lord. Most of the gentlemen were brought in by order of council to Edinburgh, which preserved them. One of those that were with Argyle, by a great presence of mind, got to Carlisle, where he called for post horses; and said, he was sent by the general to carry the good news by word of mouth to the king. And so he got to London, and there he found a way to get beyond sea.

Argyle was brought into Edinburgh: he expressed even a cheerful calm under all his misfortunes. He justified all he had done; for, he said, he was unjustly attainted: that had dissolved his allegiance: so it was justice to himself and his family, to endeavour to recover what was so wrongfully taken from him. He also thought, that no allegiance was due to the king, till he had taken the oath which the law prescribed to be taken by our kings at their coronation, or the receipt of their princely dignity. He desired that Mr. Charteris might be ordered to attend upon him; which was granted. When he came to him, he told him he was satisfied in conscience with the lawfulness of what he had done, and therefore desired he would not disturb him with any discourse on that subject. The other, after he had told him his sense of the matter, complied easily with this. So all that remained was to prepare him to die, in which he expressed an unshaken firmness. The duke of Queensbury examined him in private. He said, he had not laid his business with any in Scotland: he had only found credit with a person that lent him money; upon which he had trusted, perhaps too much, to the dispositions of the people, sharpened by their administration. When the day of his execution came, Mr. Charteris happened to come to him as he was ending dinner: he said to him pleasantly, "serò venientibus ossa." He prayed often with him, and by himself, and went to the scaffold with great serenity. He had complained of the duke of Monmouth much, for delaying his coming so long after him, and for assuming the name of king; both which, he said, were contrary to their agreement at parting. Thus he died, pitied by all. His death, being pursuant to the sentence passed three years before, of which mention was made, was looked on as no better than murder. But his conduct in this matter was made up of so many errors, that it appeared he was not made for designs of this kind.

Ayloffe had a mind to prevent the course of justice, and having got a penknife into his hands gave himself several stabs; and thinking he was certainly a dead man, he cried out, and said, now he defied his enemies. Yet he had not pierced his guts; so his wounds were not mortal: and it being believed that he could make great discoveries, he was brought up to London.

Rumbold was he that dwelt in Rye-house, where it was pretended the plot was laid for murdering the late and the present king. He denied the truth of that conspiracy. He owned, he thought the prince was as much tied to the people, as the people were to the prince; and that, when a king departed from the legal measures of government, the people had a right to assert their liberties, and to restrain him. He did not deny but that he had heard many propositions at West's chambers about killing the two brothers; and upon that he had said, it could have been easily executed near his house; upon which some discourse had followed, how it might have been managed. But, he said, it was only talk, and that nothing was either laid, or so much as resolved on. He said, he was not for a commonwealth, but for kingly government, according to the laws of England; but he did not think that the king had his authority by any divine right, which he expressed in rough, but significant words. He said, he did not believe that God had made the greater part of mankind with saddles on their backs and bridles in their mouths, and some few booted and spurred to ride the rest.

Cochran had a rich father, the earl of Dundonald; and he offered the priests 5,000*l.* to save his son. They wanted a stock of money for managing their designs; so they interposed so effectually, that the bargain was made. But, to cover it, Cochran petitioned the council that he might be sent to the king; for he had some secrets of great importance, which were not fit to be communicated to any but to the king himself. He was upon that brought up to London; and, after he had been for some time in private with the king, the matters he had discovered were said to be of such importance, that in consideration of that the king pardoned him. It was said, he had discovered all their negotiations with the elector of Brandenburg, and the prince of Orange. But this was a pretence only given out to conceal the bargain; for the prince told me, he had never once seen him. The secret of this came to be known soon after.

When Ayloffé was brought up to London, the king examined him, but could draw nothing from him, but one severe repartee. He being sullen, and refusing to discover any thing, the king said to him; "Mr. Ayloffé, you know it is in my power to pardon you, therefore say that which may deserve it." It was said that he answered, that though it was in his power, yet it was not in his nature to pardon. He was nephew to the old earl of Clarendon by marriage; for Ayloffé's aunt was his first wife, but she had no children. It was thought, that the nearness of his relation to the king's children might have moved him to pardon him, which would have been the most effectual confutation of his bold repartee: but he suffered with the rest.

Immediately after Argyle's execution, a parliament was held in Scotland. Upon king Charles's death, the marquis of Queensbury, soon after made a duke, and the earl of Perth, came to court. The duke of Queensbury told the king, that if he had any thoughts of changing the established religion, he could not make any one step with him in that matter. The king seemed to receive this very kindly from him; and assured him, he had no such intention, but that he would have a parliament called, to which he should go his commissioner, and give all possible assurances in the matter of religion, and get the revenue to be settled, and such other laws to be passed as might be necessary for the common safety. The duke of Queensbury pressed the earl of Perth to speak in the same strain to the king. But, though he pretended to be still a protestant, yet he could not prevail on him to speak in so positive a style. I had not then left London; so the duke sent me word of this, and seemed so fully satisfied with it, that he thought all would be safe. So he prepared instructions by which both the revenue and the king's authority were to be carried very high. He has often since that time told me, that the king made those promises to him in so frank and hearty a manner, that he concluded it was impossible for him to be acting a part. Therefore he always believed that the priests gave him leave to promise every thing, and that he did it very sincerely; but that afterwards they pretended they had a power to dissolve the obligation of all oaths and promises; since nothing could be more open and free than his way of expressing himself was, though afterwards he had no sort of regard to any of the promises he then made. The Test had been the king's own act while he was in Scotland. So he thought the putting that on all persons would be the most acceptable method, as well as the most effectual, for securing the protestant religion. Therefore he proposed an instruction obliging all people to take the Test, not only to qualify them for public employments, but that all those to whom the council should tender it should be bound to take it, under the pain of treason: and this was granted. He also projected many other severe laws, that left an arbitrary power in the privy council. And, as he was naturally violent and imperious in his own temper, so he saw the king's inclinations to those methods, and hoped to have recommended himself effectually, by being instrumental in setting up an absolute and despotic form of government. But he found afterwards how he had deceived himself, in thinking that any thing, but the delivering up his religion, could be acceptable long. And he saw, after he had prepared a cruel scheme of government, other men were entrusted with the management of it: and it had almost proved fatal to himself.

The parliament of Scotland sat not long. No opposition was made. The duke of Queensbury gave very full assurances in the point of religion, that the king would never alter it, but would maintain it, as it was established by law. And in confirmation of them he proposed that act enjoining the Test, which was passed, and was looked on as a full security; though it was very probable, that all the use that the council would make of this discretionary power lodged with them, would be only to tender the Test to those that might scruple it on other accounts, but that it would be offered to none of the church of Rome. In return for this the parliament gave the king for life, all the revenue that had been given to his brother; and with that some additional taxes were given.

Other severe laws were also passed. By one of these an inquisition was upon the matter set up. All persons were required, under the pain of treason, to answer to all such questions as should be put to them by the privy council. This put all men under great apprehensions, since upon this act an inquisition might have been grafted, as soon as the king pleased. Another act was only in one particular case; but it was a crying one, and so deserves to be remembered.

When Carstairs was put to the torture, and came to capitulate in order to the making a discovery, he got a promise from the council, that no use should be made of his deposition against any person whatsoever. He in his deposition said somewhat that brought sir Hugh Campbell and his son under the guilt of treason, who had been taken up in London two years before, and were kept in prison all this while. The earl of Melfort got the promise of his estate, which was about 1,000*l.* a year, as soon as he should be convicted of high treason. So an act was brought in, which was to last only six weeks; and enacted, that if within that time any of the privy council would depose that any man was proved to be guilty of high treason, he should upon such a proof be attainted. Upon which, as soon as the act was passed, four of the privy council stood up, and affirmed that the Campbells were proved by Carstairs's deposition to be guilty. Upon this both father and son were brought to the bar, to see what they had to say, why the sentence should not be executed. The old gentleman, then near eighty, seeing the ruin of his family was determined, and that he was condemned in so unusual a manner, took courage, and said, the oppression they had been under had driven them to despair, and made them think how they might secure their lives and fortunes: upon this he went to London, and had some meetings with Baillie, and others: that one was sent to Scotland to hinder all risings: that an oath of secrecy was indeed offered, but was never taken upon all this. So it was pretended he had confessed the crime, and by a shew of mercy they were pardoned: but the earl of Melfort possessed himself of their estate. The old gentleman died soon after. And very probably his death was hastened by his long and rigorous imprisonment, and this unexampled conclusion of it; which was so universally condemned, that when the news of it was written to foreign parts, it was not easy to make people believe it possible.

But now the sitting of the parliament of England came on. And, as a preparation to it, Oates was convicted of perjury, upon the evidence of the witnesses from St. Omer's, who had been brought over before to discredit his testimony. Now juries were so prepared, as to believe more easily than formerly. So he was condemned to have his priestly habit taken from him, to be a prisoner for life, to be set on the pillory in all the public places of the city, and ever after that to be set on the pillory four times a year, and to be whipped by the common hangman from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and the next from Newgate to Tyburn; which was executed with so much rigour, that his back seemed to be all over flayed. This was thought too little if he was guilty, and too much if innocent, and was illegal in all the parts of it: for as the secular court could not order the ecclesiastical habit to be taken from him, so to condemn a man to a perpetual imprisonment was not in the power of the court: and the extreme rigour of such whipping was without a precedent. Yet he, who was an original in all things, bore this with a constancy that amazed all those who saw it. So that this treatment did rather raise his reputation, than sink it.

And, that I may join things of the same sort together, though they were transacted at some distance of time, Dangerfield, another of the witnesses in the popish plot, was also found guilty of perjury, and had the same punishment: but it had a more terrible conclusion; for a brutal student of the law, who had no private quarrel with him, but was only transported with the heat of that time, struck him over the head with his cane, as he got his last lash. This hit him so fatally, that he died of it immediately. The person was apprehended, and the king left him to the law : and, though great intercession was made for him, the king would not interpose. So he was hanged for it *.

At last the parliament met. The king in his speech repeated that, which he had said to the council upon his first accession to the throne. He told them, some might think the keeping him low would be the surest way to have frequent parliaments : but they should find the contrary, that the using him well would be the best argument to persuade him to meet them often. This was put in to prevent a motion, which was a little talked of abroad, but none would venture on it within doors, that it was safest to grant the revenue only for a term of years.

The revenue was granted for life, and every thing else that was asked, with such a profusion, that the house was more forward to give, than the king was to ask : to which the king thought fit to put a stop by a message, intimating that he desired no more money that session. And yet this forwardness to give in such a reign, was set on by Musgrave and others, who pretended afterwards, when money was asked for just and necessary ends, to be frugal patriots, and to be careful managers of the public treasure.

As for religion, some began to propose a new and firmer security to it. But all the courtiers ran out into eloquent harangues on that subject ; and pressed a vote, that they took the king's word in that matter, and would trust to it ; and that this should be signified in an address to him. This would bind the king in point of honour, and gain his heart so entirely, that it would be a tie above all laws whatsoever. And the tide ran so strong that way, that the house went into it without opposition.

The lord Preston, who had been for some years envoy in France, was brought over, and set up to be a manager in the house of commons. He told them the reputation of the nation was beginning to rise very high all Europe over, under a prince whose name spread terror everywhere. And if this was confirmed by the entire confidence of his parliament, even in the tenderest matters, it would give such a turn to the affairs of Europe, that England would again hold the balance, and their king would be the arbiter of Europe. This was seconded by all the court flatterers. So in their address to the king, thanking him for his speech, they told him they trusted to him so entirely, that they relied on his word, and thought themselves and their religion safe, since he had promised it to them.

When this was settled, the petitions concerning the elections were presented. Upon those Seymour spoke very high, and with much weight. He said, the complaints of the irregularities in elections were so great, that many doubted whether this was a true representative of the nation or not. He said, little equity was expected upon petitions, where so many were too guilty to judge justly and impartially. He said it concerned them to look to these ; for if the nation saw no justice was to be expected from them, other methods would be found, in which they might come to suffer that justice which they would not do. He was a haughty man, and would not communicate his design in making this motion to any ; so all were surprised with it, but none seconded it. This had no effect, not so much as to draw on a debate.

The courtiers were projecting many laws to ruin all who opposed their designs. The most important of these was an act declaring treasons during that reign, by which words were to be made treason. And the clause was so drawn, that anything said to disparage the king's person or government was made treason : within which everything said to the dishonour of the king's religion would have been comprehended, as judges and juries were then modelled. This was chiefly opposed by serjeant Maynard, who, in a very grave speech, laid open the * Burnet is not quite accurate in the account of this melancholy catastrophe ; for there is reason to believe that the unfeeling law student alluded to, was punished to allay the popular discontent, rather than because his offence merited the penalty of death. It seems at the worst to have been only manslaughter. Mr. Francis, a Gray's-Inn student, asked Dangerfield, after his flogging, "how he liked his morning's heat?" Dangerfield, in return, spat in his face, which Francis as hastily resented by thrusting at him with a small cane he held in his hand ;

the end unfortunately pierced the sufferer's eye. Death was not the immediate consequence, but he lived so long afterwards in Newgate as to raise a doubt with the surgeons who attended the coroner's inquest, whether the flogging was not the cause of his death. Francis was tried and condemned to be executed : intercessions for his life would perhaps have succeeded, if Jeffreys had not declared that "Francis must die, for the rabble was thoroughly heated."—Higgon's Remarks on Burnet, 444 ; Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys, 262.

inconvenience of making words treason : they were often ill heard, and ill understood, and were apt to be miscredited by a very small variation ; men in passion, or in drink, might say things they never intended ; therefore, he hoped they would keep to the law of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third, by which an overt-act was made the necessary proof of ill intentions. And when others insisted, that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth spake," he brought the instance of our Saviour's words, "Destroy this temple ;" and showed how near "the temple" was to "this temple," pronouncing it in Syriac, so that the difference was almost imperceptible. There was nothing more innocent than these words, as our Saviour meant, and spoke them ; but nothing was more criminal than the setting on a multitude to destroy the temple. This made some impression at that time. But if the duke of Monmouth's landing had not brought the session to an early conclusion, that, and everything else which the officious courtiers were projecting, would have certainly passed.

The most important business that was before the house of lords was the reversing the attainder of the lord Stafford. It was said for it, that the witnesses were now convicted of perjury, and therefore the restoring the blood that was tainted by their evidence was a just reparation. The proceedings in the matter of the popish plot were chiefly founded on Oates's discovery, which was now judged to be a thread of perjury. This stuck with the lords, and would not go down. Yet they did justice both to the popish lords then in the Tower, and to the earl of Danby, who moved the house of lords, that they might either be brought to their trial, or be set at liberty. This was sent by the lords to the house of commons, who returned answer, that they did not think fit to insist on the impeachments. So upon that they were discharged of them, and set at liberty. Yet, though both houses agreed in this of prosecuting the popish plot no further, the lords had no mind to reverse and condemn past proceedings.

But while all these things were in agitation, the duke of Monmouth's landing brought the session to a conclusion. As soon as lord Argyle sailed for Scotland, he set about his design with as much haste as was possible. Arms were bought, and a ship was freighted for Bilboa in Spain. The duke of Monmouth pawned all his jewels ; but these could not raise much, and no money was sent him out of England. So he was hurried into an ill designed invasion. The whole company consisted but of eighty-two persons. They were all faithful to one another. But some spies, whom Skelton, the new envoy, set on work, sent him the notice of a suspected ship sailing out of Amsterdam with arms. Skelton neither understood the laws of Holland, nor advised with those who did ; otherwise he would have carried with him an order from the admiralty of Holland, that sat at the Hague, to be made use of as the occasion should require. When he came to Amsterdam, and applied himself to the magistrates there, desiring them to stop and search the ship that he named, they found the ship was already sailed out of their port, and their jurisdiction went no further. So he was forced to send to the admiralty at the Hague. But those on board, hearing what he was come for, made all possible haste, and the wind favouring them, they got out of the Texel before the order desired could be brought from the Hague.

After a prosperous course, the duke landed at Lyme, in Dorsetshire ; and he with his small company came ashore with some order, but with too much daylight, which discovered how few they were.

The alarm was brought hot to London ; where, upon the general report and belief of the thing, an act of attainder passed both houses in one day : some small opposition being made by the earl of Anglesey, because the evidence did not seem clear enough for so severe a sentence, which was grounded on the notoriety of the thing. The sum of 5000*l.* was set on his head. And with that the session of parliament ended ; which was no small happiness to the nation, such a body of men being dismissed with doing so little hurt. The duke of Monmouth's manifesto was long, and ill penned ; full of much black and dull malice. It was plainly Ferguson's style, which was both tedious and fulsome. It charged the king with the burning of London, the popish plot, Godfrey's murder, and the earl of Essex's death : and to crown all, it was pretended, that the late king was poisoned by his orders. It was set forth, that the king's religion made him incapable of the crown : that three subsequent houses of commons had voted his exclusion : the taking away the old charters, and all the hard things done in the last reign were laid to his charge: the elections of the present parliament were also set forth very odiously, with great indecency of style: the nation was also appealed to, when met in a free parliament, to judge of the duke's own pretensions: and all sort of liberty, both in temporals and spirituals, was promised to persons of all persuasions.

Upon the duke of Monmouth's landing, many of the country people came in to join him, but very few of the gentry. He had quickly men enough about him to use all his arms. The duke of Albemarle, as lord-lieutenant of Devonshire, was sent down to raise the militia, and with them to make head against him. But their ill affection appeared very evidently: many deserted, and all were cold in the service. The duke of Monmouth had the whole country open to him for almost a fortnight, during which time he was very diligent in training and animating his men. His own behaviour was so gentle and obliging, that he was master of all their hearts, as much as was possible. But he quickly found what it was to be at the head of undisciplined men, that knew nothing of war, and that were not to be used with rigour. Soon after their landing, lord Grey was sent out with a small party. He saw a few of the militia, and he ran for it; but his men stood, and the militia ran from them. Lord Grey brought a false alarm, that was soon found to be so; for the men whom their leader had abandoned came back in good order. The duke of Monmouth was struck with this, when he found that the person on whom he depended most, and for whom he designed the command of the horse, had already made himself infamous by his cowardice. He intended to join Fletcher with him in that command; but an unhappy accident made it not convenient to keep him longer about him. He sent him out on another party, and he, not being yet furnished with a horse, took the horse of one who had brought in a great body of men from Taunton. He was not in the way; so Fletcher, not seeing him to ask his leave, thought that all things were to be in common among them that would advance the service. After Fletcher had ridden about as he was ordered, as he returned, the owner of the horse he rode on, who was a rough and ill-bred man, reproached him in very injurious terms, for taking out his horse without his leave. Fletcher bore this longer than could have been expected from one of his impetuous temper. But the other persisted in giving him foul language, and offered a switch or a cane; upon which he discharged his pistol at him, and fatally shot him dead. He went and gave the duke of Monmouth an account of this, who saw it was impossible to keep him longer about him, without disgusting and losing the country people, who were coming in a body to demand justice. So he advised him to go aboard the ship and to sail on to Spain, whither she was bound. By this means he was preserved for that time.

Ferguson ran among the people with all the fury of an enraged man that affected to pass for an enthusiast, though all his performances that way were forced and dry. The duke of Monmouth's great error was, that he did not in the first heat venture on some hardy action, and then march either to Exeter or Bristol; where as he would have found much wealth, so he would have gained some reputation by it. But he lingered in exercising his men, and stayed too long in the neighbourhood of Lyme.

By this means the king had time both to bring troops out of Scotland, after Argyle was taken, and to send to Holland for the English and Scotch regiments that were in the service of the States; which the prince sent over very readily, and offered his own person and a greater force, if it was necessary. The king received this with great expressions of acknowledgment and kindness. It was very visible that he was much distracted in his thoughts, and that what appearance of courage soever he might put on, he was inwardly full of apprehensions and fears. He durst not accept of the offer of assistance that the French made him; for by that he would have lost the hearts of the English nation. And he had no mind to be much obliged to the prince of Orange, or to let him into his counsels or affairs. Prince George committed a great error in not asking the command of the army: for the command, how much soever he might have been bound to the counsels of others, would have given him some lustre; whereas his staying at home in such time of danger brought him under much neglect.

The king could not choose worse than he did, when he gave the command to the earl of Feversham, who was a Frenchman by birth, and nephew to M. de Turenne. Both his brothers changing religion, though he continued still a protestant, made that his religion was not much trusted to. He was an honest, brave and good natured man, but weak to a degree not easy to be conceived. And he conducted matters so ill, that every step he made was likely to prove fatal to the king's service. He had no parties abroad : he got no intelligence : and was almost surprised, and likely to be defeated, when he seemed to be under no apprehension, but was a-bed without any care or order. So, that if the duke of Monmouth had got but a very small number of good soldiers about him, the king's affairs would have fallen into great disorder*.

The duke of Monmouth had almost surprised lord Feversham and all about him, while they were a-bed. He got in between two bodies, into which the army lay divided. He now saw his error in lingering so long. He began to want bread, and to be so straitened, that there was a necessity of pushing for a speedy decision. He was so misled in his march that he lost an hour's time ; and when he came near the army, there was an inconsiderable ditch : in the passing which he lost so much more time, that the officers had leisure to rise and be dressed, now they had the alarm ; and they put themselves in order. Yet the duke of Monmouth's foot stood longer, and fought better than could have been expected : especially when the small body of horse they had ran upon the first charge ; the blame of which was cast upon lord Grey. The foot being thus forsaken, and galled by the cannon, did run at last. About a thousand of them were killed on the spot, and fifteen hundred were taken prisoners. Their numbers when fullest were between five and six thousand. The duke of Monmouth left the field too soon for a man of courage, who had such high pretensions ; for a few days before he had suffered himself to be called king, which did him no service, even among those that followed him. He rode towards Dorsetshire, and when his horse could carry him no further, he changed clothes with a shepherd, and went as far as his legs could carry him, being accompanied only with a German, whom he had brought over with him. At last, when he could go no further, he lay down in a field where there was hay and straw, with which they covered themselves, so that they hoped to lie there unseen till night. Parties went out on all hands to take prisoners. The shepherd was found by the lord Lumley in the duke of Monmouth's clothes ; so this put him on his track, and having some dogs with them they followed the scent, and came to the place, where the German was first discovered. And he immediately pointed to the place where the duke of Monmouth lay. So he was taken in a very indecent dress and posture†.

His body was quite sunk with fatigue, and his mind was now so low, that he begged his life in a manner that agreed ill with the courage of the former parts of it. He called for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote to the earl of Feversham, and both to the queen and the queen dowager, to intercede with the king for his life. The king's temper, as well as his interest, made it so impossible to hope for that, that it showed a great meanness in him to ask it in such terms as he used in his letters. He was carried up to Whitehall, where the king examined him in person ; which was thought very indecent, since he was resolved not to pardon him. He made new and unbecoming submissions, and insinuated a readiness to change his religion ; for he said the king knew what his first education was in religion. There were no discoveries to be got from him ; for the attempt was too rash to be well concerted, or to be so deep laid that many were involved in the guilt of it. He was examined on Monday, and orders were given for his execution on Wednesday‡.

* Lewis Duras was marquis de Blanquefort in France, but naturalised here in 1665 ; created baron Duras of Holdenby in 1672, and earl of Feversham in 1676. He was lord chamberlain to the queen of Charles the Second, and, even after her retirement to Portugal, continued to have the chief management of her affairs ; so that he was sometimes designated the "king-dowager." He was supple and insinuating, so that he retained the court favour, even in the two following reigns. He will be noticed in future pages.

† Sir John Reresby and other authorities do not give so unfavourable an account of the duke of Monmouth's proceedings, but consider him to have conducted himself with the discretion of a good general. James said, in the hearing of Reresby, that Monmouth had "not made one false step." The only companion with him when taken was count Horn. That he was worn down by fatigue is not surprising, if Reresby's account that he was not in bed for three nights, is true.—Reresby's Memoirs.

‡ When Monmouth fell into the hands of king James's troops, on the 8th of July, 1685, he immediately wrote to the king, earnestly requesting an interview, and assuring him that he had something to impart of great importance, and which could only be related in person. On

Turner and Ken, the bishops of Ely and of Bath and Wells, were ordered to wait on him. But he called for Dr. Tennison. The bishops studied to convince him of the sin of rebellion. He answered, he was sorry for the blood that was shed in it; but he did not seem to repent of the design. Yet he confessed that his father had often told him, that there was no truth in the reports of his having married his mother. This he set under his hand, probably for his children's sake, who were then prisoners in the Tower, that so they might not be ill used on his account. He showed a great neglect of his duchess*. And her resentments for his course of life with the lady Wentworth wrought so much on her, that, though he desired to speak privately with her, she would have witnesses to hear all that passed, to justify her-the following day he wrote to the queen-dowager (vide Ellis's Letters illustrative of English Hist. iii.), and the following to the earl of Rochester:

"From Ringwood, the 9th of July, 1685.

"My Lord,—Having had some proofs of your kindness when I was last at Whitehall, makes me hope now that you will not refuse interceding for me with the king, being I now, though too late, see how I have been misled; were I not clearly convinced of that, I would rather die a thousand deaths than say what I do. I writ yesterday to the king, and the chief business of my letter was to desire to speak to him; for I have that to say to him that I am sure will set him at quiet for ever; I am sure the whole study of my life shall hereafter be how to serve him; and I am sure that which I can do is more worth than taking my life away; and I am confident, if I may be so happy to speak to him, he will himself be convinced of it, being I can give him such infallible proofs of my truth to him, that though I would alter, it would not be in my power to do it. This which I have now said, I hope will be enough to encourage your lordship to show me your favour, which I do earnestly desire of you, and hope that you have so much generosity as not to refuse it. I hope, my lord, and I make no doubt of it, that you will not have cause to repent having saved my life, which I am sure you can do a great deal in it, if you please; being it obliges me for ever to be entirely yours, which I shall ever be, as long as I have life.

"MONMOUTH.

"For the Earl of Rochester, Lord High Treasurer of England."

—Singer's Clarendon Corr. i. 143.

There have been two conjectures respecting the intelligence that Monmouth wished to communicate to James. The one, that he was encouraged to the invasion by the prince of Orange, is refuted by all the evidence we possess—the other, that he had such an encourager in the intriguing earl of Sunderland, is much better substantiated. Among the Clarendon Papers is a document confirming this last opinion. When returned to the Tower, the hauteur of the duke gave way, and he again wrote to the king. Tradition says that this revealed the treachery of Sunderland; but this communication never reached the king. Colonel Scott gave of this the following narrative to a friend.—"In the year 1734, I was in company with colonel Scott, at Boulogne-sur-Mer, in France, when the colonel called me to him, and said, 'Mr. Bowdler, you are a young man and I am an old one, I will tell you something worth remembering. When the duke of Monmouth was in the Tower, under sentence of death, I had the command of the guard there; and one morning the duke desired me to let him have pen, ink, and paper, for he wanted to write to the king. He wrote a very long letter, and, when he had sealed it, he desired me to give him my word of honour that I would carry that letter to the king, and deliver it into no hands but his. I told him I would most willingly do it, if it was in my power, but that my orders were, not to stir from him till his execution; and, therefore, I dared not leave the Tower. At this he expressed great uneasiness, saying, he could have depended on my honour; but at length asked me if there was any officer in that place on whose fidelity I could rely. I told him that captain — was one on whom I would willingly confide, in anything on which my whole life depended, and more I could not say of any man. The duke desired he might be called. When he was come, the duke told him the affair. He promised on his word and honour that he would deliver the letter to no person whatever, but to the king only. Accordingly, he went immediately to court, and being come near the king's closet, took the letter out of his pocket to give to the king. Just then lord Sunderland came out of the closet, and, seeing him, asked him what he had in his hand; he said it was a letter from the duke of Monmouth, which he was going to give to the king. Lord Sunderland said, 'Give it to me, I will carry it to him.' 'No, my lord,' said the captain, 'I pawned my honour to the duke, that I would deliver the letter to no man but the king himself.' 'But,' said lord Sunderland, 'the king is putting on his shirt, and you cannot be admitted into the closet; but the door shall stand so far open that you shall see me give it to him.' After many words, lord Sunderland prevailed on the captain to give him the letter, and his lordship went into the closet with it. After the Revolution, colonel Scott, who followed the fortunes of King James, going one day to see the king at dinner, at St. Germaine, in France, the king called him to him, and said, 'Colonel Scott, I have lately heard a thing that I want to know from you whether it is true.' The king then related the story, and the colonel assured him that what his majesty had been told was exactly true. Upon this the king then said, 'Colonel Scott, as I am a living man, I never saw that letter, nor did I ever hear of it till within these few days.'"—Singer's Clarendon Corr. i. 144.

No one can hesitate in agreeing that the king ought never to have admitted Monmouth to his presence, unless he intended to pardon him. That Monmouth did not act heroically at this interview is perhaps true. Reresby says that he heard the king relate that the duke confessed his error, threw the blame on the earl of Argyle and Ferguson, who had incited him to the invasion; said that he assumed the style of king to induce the gentry to join him; and begged for pardon on his knees — (Reresby's Memoirs.) That the king could relate all this, knowing that at the conclusion he coldly left the offender, his own nephew, to die on the scaffold, brands him indelibly as a heartless monster.—See Dalrymple's Memoirs; James's Memoirs; Rose's Observations; Clarke's Life of James, from the Stuart Papers, &c.

* This is decidedly contradicted by a MS. belonging to the Buccleugh family, and quoted by Mr. Rose in the Appendix to his "Observations" on Mr. Fox's History of James the Second. The last farewell of Monmouth and his wife is there described as being most tender. He who is standing within a day's space of death would surely wish for forgiveness, and might readily be forgiven.

self, and to preserve her family. They parted very coldly. He only recommended to her the breeding their children in the protestant religion. The bishops continued still to press on him a deep sense of the sin of rebellion; at which he grew so uneasy, that he desired them to speak to him of other matters. They next charged him with the sin of living with the lady Wentworth as he had done. In that he justified himself: he had married his duchess too young to give a true consent. He said, that lady was a pious, worthy woman, and that he had never lived so well in all respects, as since his engagements with her*. All the pains they took to convince him of the unlawfulness of that course of life had no effect. They did certainly very well in discharging their consciences, and speaking so plainly to him; but they did very ill to talk so much of this matter, and to make it so public as they did: for divines ought not to repeat what they say to dying penitents, no more than what the penitents say to them. By this means the duke of Monmouth had little satisfaction in them, and they had as little in him.

He was much better pleased with Dr. Tension, who did very plainly speak to him with relation to his public actings, and to his course of life; but he did it in a softer and less peremptory manner. And having said all that he thought proper, he left those points, in which he saw he could not convince him, to his own conscience, and turned to other things fit to be laid before a dying man. The duke begged one day more of life with such repeated earnestness, that as the king was much blamed for denying so small a favour, so it gave occasion to others to believe, that he had some hope from astrologers, that, if he outlived that day, he might have a better fate. As long as he fancied there was any hope, he was too much unsettled in his mind to be capable of anything.

But when he saw all was to no purpose, and that he must die, he complained a little that his death was hurried on so fast. But all on the sudden he came into a composure of mind that surprised all that saw it. There was no affectation in it. His whole behaviour was easy and calm, not without a decent cheerfulness. He prayed God to forgive all his sins, unknown as well as known. He seemed confident of the mercies of God, and that he was going to be happy with him. And he went to the place of execution on Tower Hill with an air of undisturbed courage that was grave and composed. He said little there: only that he was sorry for the blood that was shed; but he had ever meant well to the nation. When he saw the axe, he touched it, and said it was not sharp enough. He gave the hangman but half the reward he intended; and said, if he cut off his head cleverly, and not so butcherly as he did the lord Russell's, his man would give him the rest. The executioner was in great disorder, trembling all over; so he gave him two or three strokes without being able to finish the matter, and then flung the axe out of his hand. But the sheriff forced him to take it up; and at three or four more strokes he severed his head from his body; and both were presently buried in the chapel of the Tower. Thus lived and died this unfortunate young man. He had several good qualities in him, and some that were as bad. He was soft and gentle even to excess, and too easy to those who had credit with him. He was both sincere and good natured, and understood war well. But he was too much given to pleasure and to favourites†.

The lord Grey it was thought would go next. But he had a great estate that by his death was to go over to his brother. So the court resolv'd to preserve him till he should be brought to compound for his life. The earl of Rochester had 16,000*l.* of him. Others had smaller shares. He was likewise obliged to tell all he knew, and to be a witness in order to the conviction of others, but with this assurance, that nobody should die upon his evidence‡.

* Henrietta Maria Wentworth was the only daughter and heiress of the earl of Cleveland.—Reresby's Memoirs.

† A still more favourable and interesting character of this unfortunate nobleman is given with some letters, and extracts from his "Diary," in Wellwood's Memoirs. Reresby says that many charms and spells were found in his pockets; a fact we may readily believe when we know that then almost every one believed in astrology and witchcraft. Colonel Legge was in the coach with him when conducted to London, and had orders to put him to death if there was any danger of his escape. The colonel took from the duke's person many charms; and added, when relating this to his nephew, the earl of Dartmouth, that his tablet-book was full of unintelligible astrological figures. The duke told him he received them years previously in Scotland, and that he now found them but foolish conceits.—See also Dr. Clark's Life of James the Second; Oxford edition of this work.

‡ This dastardly peer, Ford, lord Grey de Werke, afterwards had his estate restored, and, obtaining the

So the lord Brandon, son to the earl of Macclesfield, was convicted by his and some other evidence. Mr. Hambden was also brought on his trial. And he was told that he must expect no favour unless he would plead guilty. And he, knowing that legal evidence would be brought against him, submitted to this; and begged his life with a meanness, of which he himself was so ashamed afterwards, that it gave his spirits a depression and disorder that he could never quite master. And that had a terrible conclusion: for, about ten years after, he cut his own throat.

The king was now as successful as his own heart could wish. He had held a session of parliament in both kingdoms that had settled his revenue; and now two ill-prepared, and ill managed, rebellions had so broken all the party that was against him, that he seemed secure in his throne, and above the power of all his enemies. And certainly a reign that was now so beyond expectation successful in its first six months seemed so well settled, that no ordinary mismanagement could have spoiled such beginnings. If the king had ordered a speedy execution of such persons as were fit to be made public examples, and had upon that granted a general indemnity, and if he had but covered his intentions till he had got through another session of parliament, it is not easy to imagine with what advantage he might then have opened and pursued his designs.

But his own temper and the fury of some of his ministers, and the maxims of his priests, who were become enthusiastical upon this success, and fancied that nothing could now stand before him: all these concurred to make him lose advantages that were never to be recovered; for the shows of mercy, that were afterwards put on, were looked on as an after game, to retrieve that which was now lost. The army was kept for some time in the western counties, where both officers and soldiers lived as in an enemy's country, and treated all that were believed to be ill affected to the king with great rudeness and violence.

Kirk*, who had commanded long in Tangier, was become so savage by the neighbourhood of the Moors there, that some days after the battle he ordered several of the prisoners to be hanged up at Taunton, without so much as the form of law, he and his company looking on from an entertainment they were at. At every new health another prisoner was hanged up. And they were so brutal, that, observing the shaking of the legs of those whom they hanged, it was said among them they were dancing; and upon that music was called for. This was both so illegal and so inhuman, that it might have been expected that some notice would have been taken of it. But Kirk was only chid for it. And it was said that he had a particular order for some military executions; so that he could only be chid for the manner of it.

But, as if this had been nothing, Jefferies was sent the western circuit to try the prisoners. His behaviour was beyond anything that was ever heard of in a civilized nation. He was perpetually either drunk or in a rage, more like a fury than the zeal of a judge. He required the prisoners to plead guilty: and in that case he gave them some hope of favour, if they gave him no trouble; otherwise he told them he would execute the letter of the law upon them in its utmost severity. This made many plead guilty who had a great defence in law. But he shewed no mercy. He ordered a great many to be hanged up immediately, without allowing them a minute's time to say their prayers. He hanged in several places about six hundred persons. The greatest part of these were of the meanest sort and of no distinction. The impieties with which he treated them, and his behaviour towards some of the nobility and gentry that were well affected, but came and pleaded in favour of some prisoners, would have amazed one if done by a bashaw in Turkey. England had never known anything like it. The instances are too many to be reckoned up†. favour of William the Third, was created by him earl Tankerville and viscount Grey of Glendale. This was in 1695, and soon after he was appointed first lord-commissioner of the treasury, and lord privy-seal. He died in 1701. His "Secret History of the Rye-house Plot" was published in 1754.—Gruinger.

* Percy Kirke, in 1680, was colonel of the 4th regiment of foot. Ironically they were called "Kirke's Lads."

† A very particular and impartial account of this wholesale murdering is given by Mr. Woolrych in his "Life of Jeffreys."

In his dying hours he was attended by Dr. Scot, a very reputable clergyman of the period. Scot reminded him of what was reported of his cruelties in the west; Jeffreys thanked him for the suggestion, and added, with emotion, "Whatever I did then, I did by express orders; and I have this to say farther for myself, that I was not half

But that which brought all his excesses to be imputed to the king himself, and to the orders given by him, was, that the king had a particular account of all his proceedings written to him every day. And he took pleasure to relate them in the drawing-room to foreign ministers, and at his table, calling it "Jeffreys's campaign;" speaking of all he had done in a style that neither became the majesty nor the mercifulness of a great prince. Dykfield was at that time in England, one of the ambassadors whom the States had sent over to congratulate the king's coming to the crown. He told me that the king talked so often of these things in his hearing, that he wondered to see him break out into those indecencies. And upon Jeffreys's coming back, he was created a baron, and peer of England: a dignity which, though anciently some judges were raised to it, yet in these later ages, as there was no example of it, so it was thought inconsistent with the character of a judge.

Two executions were of such an extraordinary nature, that they deserve a more particular recital. The king apprehended that many of the prisoners had got into London, and were concealed there; so he said those who concealed them were the worst sort of traitors, who endeavoured to preserve such persons to a better time. He had likewise a great mind to find out any among the rich merchants, who might afford great compositions to save their lives; for though there was much blood shed, there was little booty got to reward those who had served. Upon this the king declared he would sooner pardon the rebels, than those who harboured them.

There was in London one Gaunt, a woman that was an anabaptist, who spent a great part of her life in acts of charity, visiting the gaols, and looking after the poor of what persuasion soever they were. One of the rebels found her out, and she harboured him in her house: and was looking for an occasion of sending him out of the kingdom. He went about in the night, and came to hear what the king had said. So he, by an unheard of baseness, went and delivered himself, and accused her that harboured him. She was seized on and tried. There was no witness to prove that she knew that the person she harboured was a rebel but he himself; her maid witnessed only that he was entertained at her house. But though the crime was her harbouring a traitor, and was proved only by this infamous witness, yet the judge charged the jury to bring her in guilty, pretending that the maid was a second witness, though she knew nothing of that which was the criminal part. She was condemned, and burnt, as the law directs in the case of women convicted of treason. She died with a constancy, even to a cheerfulness, that struck all that saw it. She said, charity was a part of her religion, as well as faith; this at worst was the feeding an enemy; so she hoped she had her reward with him, for whose sake she did this service, how unworthy soever the person was, that made so ill a return for it. She rejoiced that God had honoured her to be the first that suffered by fire in this reign; and that her suffering was a martyrdom for that religion which was all love. Penn, the quaker, told me he saw her die. She laid the straw about her for burning her speedily, and behaved herself in such a manner that all the spectators melted in tears.

The other execution was of a woman of greater quality—the lady Lisle. Her husband had been a regicide, and was one of Cromwell's lords, and was called the lord Lisle. He went at the time of the Restoration beyond sea, and lived at Lausanne. But three desperate Irishmen, hoping by such a service to make their fortunes, went thither, and killed him as he was going to church; and being well mounted, and ill pursued, got into France. His lady was known to be much affected with the king's death, and not easily reconciled to her husband for the share he had in it. She was a woman of great piety and charity. The night after the action, Hicks, a violent preacher among the dissenters, and Nelthorp, came to her house. She knew Hicks, and treated him civilly, not asking from whence they came. But Hicks told what brought them thither; for they had been with the duke of Monmouth. Upon which she went out of the room immediately, and ordered her chief servant to send an information concerning them to the next justice of peace, and in the meanwhile to suffer bloody enough for him who sent me thither." Mr. speaker Onslow had this from sir J. Jekyl, to whom it was told by lord Somers, who heard it from Scot himself. —(Oxford ed. of this work.) This may be, probably is,

them to make their escape. But, before this could be done, a party came about the house, and took both them, and her for harbouring them. Jeffreys resolved to make a sacrifice of her, and obtained of the king a promise that he would not pardon her. Which the king owned to the earl of Feversham, when he, upon the offer of 1000*l.* if he could obtain her pardon, went and begged it*. So she was brought to her trial. No legal proof was brought that she knew that they were rebels: the names of the persons found in her house were in no proclamation: so there was no notice given to beware of them. Jeffreys affirmed to the jury, upon his honour, that the persons had confessed that they had been with the duke of Monmouth. This was the turning a witness against her, after which he ought not to have judged in the matter. And, though it was insisted on, as a point of law, that till the persons found in her house were convicted, she could not be found guilty, yet Jeffreys charged the jury in a most violent manner to bring her in guilty. All the audience was strangely affected with so unusual a behaviour in a judge. Only the person most concerned, the lady herself, who was then past seventy, was so little moved at it that she fell asleep. The jury brought her in not guilty. But the judge in great fury sent them out again. Yet they brought her in a second time not guilty. Then he seemed as in a transport of rage. He upon that threatened them with an attainder of jury. And they, overcome with fear, brought her in the third time guilty. The king would show no other favour, but that he changed the sentence from burning to beheading. She died with great constancy of mind; and expressed a joy that she thus suffered for an act of charity and piety.

Most of those that had suffered expressed at their death such a calm firmness, and such a zeal for their religion, which they believed was then in danger, that it made great impressions on the spectators. Some base men among them tried to save themselves by accusing others. Goodenough†, who had been under-sheriff of London, when Cornish was sheriff, offered to swear against Cornish; and also said, that Rumsey had not discovered all he knew. So Rumsey, to save himself, joined with Goodenough, to swear Cornish guilty of that for which the lord Russel had suffered. And this was driven on so fast, that Cornish was seized on, tried, and executed within the week. If he had got a little time, the falsehood of the evidence would have been proved from Rumsey's former deposition, which appeared so clearly soon after his death, that his estate was restored to his family, and the witnesses were lodged in remote prisons for their lives. Cornish, at his death, asserted his innocence with great vehemence; and with some acrimony complained of the methods taken to destroy him. And so they gave it out, that he died in a fit of fury. But Pen, who saw the execution, said to me, there appeared nothing but a just indignation that innocence might very naturally give. Pen might be well relied on in such matters, he being so entirely in the king's interests. He said to me, the king was much to be pitied, who was hurried into all this effusion of blood by Jeffreys's impetuous and cruel temper. But, if his own inclinations had not been biased that way, and if his priests had not thought it the interest of their party to let that butcher loose, by which so many men that were like to oppose them were put out of the way, it is not to be imagined, that there would have been such a run of barbarous cruelty, and that in so many instances.

It gave a general horror to the body of the nation: and it let all people see, what might be expected from a reign that seemed to delight in blood. Even some of the fairest of torics began to relent a little, and to think they had trusted too much, and gone too far. The king had raised new regiments, and had given commissions to papists. This was overlooked during the time of danger, in which all men's service was to be made use of: and by law they might serve three months. But now, as that time was near lapsing, the king began to say, the laws for the two tests were made on design against himself: the first was made to turn him out of the admiralty, and the second to make way for the exclusion; and, he added, that it was an affront to him to insist on the observance of those laws. So these persons, notwithstanding that act, were continued in commission; and the king declared openly, that he must look on all those who would not consent to the repeal of those laws, in the next session of parliament, as his enemies.

* This is denied by Macpherson; but, another defender of the Stuards, the author of "the Caveat," admits its truth, and adds, that the ladies St. John and Abergavenny asked of James a one day's reprieve for her in vain!—Woolrych's life of Jeffreys, 195.

† Dean Swift has related that this wretch retired afterwards to Ireland, where he practised as an attorney, and died there.—Oxford edition of this work.

The courtiers began everywhere to declaim against them. It was said to be against the rights of the crown to deny the king the service of all his subjects, to be contrary to the dignity of peerage to subject peers to any other tests than their allegiance, and that it was an insufferable affront done the king, to oblige all those whom he should employ, to swear that his religion was idolatrous. On the other hand all the people saw, that, if those acts were not maintained, no employment would be given to any but papists, or to those who gave hopes that they would change: and, if the parliament test was taken off, then the way was opened to draw over so many members of both houses, as would be in time a majority, to bring on an entire change of the laws with relation to religion. As long as the nation reckoned their kings were true, and sure to their religion, there was no such need of those tests, while the giving employments was left free, and our princes were like to give them only to those of their own religion. But since we had a prince professing another religion, it seemed the only security that was left to the nation, and that the tests stood as a barrier to defend us from popery. It was also said, that those tests had really quieted the minds of the greater part of the nation, and had united them against the exclusion; since they reckoned their religion was safe by reason of them. The military men went in zealously into those notions: for they saw, that, as soon as the king should get rid of the tests, they must either change their religion, or lose their employments. The clergy, who for most part had hitherto run in with fury to all the king's interests, began now to open their eyes. Thus all on a sudden the temper of the nation was much altered. The marquis of Halifax did move in council, that an order should be given to examine, whether all the officers in commission had taken the test, or not. But none seconded him: so the motion fell. And now all endeavours were used, to fix the repeal of the tests in the session that was coming on.

Some few converts were made at this time. The chief of these were the earl of Perth and his brother, the earl of Melfort. Some differences fell in between the duke of Queensborough and the earl of Perth. The latter thought the former was haughty and violent, and that he used him in too imperious a manner. So they broke. At that time the king published the two papers found in his brother's strong box. So the earl of Perth was either overcome with the reasons in them, or he thought it would look well at court, if he put his conversion upon these. He came up to complain of the duke of Queensborough. And his brother going to meet him at Ware, he discovered his designs to him, who seemed at first much troubled at it; but he plied him so, that he prevailed on him to join with him in his pretended conversion, which he did with great shows of devotion and zeal. But when his objections to the duke of Queensborough's administration were heard, they were so slight, that the king was ashamed of them: and all the court justified the duke of Queensborough. A repartee of the marquis of Halifax was much talked of on this occasion. The earl of Perth was taking pains to convince him that he had just grounds of complaint, and seemed little concerned in the ill effect this might have on himself. The marquis answered him, he needed fear nothing, "His faith would make him whole:" and it proved so.

Before he declared his change, the king seemed so well satisfied with the duke of Queensborough, that he was resolved to bring the earl of Perth to a submission, otherwise to dismiss him. So the king, having declared himself too openly to recall that so soon, ordered them both to go back to Scotland; and said he would signify his pleasure to them when they should be there. It followed them down very quickly. The duke of Queensborough was turned out of the treasury, and it was put in commission; and he, not to be too much irritated at once, was put first in the commission. And now it became soon very visible, that he had the secret no more; but that it was lodged between the two brothers, the earls of Perth and Melfort. Soon after that the duke of Queensborough was not only turned out of all his employments, but a design was laid to ruin him. All persons were encouraged to bring accusations against him, either with relation to the administration of the government, or of the treasury. And, if any colourable matter could have been found against him, it was resolved to have made him a sacrifice. This sudden hatred, after so entire a confidence, was imputed to the suggestions the earl of Perth had made of his zeal against popery, and of his having engaged all his friends to stick firm in opposition to it. It was said, there was no need of making such promises, as he had engaged the king to make to the parliament of Scotland. Nobody desired or expected them : he only drove that matter on his own account : so it was fit to let all about the king see, what was to be looked for, if they pressed anything too severely with relation to religion.

But to leave Scotland, and return to England. The king, after he had declared that he would be served by none but those who would vote for the repeal of the tests, called for the marquis of Halifax, and asked him how he would vote in that matter. He very frankly answered, he would never consent to it : he thought the keeping up those laws was necessary, even for the king's service, since the nation trusted so much to them, that the public quiet was chiefly preserved by that means. Upon this the king told him, that though he would never forget past services, yet since he could not be prevailed on in that particular, he was resolved to have all of a piece. So he was turned out. And the earl of Sunderland was made lord president, and continued still secretary of state. More were not questioned at that time, nor turned out ; for it was hoped that, since all men saw what was to be expected, if they should not comply with the king's intentions, this would have its full effect upon those who had no mind to part with their places.

The king resolved also to model Ireland, so as to make that kingdom a nursery for his army in England, and to be sure at least of an army there, while his designs were to go on more slowly in the isle of Britain. The Irish bore an inveterate hatred to the duke of Ormond : so he was recalled. But, to dismiss him with some show of respect, he was still continued lord Steward of the household. The earl of Clarendon was declared lord-lieutenant. But the army was put under the command of Talbot, who was made earl of Tirconnel*. And he began very soon to model it anew. The archbishop of Armagh had continued lord chancellor of Ireland, and was in all points so compliant to the court, that even his religion came to be suspected on that account. Yet, it seemed, he was not thought thorough paced. So sir Charles Porter, who was a zealous promoter of everything that the king proposed, and was a man of ready wit, and being poor was thought a person fit to be made a tool of, was declared lord chancellor of Ireland. To these the king said he was resolved to maintain the settlement of Ireland. They had authority to promise this, and to act pursuant to it. But, as both the earl of Clarendon and Porter were poor, it was hoped that they would understand the king's intentions, and see through those promises, that were made only to lay men asleep ; and that therefore they would not insist too much on them, nor pursue them too far.

But now, before I come to relate the short session of parliament, that was abruptly broken off, I must mention one great transaction that went before it, and had no small influence on all men's minds. And since I saw that dismal tragedy, which was at this time acted in France, I must now change the scene, and give some account of myself. When I resolved to go beyond sea, there was no choice to be made. So many exiles and outlawed persons were scattered up and down the towns of Holland and other provinces, that I saw the danger of going where I was sure many of them would come about me, and try to have involved me in guilt by coming into my company, that so they might engage me into their designs. So I resolved to go to France : and, if I found it not convenient to stay there, I intended to go on to Geneva, or Switzerland. I asked the French ambassador if I might be safe there. He, after some days, I suppose after he had written to the court upon it, assured me I should be safe there ; and that, if the king should ask after me, timely notice should be given me, that I might go out of the way. So I went to Paris. And there being many there whom I had reason to look on as spies, I took a little house, and lived by myself as privately as I could. I continued there till the beginning of August, when I went to Italy. I found the earl of Montague at Paris, with whom I conversed much, and got from him most of the secrets of the court, and of the negotiations he was engaged in. The king of France had been for many years weakening the whole protestant interest there, and was then upon the last resolution of recalling the edict of Nantes. And, as far as I could judge, the affairs of England gave the last stroke to that matter.

This year, of which I am now writing, must ever be remembered as the most fatal to the protestant religion. In February, a king of England declared himself a papist. In June, Charles the elector palatine dying without issue, the electoral dignity went to the house of Newburgh, a most bigotted popish family. In October, the king of France recalled and vacated the edict of Nantes*. And in December, the duke of Savoy being brought to it, not only by the persuasions, but even by the threatenings of the court of France, recalled the edict that his father had granted to the Vaudois. So it must be confessed, that this was a very critical year. And I have ever reckoned this the fifth great crisis of the protestant religion.

For some years the priests were everywhere making conversions in France. The hopes of pensions and preferments wrought on many. The plausible colours that the bishop of Meaux, then bishop of Condom, put on all the errors of the church of Rome, furnished others with excuses for changing. Many thought they must change at last, or be quite undone; for the king seemed to be engaged to go through with the matter, both in compliance with the shadow of conscience that he seemed to have, which was to follow implicitly the conduct of his confessor, and of the archbishop of Paris, he himself being ignorant in those matters beyond what can be well imagined; and because his glory seemed also concerned to go through with everything that he had once begun.

Old Rouvigny, who was the deputy general of the churches, told me that he was long deceived in his opinion of the king. He knew he was not naturally bloody. He saw his gross ignorance in those matters. His bigotry could not rise from any inward principle. So for many years he flattered himself with the hopes, that the design would go on so slowly, that some unlooked for accident might defeat it. But after the peace of Nimeguen (in 1678), he saw such steps made with so much precipitation, that he told the king he must beg a full audience of him upon that subject. He gave him one that lasted some hours. He came well prepared. He told him what the state of France was during the wars in his father's reign: how happy France had been now for fifty years, occasioned chiefly by the quiet it was in with relation to those matters. He gave him an account of their numbers, their industry and wealth, their constant readiness to advance the revenue, and that all the quiet he had with the court of Rome was chiefly owing to them: if they were rooted out, the court of Rome would govern as absolutely in France as it did in Spain. He desired leave to undeceive him, if he was made believe they would all change, as soon as he engaged his authority in the matter: many would go out of the kingdom, and carry their wealth and industry into other countries. And by a scheme of particulars he reckoned how far that would go. In fine, he said, it would come to the shedding of much blood: many would suffer, and others would be precipitated into desperate courses. So that the most glorious of all reigns would be in conclusion disfigured and defaced, and become a scene of blood and horror. He told me, as he went through these matters, the king seemed to hearken to him very attentively. But he perceived they made no impression: for the king never asked any particulars, or any explanation, but let him go on. And, when he had ended, the king said he took his freedom well, since it flowed from his zeal to his service. He believed all that he had told him of the prejudice it might do him in his affairs: only he thought, it would not go to the shedding of blood. But he said, he considered himself as so indispensably bound to endeavour the conversion of all his subjects, and the extirpation of heresy, that if the doing it should require that with one hand he should cut off the other, he would submit to that. After this Rouvigny gave all his friends hints of what they were to look for. Some were for flying out into a new civil war. But, their chief confidence being in the assistance they expected from England, he, who knew what our princes were, and had reason to believe that king Charles was at least a cold protestant, if not a secret papist, and knew that the States would not embroil their affairs in assisting them, their maxims rather leading them to connive at anything that would bring great numbers and much wealth into their country than to oppose it, was against all motions of that kind. He reckoned those risings would be soon crushed, and so would precipitate their ruin with some colour of justice. He was much censured for this by some hot men among them, as having betrayed them to the court. But he was very unjustly blamed, as appeared both by his own conduct, and by his son's; who was received at first into the survivance of being deputy general for the churches, and afterwards, at his father's desire, had that melancholy post given him, in which he daily saw new injustices done, and was only suffered, for form's sake, to inform against them, but with no hope of success*.

The father did, upon King Charles's death, write a letter of congratulation to the king, who wrote him such an obliging answer, that upon it he wrote to his niece the Lady Russel, that, having such assurances given him by the king of a high sense of his former services, he resolved to come over, and beg the restoring her son's honour†. The Marquis of Halifax did presently apprehend, that this was a blind, and that the king of France was sending him over to penetrate into the king's designs; since from all hands intimations were brought of the promises, that he made to the ministers of the other princes of Europe. So I was ordered to use all endeavours to divert him from coming over: his niece had indeed begged that journey of him, when she hoped it might have saved her husband's life, but she would not venture to desire the journey on any other consideration, considering his great age, and that her son was then but five years old. I pressed this so much on him, that, finding him fixed in his resolution, I could not hinder myself from suspecting, that such a high act of friendship, in a man some years past fourscore, had somewhat under it: and it was said, that, when he took leave of the king of France, he had an audience of two hours of him. But this was a false suggestion: and I was assured afterwards that he came over only in friendship to his niece, and that he had no directions nor messages from the court of France.

He came over, and had several audiences of the king, who used him with great kindness, but did not grant him that which he said he came for; only he gave him a general promise of doing it in a proper time.

But whether the court of France was satisfied by the conversation that Rouvigny had with the king, that they needed apprehend nothing from England; or whether the king's being now so settled on the throne made them conclude that the time was come of repealing the edicts, is not certain. M. de Louvoy, seeing the king so set on the matter, proposed to him a method which he believed would shorten the work, and do it effectually: which was to let loose some bodies of dragoons to live upon the protestants on discretion. They were put under no restraint, but only to avoid rapes and the killing them. This was begun in Bearn. And the people were so struck with it, that, seeing they were to be eat up first, and, if that prevailed not, to be cast in prison, when all was taken from them, till they should change, and being required only to promise to reunite themselves to the church, they, overcome with fear and having no time for consulting together, did universally comply. This did so animate the court, that, upon it the same methods were taken in most places of Guienne, Languedoc, and Dauphiné, where the greatest numbers of the protestants were. A dismal consternation and feebleness ran through most of them, so that great numbers yielded. Upon which the king, now resolved to go through with what had been long projected, published the edict repealing the edict of Nantes, in which (though that edict was declared to be a perpetual and irrevocable law,) he set forth, that it was only intended to quiet matters by it, till more effectual ways should be taken for the conversion of Heretics. He also promised in it, that, though all the public exercises of that religion were now suppressed, yet those of that persuasion who lived quietly should not be disturbed on that account, while at the same time not only the dragoons, but all the clergy and the bigots of France, broke out into all the instances of rage and fury, against such as did not change upon their being required in the king's name to be of his religion: for that was the style everywhere.

Men and women of all ages, who would not yield, were not only stripped of all they had, but kept long from sleep, driven about from place to place, and hunted out of their retirements. The women were carried into nunneries, in many of which they were almost starved, whipped, and barbarously treated. Some few of the bishops, and of the secular clergy, to make the matter easier, drew formularies, importing that they were resolved to reunite themselves to the catholic church, and that they renounced the errors of Luther and Calvin. People in such extremities are easy to put a stretched sense on any words, that may give them present relief. So it was said, what harm was it to promise to be united to the catholic church: and the renouncing those men's errors did not renounce their good and sound doctrine. But it was very visible with what intent those subscriptions or promises were asked of them: so their compliance in that matter was a plain equivocation. But, how weak and faulty soever they might be in this, it must be acknowledged here was one of the most violent persecutions that is to be found in history. In many respects it exceeded them all, both in the several inventions of cruelty, and in its long continuance. I went over the greatest part of France while it was in its hottest rage, from Marseilles to Montpellier, and from thence to Lyons, and so to Geneva. I saw and knew so many instances of their injustice and violence, that it exceeded even what could have been well imagined; for all men set their thoughts at work, to invent new methods of cruelty. In all the towns through which I passed, I heard the most dismal account of those things possible; but chiefly at Valence, where one Dcrapine seemed to exceed even the furies of inquisitors. One in the streets could have known the new converts, as they were passing by them, by a cloudy dejection that appeared in their looks and deportment. Such as endeavoured to make their escape, and were seized, (for guards and secret agents were spread along the whole roads and frontier of France,) were, if men, condemned to the galleys, and, if women, to monasteries. To complete this cruelty, orders were given that such of the new converts as did not at their death receive the sacrament, should be denied burial, and that their bodies should be left where other dead carcases were cast out, to be devoured by wolves, or dogs. This was executed in several places with the utmost barbarity: and it gave all people so much horror, that, finding the ill effect of it, it was let fall. This hurt none, but struck all that saw it, even with more horror than those sufferings that were more felt. The fury that appeared on this occasion did spread itself with a sort of contagion: for the intendants and other officers that had been mild and gentle in the former parts of their life seemed now to have laid aside the compassion of christians, the breeding of gentlemen, and the common impressions of humanity. The greatest part of the clergy, the regulars especially, were so transported with the zeal that their king showed on this occasion, that their sermons were full of the most inflamed eloquence that they could invent, magnifying their king in strains too indecent and blasphemous, to be mentioned by me.

I staid at Paris till the beginning of August. Barrillon sent to me to look to myself; for the king had let some words fall importing his suspicion of me, as concerned in the duke of Monmouth's business. Whether this was done on design to see if such an insinuation could fright me away, and so bring me under some appearance of guilt, I cannot tell: for in that time everything was deceitfully managed. But I, who knew that I was not so much as guilty of concealment, resolved not to stir from Paris till the rebellion was over, and that the prisoners were examined and tried. When that was done, Stoupe, a brigadier-general, told me that M. de Louvoy had said to him, that the king was resolved to put an end to the business of the Huguenots that season: and since he was resolved not to change, he advised him to make a tour into Italy, that he might not seem to do anything that opposed the king's service. Stoupe told me this in confidence. So we resolved to make that journey together. Some thought it was too bold an adventure in me, after what I had written and acted in the matters of religion, to go to Rome. But others, who judged better, thought I ran no hazard in going thither: for, besides the high civility, with which all strangers are treated there, they were at that time in such hopes of gaining England, that it was not reasonable to think that they would raise the apprehensions of the nation, by using any that belonged to it ill: and the destroying me would not do them the service that could in any sort balance the prejudice that might arise from the noise it would make. And indeed I met with so high a civility at Rome, that it fully justified this opinion.

Pope Innocent the Eleventh, Odescalchi, knew who I was the day after I came to Rome.

And he ordered the captain of the Swiss guards to tell Stoupe that he had heard of me, and would give me a private audience a-bed, to save me from the ceremony of the pantoufle*. But I knew the noise that this would make, so I resolved to avoid it, and excused it upon my speaking Italian so ill as I did. But cardinal Howard and the cardinal d'Estrees treated me with great freedom. The latter talked much with me concerning the orders of our church, to know whether they had been brought down to us by men truly ordained or not; for, he said, they apprehended things would be much more easily brought about, if our orders could be esteemed valid, though given in heresy and schism. I told him, I was glad they were not possessed with any opinion that made the reconciliation more difficult; but, as for the matter of fact, nothing was more certain than that the ordinations in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign were canonical and regular. He seemed to be persuaded of the truth of this, but lamented that it was impossible to bring the Romans to think so.

Cardinal Howard showed me all his letters from England, by which I saw that those who wrote to him reckoned, that their designs were so well laid that they could not miscarry. They thought they should certainly carry everything in the next session of parliament. There was a high strain of insolence in their letters: and they reckoned, they were so sure of the king, that they seemed to have no doubt left of their succeeding in the reduction of England. The Romans and Italians were much troubled at all this: for they were under such apprehensions of the growth of the French power, and had conceived such hopes of the king of England's putting a stop to it, that they were sorry to see the king engage himself so in the design of changing the religion of his subjects, which they thought would create him so much trouble at home, that he would neither have leisure, nor strength, to look after the common concerns of Europe. The cardinal told me, that all the advices written over from thence to England were for slow, calm, and moderate courses. He said, he wished he was at liberty to show me the copies of them; but he saw more violent courses were more acceptable, and would probably be followed. And he added, that these were the production of England, far different from the counsels of Rome.

He also told me, that they had not instruments enough to work with: for, though they were sending over all that were capable of the mission, yet he expected no great matters from them. Few of them spoke true English. They came over young, and retained all the English that they brought over with them, which was only the language of boys; but, their education being among strangers, they had formed themselves so upon that model, that really they preached as Frenchmen, or Italians, in English words: of which he was every day warning them, for he knew this could have no good effect in England. He also spoke with great sense of the proceedings in France, which he apprehended would have very ill consequences in England. I shall only add one other particular, which will show the soft temper of that good natured man.

He used me in such a manner, that it was much observed by many others. So two French gentlemen desired a note from me to introduce them to him. Their design was to be furnished with reliques; for he was then the cardinal that looked after that matter. One evening I came in to him as he was very busy in giving them some reliques. So I was called in to see them: and I whispered to him in English, that it was somewhat odd that a priest of the church of England should be at Rome, helping them off with the ware of Babylon. He was so pleased with this, that he repeated it to the others in French; and told the Frenchmen, that they should tell their countrymen how bold the heretics, and how mild the cardinals, were, at Rome.

I staid in Rome till prince Borghese came to me, and told me it was time for me to go. I had got great acquaintance there. And, though I did not provoke any to discourse of points of controversy, yet I defended myself against all those who attacked me with the same freedom that I had done in other places. This began to be taken notice of. So upon the first intimation I came away, and returned by Marseilles. And then I went through those southern provinces of France, that were at that time a scene of barbarity and cruelty.

I intended to have gone to Orange; but Tessè, with a body of dragoons, was then quartered over that small principality, and was treating the protestants there in the same manner that the French subjects were treated in other parts. So I went not in, but passed near it, and had this account of that matter from some that were the most considerable men of the principality. Many inhabitants of the neighbouring places fled thither from the persecution: upon which a letter was written to the government there, in the name of the king of France, requiring them to put all his subjects out of their territory. This was hard. Yet they were too naked, and exposed, to dispute anything with those who could command everything. So they ordered all the French to withdraw. Upon which Tessè, who commanded in those parts, wrote to them, that the king would be well satisfied with the obedience they had given his orders. They upon this were quiet, and thought there was no danger. But the next morning Tessè marched his dragoons into the town, and let them loose upon them, as he had done upon the subjects of France. And they plied as feebly as most of the French had done. This was done while that principality was in the possession of the prince of Orange, pursuant to an article of the treaty of Nimeguen, of which the king of England was the guarantee. Whether the French had the king's consent to this, or if they presumed upon it, was not known. It is certain, he ordered two memorials to be given in at that court, complaining of it in very high terms. But nothing followed on it. And, some months after, the king of France did unite Orange to the rest of Provence, and suppressed all the rights it had as a distinct principality. The king wrote upon it to the princess of Orange, that he could do no more in that matter, unless he should declare war upon it; which he could not think fit for a thing of such small importance.

But now the session of parliament drew on. And there was a great expectation of the issue of it. For some weeks before it met there was such a number of refugees coming over every day, who set about a most dismal recital of the persecution in France, and that in so many instances that were crying and odious, that, though all endeavours were used to lessen the clamour this had raised, yet the king did not stick openly to condemn it, as both unchristian and unpolitic. He took pains to clear the Jesuits of it, and laid the blame of it chiefly on the king, on madame de Maintenon, and the archbishop of Paris. He spoke often of it with such vehemence, that there seemed to be an affectation in it. He did more. He was very kind to the refugees. He was liberal to many of them. He ordered a brief for a charitable collection over the nation for them all: upon which great sums were sent in. They were deposited in good hands, and well distributed. The king also ordered them to be denized without paying the fees, and gave them great immunities. So that in all there came over first and last, between forty and fifty thousand of that nation. Here was such a real instance of the cruel and persecuting spirit of popery, wheresoever it prevailed, that few could resist this conviction. So that all men confessed that the French persecution came very seasonably to awaken the nation, and open men's eyes in so critical a conjuncture: for upon this session of parliament all did depend.

When it was opened, the king told them how happy his forces had been in reducing a dangerous rebellion, in which it had appeared how weak and insignificant the militia was: and therefore he saw the necessity of keeping up an army for all their security. He had put some in commission of whose loyalty he was well assured: and they had served him so well that he would not put that affront on them, and on himself, to turn them out. He told them, all the world saw, and they had felt the happiness of a good understanding between him and his parliament: so he hoped nothing should be done on their part to interrupt it, as he, on his own part, would observe all that he had promised.

Thus he fell upon the two most unacceptable points that he could have found out; which were, a standing army, and a violation of the act of the test. There were some debates in the house of lords about thanking the king for his speech. It was pressed by the courtiers, as a piece of respect that was always paid. To this some answered, that was done when there were gracious assurances given. Only the earl of Devonshire said, he was for giving thanks, because the king had spoken out so plainly, and warned them of what they might look for. It was carried in the house to make an address of thanks for the speech. The lord Guilford, North, was now dead. He was a crafty and designing man. He had no mind to part with the great seal; and yet he saw, he could not hold it without an entire compliance with the pleasure of the court. An appeal against a decree of his had been brought before the lords in the former session; and it was not only reversed with many severe reflections on him that made it, but the earl of Nottingham, who hated him, because he had endeavoured to detract from his father's memory, had got together so many instances of his ill administration of justice, that he exposed him severely for it. And, it was believed, that gave the crisis to the uneasiness and distraction of mind he was labouring under. He languished for some time; and died despised, and ill thought of by the whole nation*.

Nothing but his successor made him be remembered with regret: for Jeffreys had the seals. He had been made a peer while he was chief justice, which had not been done for some ages; but he affected to be an original in every thing. A day or two after the session was opened, the lords went upon the consideration of the king's speech; and, when some began to make remarks upon it, they were told, that by giving thanks for the speech, they had precluded themselves from finding fault with any part of it. This was rejected with indignation, and put an end to that compliment of giving thanks for a speech, when there was no special reason for it. The lords Halifax, Nottingham, and Mordaunt, were the chief arguers among the temporal lords. The bishop of London (Compton) spoke often likewise: and twice or thrice he said, he spoke not only his own sense, but the sense of that whole bench. They said, the Test was now the best fence they had for their religion: if they gave up so great a point, all the rest would soon follow; and if the king might by his authority supersede such a law, fortified with so many clauses, and above all with that of an incapacity, it was in vain to think of law any more: the government would become arbitrary and absolute. Jeffreys began to argue in his rough manner; but he was soon taken down; it appearing, that how furiously soever he raved on the bench, where he played the tyrant, yet where others might speak with him on equal terms, he was a very contemptible man: and he received as great a mortification, as such a brutal man was capable of.

But as the scene lay in the house of commons, so the debates there were more important. A project was offered for making the militia more useful in order to the disbanding the army. But, to oppose that, the court shewed, how great a danger we had lately escaped, and how much of an ill heaven yet remained in the nation, so that it was necessary a force should be kept up. The court moved for a subsidy, the king having been at much extraordinary charge in reducing the late rebellion. Many, that were resolved to assert the business of the Test with great firmness, thought, the voting of money first was the decenter way of managing the opposition to the court: whereas others opposed this, having often observed, that the voting of money was the giving up the whole session to the court. The court wrought on many weak men with this topic, that the only way to gain the king, and to dispose him to agree to them in the business of the Test, was to begin with the supply. This had so great an effect, that it was carried only by one vote to consider the king's speech, before they should proceed to the supply†. It was understood, that when they received satisfaction in other things, they were resolved to give five hundred thousand pounds.

They went next to consider the act about the Test, and the violations of it, with the king's speech upon that head. The reasoning was clear and full on the one hand. The court offered nothing on the other hand in the way of argument, but the danger of offending the king, and of raising a misunderstanding between him and them. So the whole house went unanimously into a vote for an address to the king, that he would maintain the laws, in particular that concerning the test. But with that they offered to pass a bill, for indemnifying those who had broken that law; and were ready to have considered them in the supply that they intended to give.

The king expressed his resentments of this with much vehemence, when the address was brought to him. He said, some men intended to disturb the good correspondence that was between him and them, which would be a great prejudice to the nation: he had declared

* This is, totis verbis, differing from the character given the lord keeper in his "Life" by his brother, Mr. R. North.

† The Scotch earl of Middleton, then secretary of state, seeing many go out to vote against the court who were in its service, went down to the bar to reproach them. "Sir," said he to Captain Kendal, "do you not command a troop of horse in his majesty's service?"—"Yes, my lord," replied the captain; but my brother died last night, and has left me 700*l.* a year!" Mr. Speaker Onslow says he had this from his uncle, who was present.—Oxford ed.

his mind so positively in that matter, that he hoped they would not have meddled with it. Yet, he said, he would still observe all the promises that he had made. This made some reflect on the violations of the edict of Nantes, by many of the late edicts that were set out in France, before the last that repealed it, in which the king of France had always declared, that he would maintain that edict, even when the breaches made upon it were the most visible and notorious. The house, upon this rough answer, was in a high fermentation. Yet, when one Cook said, that they were Englishmen, and were not to be threatened, because this seemed to be a want of respect, they sent him to the Tower; and obliged him to ask pardon for those indecent words. But they resolved to insist on their address, and then to proceed upon the petitions concerning elections. And now those, that durst not open their mouth before, spoke with much force upon this head. They said, it was a point upon which the nation expected justice, and they had a right to claim it. And it was probable, they would have condemned a great many elections; for an intimation was set round, that all those who had stuck to the interest of the nation, in the main points then before them, should be chosen over again, though it should be found that their election was void, and that a new writ should go out. By this means those petitions were now encouraged, and were likely to have a fair hearing, and a just decision: and it was believed, that the abject courtiers would have been voted out.

The king saw that both houses were now so fixed, that he could carry nothing in either of them, unless he would depart from his speech, and let the act of the test take place. So he prorogued the parliament, and kept it by repeated prorogations still on foot for about a year and a half, but without holding a session. All those who had either spoken, or voted, for the test, were soon after this disgraced, and turned out of their places, though many of these had served the king hitherto with great obsequiousness, and much zeal. He called for many of them, and spoke to them very earnestly upon that subject in his closet: upon which the term of closeting was much tossed about. Many of these gave him very flat and hardy denials: others, though more silent, yet were no less steady: so that, when, after a long practice both of threatening and ill usage on the one hand, and of promises and corruption on the other, the king saw he could not bring them into a compliance with him, he at last dissolved the parliament; by which he threw off a body of men, that were in all other respects sure to him, and that would have accepted a very moderate satisfaction from him at any time. And, indeed, in all England it would not have been easy to have found five hundred men so weak, so poor, and so devoted to the court, as these were. So happily was the nation taken out of their hands by the precipitated violence of a bigoted court.

Soon after the prorogation, the lord Delamer was brought to his trial. Some witnesses swore high treason against him only upon report, that he had designed to make a rebellion in Cheshire, and to join with the duke of Monmouth. But, since those swore only upon hearsay, that was no evidence in law. One witness swore home against him, and against two other gentlemen, who, as he said, were in company with him; and that treasonable messages were then given to him by them all to carry to some others. That which gave the greatest credit to the evidence was, that this lord had gone from London secretly to Cheshire, at the time of the duke of Monmouth's landing, and that after he had stayed a day or two in that county, he had come up as secretly to London. This looked suspicious, and made it to be believed, that he went to try what could be done. The credit of that single witness was overthrown by many unquestionable proofs, by which it appeared that the two gentlemen, who he said met with that lord in Cheshire, were all that while still in London. The witness, to gain the more credit, had brought others into the plot, by the common fate of false swearers, who bring in such circumstances to support their evidence, as they think will make it more credible, but, being ill laid, give a handle to those concerned to find out their falsehood. And that was the case of this witness; for, though little doubt was made of the truth of that which he swore against this lord, as to the main of his evidence, yet he had added such a mixture of falsehood to it, as being fully proved, destroyed the evidence. As for the secret journey to, and again between London and Cheshire, that lord said, he had been long a prisoner in the Tower upon bare suspicion: he had no mind to be lodged again there; so he resolved in that time of jealousy to go out of the way: and bearing that a child, of which he was very fond, was sick in Cheshire, he went thither: and hearing from his lady that his eldest son was very ill at London, he made haste back again. This was well proved by his physicians and domestics, though it was a thing of very ill appearance, that he made such journeys so quick and so secretly at such a time. The solicitor-general, Finch, pursuant to the doctrine he had maintained in former trials, and perhaps to atone for the zeal he had shewed in the house of commons, for maintaining the act of the test, made a violent declamation, to prove that one witness with presumptions was sufficient to convict one of high treason. The peers did unanimously acquit the lord; so that trial ended to the great joy of the whole town; which was now turned to be as much against the court, as it had been of late years for it. Finch had been continued in his employment only to lay the load of this judgment upon him; and he acted his part in it with his usual vehemence. He was presently after turned out: and Powis succeeded him, who was a compliant young aspiring lawyer, though in himself he was no ill-natured man. Now the posts in the law began to be again taken care of; for it was resolved to act a piece of pageantry in Westminster-Hall, with which the next year began.

Sir Edward Hales, a gentleman of a noble family in Kent, declared himself a papist, though he had long disguised it; and had once to myself so solemnly denied it, that I was led from thence to see, there was no credit to be given to that sort of men, where their church, or religion, was concerned. He had an employment; and not taking the test, his coachman was set up to inform against him, and to claim the 500*l.* that the law gave to the informer. When this was to be brought to trial, the judges were secretly asked their opinions; and such as were not clear, to judge as the court did direct, were turned out: and upon two, or three, canvassings the half of them were dismissed, and others of more pliable and obedient understandings were put in their places. Some of these were weak and ignorant to a scandal. The suit went on in a feeble prosecution; and in Trinity Term judgment was given.

There was a new chief justice found out, very different indeed from Jeffreys, sir Edward Herbert. He was a well bred and a virtuous man, generous, and good-natured. He was but an indifferent lawyer; and had gone to Ireland to find practice and preferment there. He unhappily got into a set of very high notions with relation to the king's prerogative. His gravity and virtues gave him great advantages, chiefly his succeeding such a monster as had gone before him. So he, being found to be a fit tool, was, without any application of his own, raised up all at once to this high post*. After the coachman's cause had been argued with a most indecent coldness, by those who were made use of on design to expose and betray it, it was said, in favour of the prerogative, that the government of England was entirely in the king: that the crown was an imperial crown, the importance of which was, that it was absolute: all penal laws were powers lodged in the crown, to enable the king to force the execution of the law, but were not bars to limit, or bind up, the king's power: the king could pardon all offences against the law, and forgive the penalties; and why could not he as well dispense with them? Acts of parliament had been often superseded: the judges had sometimes given directions in their charges at circuits, to enquire after some acts of parliament no more; of which one late instance happened during the * Sir Edward Herbert, born about 1646, was a younger brother of admiral Herbert, who will be next mentioned. They were sons of sir Edward Herbert, knight, of London. He was of Winchester and New College. He took his bachelors's degree in arts, and then became a student of the Middle Temple. He was successively attorney-general in Ireland, and chief justice of Chester. In 1683 he was knighted, and made attorney to the duke of York, when sir John Churchill was promoted to the mastership of the rolls in the place of sir H. Grimstone. In 1685, he was promoted to the lord chief justiceship of the king's bench, and made a privy councillor. In 1686, he sat as one of the ecclesiastical commissioners. In the following year he was removed to be chief of the common pleas, because he would not interpret the law in the king's bench so as to take away the life of a soldier who deserted his colours upon Hounslow Heath. It is said that sir Robert Wright was promoted to his seat, having promised to be more complying in shedding blood! —(Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys.) When James the Second abdicated, sir Edward followed him during his exile, and was made by the ex-monarch earl of Portland, and lord chancellor; consequently he was excepted out of the bill of indemnity. His conduct as detailed above shews that he was a mild, conscientious man. That he was fearless of offending the highest powers when his duty required it is further proved by his exposing Jeffreys upon the bench, by demonstrating his bribes and corruptions when in the west; which "extremely offended" the king.—(Singer's correspondence.) Sir Edward published "A short Account of the Authorities upon which judgment was given in sir Edward Hale's case." This was refuted in pamphlets by a Mr. Attwood, and sir Robert Atkins.—(Wood's Athenæ Oxon.) King William gave his estate to his brother, admiral Herbert.—Oxford edition of this work.

former reign : an act passed concerning the size of carts and waggons, with many penalties upon the transgressors ; and yet, when it appeared that the model prescribed in the act was not practicable, the judges gave direction not to execute the act.

These were the arguments brought to support the king's dispensing power. In opposition to this it was said, though not at the bar, yet in the common discourse of the town, that if penalties did arise only by virtue of the king's proclamation, it was reasonable that the power of dispensing should be only in the king : but since the prerogative was once constituted and limited by law, and since penalties were imposed to force the observation of laws, that were necessary for the public safety, it was an overturning the whole government, and the changing it from a legal into a despotic form, to say that laws, made and declared not to be capable of being dispensed with, where one of the penalties was an incapacity, which by a maxim of law cannot be taken away, even by a pardon, should at the pleasure of the prince be dispensed with ; a fine was also set by the act on offenders, but not given to the king, but to the informer, which thereby became his. So that the king could no more pardon that, than he could discharge the debts of the subjects, and take away property. Laws of small consequence, when a visible error not observed in making them was afterwards found out, like that of the size of carts, might well be superseded : for the intention of the legislature being the good of the subject, that is always to be presumed for the repeal of an impracticable law. But it was not reasonable to infer from thence, that a law made for the security of the government, with the most effectual clauses that could be contrived, on design to force the execution of it, even in bar to the power of the prerogative, should be made so precarious a thing, especially when it was so lately asserted with so much vigour by the representatives of the nation. It was said, that, though this was now only applied to one statute, yet the same force of reason would hold to annul all our laws : and the penalty being that which is the life of the law, the dispensing with penalties might soon be carried so far, as to dissolve the whole government : and the security that the subjects had were only from the laws, or rather from the penalties, since laws without these were feeble things, which tied men only according to their own discretion.

Thus was this matter tossed about in the arguments, with which all people's mouths were now filled : but judges, who are beforehand determined how to give their opinions, will not be much moved even by the strongest arguments. The ludicrous ones used on this occasion at the bar were rather a farce, fitter for a mock trial in a play, than such as became men of learning in so important a matter. Great expectations were raised, to hear with what arguments the judges would maintain the judgment that they should give. But they made nothing of it ; and without any arguing gave judgment for the defendant, as if it had been in a cause of course.

Now the matter was as much settled, as a decision in the King's Bench could settle it. Yet so little regard had the chief justice's nearest friends to his opinion in this particular, that his brother, admiral Herbert, being pressed by the king to promise that he would vote the repeal of the test, answered the king very plainly, that he could not do it either in honour, or conscience. The king said, he knew he was a man of honour, but the rest of his life did not look like a man that had great regard to conscience. He answered boldly, he had his faults, but they were such, that other people, who talked more of conscience, were guilty of the like. He was indeed a man abandoned to luxury and vice. But, though he was poor, and had much to lose, having places to the value of 4000*l.* a year, he chose to lose them all rather than comply. This made much noise : for as he had a great reputation for his conduct in sea affairs, so he had been most passionately zealous in the king's service, from his first setting out to that day. It appeared by this, that no past services would be considered, if men were not resolved to comply in every thing. The door was now opened, so all regard to the test was laid aside. And all men that intended to recommend themselves took employments, and accepted of this dispensing power. This was done even by some of those who continued still protestants, though the far greater number of them continued to qualify themselves according to law *.

* Arthur Herbert, the admiral, who spoke so fearlessly to James, had been employed by Charles the Second at Tangier, and Algiers. He became an exile in Holland at the time his brother was trying the bishops. He will be noticed in future pages.—Noble.

Many of the papists, that were men of quiet or of fearful tempers, did not like these methods: they thought the priests went too fast, and the king was too eager in pursuing every thing that was suggested by them. One Peter, descended from a noble family, a man of no learning, nor any way famed for his virtue, but who made all up in boldness and zeal, was the jesuit of them all that seemed animated with the most courage. He had, during the popish plot, been introduced to the king, and had suggested things that shewed him a resolute and undertaking man. Upon that the king looked on him as the fittest man to be set at the head of his counsels. So he was now considered as the person who of all others had the greatest credit. He applied himself most to the earl of Sunderland, and was for some time chiefly directed by him*.

The maxim that the king set up, and about which he entertained all that were about him, was, the great happiness of an universal toleration. On this the king used to enlarge in a great variety of topics. He said nothing was more reasonable, more christian, and more politic: and he reflected much on the church of England, for the severities with which dissenters had been treated. This, how true, or just, soever it might be, yet was strange doctrine in the mouth of a professed papist, and of a prince on whose account, and by whose direction, the church party had been, indeed, but too obsequiously, pushed on to that rigour. But, since the church party could not be brought to comply with the design of the court, applications were now made to the dissenters: and all on a sudden the churchmen were disgraced, and the dissenters were in high favour. Chief justice Herbert went the western circuit after Jeffreys's bloody one. And now all was grace and favour to them. Their former sufferings were much reflected on, and pitied. Every thing was offered that could alleviate their sufferings. Their teachers were now encouraged to set up their conventicles again, which had been discontinued, or held very secretly, for four or five years. Intimations were every where given, that the king would not have them, or their meetings to be disturbed. Some of them began to grow insolent upon this shew of favour; but wiser men among them saw through all this, and perceived the design of the papists was now, to set on the dissenters against the church, as much as they had formerly set the church against them: and therefore, though they returned to their conventicles, yet they had a just jealousy of the ill designs, that lay hid under all this sudden and unexpected shew of grace and kindness: and they took care not to provoke the church party.

Many of the clergy acted now a part that made good amends for past errors. They began to preach generally against popery, which the dissenters did not. They set themselves to study the points of controversy: and upon that there followed a great variety of small books, that were easily purchased and soon read. They examined all the points of popery with a solidity of judgment, a clearness of arguing, a depth of learning, and a vivacity of writing, far beyond any thing that had before that time appeared in our language. The truth is, they were very unequally yoked; for, if they are justly to be reckoned among the best writers that have yet appeared on the protestant side, those they wrote against were certainly among the weakest that had ever appeared on the popish side. Their books were poorly but insolently written; and had no other learning in them, but what was taken out of some French writers, which they put into very bad English; so that a victory over them need have been but by a mean performance.

This had a mighty effect on the whole nation; even those who could not search things to the bottom, yet were amazed at the great inequality that appeared in this engagement. The papists, who knew what service the bishop of Meaux's book had done in France, resolved to pursue the same method here in several treatises, which they entitled "Papists represented and misrepresented;" to which such clear answers were written, that what effect soever that artifice might have, where it was supported by the authority of a great king, and the terror of ill usage, and a dragoonade in conclusion, yet it succeeded so ill in England, that it would not sit at the council board with him. He was James the Second's confessor. Frequent notices of him will occur in the following pages, and further information may be found in Dodd's Hist. of the English Church, Dalrymple's Memoirs, Clarendon Correspondence, &c.

* Father Edward Peters had some abilities, but these were completely rendered nugatory by his vanity, ambition, and rashness. It is evident from the Clarendon papers, that all the moderate statesmen of the period were opposed to him. Lords Clarendon, Nottingham, and others,

gave occasion to enquire into the true opinions of that church, not as some artful writers had disguised them, but as they were laid down in the books that are of authority among them, such as the decisions of councils received among them, and their established offices, and as they are held at Rome, and in all those countries where popery prevails without any intermixture with heretics, or apprehension of them, as in Spain and Portugal. This was done in so authentic a manner, that popery itself was never so well understood by the nation, as it came to be upon this occasion.

The persons who both managed and directed this controversial war, were chiefly Tillotson, Stillington, Tennison, and Patrick. Next them were Sherlock, Williams, Claget, Gee, Aldrich, Atterbury, Whitby, Hooper, and above all these, Wake, who having been long in France, chaplain to the lord Preston, brought over with him many curious discoveries, that were both useful and surprising. Besides the chief writers of those books of controversy, there were many sermons preached and printed on those heads, that did very much edify the whole nation. And this matter was managed with that concert, that for the most part once a week some new book, or sermon, came out, which both instructed, and animated, those who read them. There were but very few proselytes gained to popery; and these were so inconsiderable, that they were rather a reproach than an honour to them. Walker, the head of University college *, and five or six more at Oxford, declared themselves to be of that religion; but with this brand of infamy, that they had continued for several years complying with the doctrine and worship of the church of England after they were reconciled to the church of Rome. The popish priests were enraged at this opposition made by the clergy, when they saw their religion so exposed, and themselves so much despised. They said, it was ill manners and want of duty to treat the king's religion with so much contempt.

It was resolved to proceed severely against some of the preachers, and to try if by that means they might intimidate the rest. Dr. Sharp was the rector of St. Giles's, and was both a very pious man, and one of the most popular preachers of the age, who had a peculiar talent of reading his sermons with much life and zeal. He received one day, as he was coming out of the pulpit, a paper sent him, as he believed, by a priest, containing a sort of challenge upon some points of controversy, touched by him in some of his sermons. Upon this, he, not knowing to whom he should send an answer, preached a sermon in answer to it; and, after he had confuted it, he concluded shewing how unreasonable it was for protestants to change their religion on such grounds. This was carried to court, and represented there, as a reflection on the king for changing on those grounds.

The information, as to the words pretended to be spoken by Sharp, was false, as he himself assured me; but, without enquiring into that, the earl of Sunderland sent an order to the bishop of London (Compton), in the king's name, requiring him to suspend Sharp immediately, and then to examine the matter. The bishop answered, that he had no power to proceed in such a summary way; but, if an accusation were brought into his court in a regular way, he would proceed to such a censure, as could be warranted by the ecclesiastical law: yet, he said, he would do that which was in his power, and should be upon the matter a suspension; for he desired Sharp to abstain from officiating, till the matter should be better understood. But to lay such a censure on a clergyman, as a suspension, without proof, in a judiciary proceeding, was contrary both to law and justice. Sharp went to court to shew the notes of his sermon, which he was ready to swear were those from which he had read it, by which the falsehood of the information would appear. But, since he was not suspended, he was not admitted. Yet he was let alone; and it was resolved to proceed against the bishop of London for contempt.

Jeffreys was much sunk at court, and Herbert was the most in favour. But now Jeffreys, to recommend himself, offered a bold and illegal advice, for setting up an ecclesiastical commission, without calling it the high commission, pretending it was only a standing court of delegates. The act that put down the high commission in the year 1640 had provided by a clause, as full as could be conceived, that no court should be ever set up for those matters, besides the ordinary ecclesiastical courts. Yet, in contempt of that, a court was erected, with full power to proceed in a summary and arbitrary way in all ecclesiastical matters, without limitations to any rule of law in their proceedings. This stretch of the supremacy, so contrary to law, was assumed by a king, whose religion made him condemn all that supremacy, that the law had vested in the crown.

The persons with whom this power was lodged, were the archbishop of Canterbury (Sancroft), and the bishops of Duresme (Crew), and Rochester (Sprat), and the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer (Rochester), and lord chief justice (Herbert), the lord chancellor being made president in the court "sine quo non;" for they would trust this to no other management. The bishop of London was marked out to be the first sacrifice. Sancroft lay silent at Lambeth. He seemed zealous against popery in private discourse; but he was of such a timorous temper, and so set on the enriching his nephew, that he shewed no sort of courage. He would not go to this court when it was first opened, and declare against it, and give his reasons why he could not sit and act in it, judging it to be against law: but he contented himself with his not going to it. The other two bishops were more compliant. Duresme was lifted up with it, and said, now his name would be recorded in history: and when some of his friends represented to him the danger of acting in a court so illegally constituted, he said, he could not live if he should lose the king's gracious smiles; so low, and so fawning was he*. Dolben, archbishop of York, died this year. So, as Sprat had succeeded him in Rochester, he had some hopes let fall of succeeding likewise in York: but the court had laid it down for a maxim, to keep all the great sees, that should become vacant, still empty, till they might fill them to their own mind: so he was mistaken in his expectations, if he ever had them.

The bishop of London was the first person that was summoned to appear before this new court. He was attended by many persons of great quality, which gave a new offence: and the lord chancellor treated him in that brutal way, that was now become as it were natural to him. The bishop said, here was a new court of which he knew nothing: so he desired a copy of the commission that authorised them. And after he had drawn out the matters by delays for some time, hoping that the king might accept of some general and respectful submission, and so let the matter fall; at last he came to make his defence, all secret methods to divert the storm proving ineffectual. The first part of it was an exception to the authority of the court, as being not only founded on no law, but contrary to the express words of the act of parliament, that put down the high commission. Yet this point was rather insinuated, than urged with the force that might have been used; for it was said, that, if the bishop should insist too much on that, it would draw a much heavier measure of indignation on him; therefore it was rather opened, and modestly represented to the court, than strongly argued. But it may be easily believed, that those who sat by virtue of this illegal commission would maintain their own authority. The other part of the bishop of London's plea was, that he had obeyed the king's orders, as far as he legally could; for he had obliged Dr. Sharp to act as a man that was suspended; but that he could not lay an ecclesiastical censure on any of his clergy without a process, and articles, and some proof brought. This was justified by the constant practice of the ecclesiastical courts, and by the judgment of all lawyers. But arguments, how strong soever, are feeble things, when a sentence is resolved on before the cause is heard. So it was proposed, that he should be suspended during the king's pleasure. The lord chancellor, and the poor-spirited bishop of Duresme were for this: but the earl and bishop of Rochester, and the lord chief justice Herbert, were for acquitting him. There was not so much as a colour of law to support the sentence; so none could be given.

* Of this prelate, Dr. Nathaniel Crew, it is unnecessary to relate more than is told in his epitaph; for he was a base-spirited, fawning, vain, ambitious truckler to the higher powers; who bought his preferment by a bribe of some thousands to Nell Gwyn, and whose charities were not bestowed until the last days of his existence. If more full particulars are required, they will be found in the Biographia Britannica, by Dr. Kippis, Wood's Athenae Oxon. and Hutchinson's Hist. of Durham. His epitaph, in Stene chapel, Northamptonshire, is as follows;—

"Near this place lieth the body of the right reverend, and right honourable Nathaniel, Lord Crew, lord bishop of Durham, and baron Stene, fifth son of John Lord Crew. He was born Jan. 31, 1633; was consecrated bishop of Oxford, 1671: translated to Durham in 1674; was clerk of the closet, and privy councillor in the reigns of king Charles the Second, and king James the Second, and died Sept. 18, 1721, aged eighty-eight"

But the king was resolved to carry this point, and spoke roundly about it to the earl of Rochester. He saw he must either concur in the sentence, or part with the white staff. So he yielded. And the bishop was suspended ab officio. They did not think fit to meddle with his revenues. For the lawyers had settled that point, that benefices were of the nature of freeholds. So, if the sentence had gone to the temporalities, the bishop would have had the matter tried over again in the king's bench, where he was likely to find good justice, Herbert not being satisfied with the legality and justice of the sentence. While this matter was in dependence, the princess of Orange thought it became her, to interpose a little in the bishop's favour. He had confirmed, and married her. So she wrote to the king, earnestly begging him to be gentle to the bishop, who she could not think would offend willingly. She also wrote to the bishop, expressing the great share she took in the trouble he was fallen into. The prince wrote to him to the same purpose. The king wrote an answer to the princess, reflecting severely on the bishop, not without some sharpness on her for meddling in such matters; yet the court seemed uneasy, when they saw they had gained so poor a victory; for now the bishop was more considered than ever. His clergy, for all the suspension, were really more governed by the secret intimations of his pleasure, than they had been by his authority before. So they resolved to come off as well as they could. Dr. Sharp was admitted to offer a general petition, importing how sorry he was, to find himself under the king's displeasure: upon which he was dismissed with a gentle reprimand, and suffered to return to the exercise of his function. According to the form of the ecclesiastical courts, a person under such a suspension must make a submission within six months; otherwise he may be proceeded against as obstinate. So, six months after the sentence, the bishop sent a petition to the king, desiring to be restored to the exercise of his episcopal function. But he made no acknowledgment of any fault: so this had no other effect, but that it stopped all further proceedings; only the suspension lay still on him. I have laid all this matter together, though the progress of it ran into the year eighty-seven.

Affairs in Scotland went on much at the same rate as they did in England. Some few proselytes were gained; but as they were very few, so they could do little service to the side to which they joined themselves. The earl of Perth prevailed with his lady, as she was dying, to change her religion: and in a very few weeks after her death he married very indecently a sister of the duke of Gordon's. They were first cousins; and yet, without staying for a dispensation from Rome, they ventured on a marriage, upon the assurances that they said their confessor gave them, that it would be easily obtained. But Pope Innocent was a stiff man, and did not grant those things easily: so that cardinal Howard could not at first obtain it. The pope said, these were strange converts, that would venture on such a thing without first obtaining a dispensation. The cardinal pretended, that new converts did not so soon understand the laws of the church; but he laid before the pope the ill consequences of offending converts of such importance. So he prevailed at last, not without great difficulty. The earl of Perth set up a private chapel in the court for mass, which was not kept so private, but that many frequented it.

The town of Edinburgh was much alarmed at this; and the rabble broke in with such fury, that they defaced every thing in the chapel: and if the earl of Perth had not been conveyed away in disguise, he had very probably fallen a sacrifice to popular rage. The guards upon the alarm came, and dispersed the rabble: some were taken; and one that was a ring-leader in the tumult was executed for it. When he was at the place of execution, he told one of the ministers of the town, that was with him assisting him with his prayers, that he was offered his life, if he would accuse the duke of Queensborough as the person that had set on the tumult, but he would not save his life by so false a calumny. Mr. Macom, the minister, was an honest but weak man. So, when the criminal charged him to make this discovery, he did not call any of those who were present to bear witness of it: but in the simplicity of his heart he went from the execution to the archbishop of St. Andrews, and told him what had passed. The archbishop acquainted the duke of Queensborough with it: and he wrote to court, and complained of it. The king ordered the matter to be examined. So the poor minister, having no witness to attest what the criminal had said to him, was declared the forger of that calumny: and upon that he was turned out. But how severely soever those in authority may handle a poor incautious man, yet the public is apt to judge true. And, in this case, as the minister's weakness and misfortune was pitied, so the earl of Perth's malice and treachery was as much detested.

In summer this year, the earl of Murray, another new convert, was sent the king's commissioner to hold a parliament in Scotland, and to try if it would be more compliant than the English parliament had been. The king did by his letter recommend to them, in very earnest words, the taking off all penal laws and tests relating to religion. And all possible methods were used to prevail on a majority. But two accidents happened before the opening the parliament, which made great impression on the minds of many.

Whitford, son to one of their bishops before the wars, had turned papist. He was the person that killed Darislaus in Holland; and, that he might get out of Cromwell's reach, he had gone into the duke of Savoy's service, and was there when the last massacre was committed on the Vaudois. He had committed many barbarous murders with his own hands, and had a small pension given him after the restoration. He died a few days before the parliament met; and called for some ministers, and to them declared his forsaking of popery, and his abhorrence of it for its cruelty. He said, he had been guilty of some execrable murders in Piedmont, both of women and children, which had pursued him with an intolerable horror of mind ever after. He had gone to priests of all sorts, the strictest as well as the easiest, and they had justified him in what he had done, and had given him absolution. But his conscience pursued him so, that he died as in despair, crying out against that bloody religion.

The other was more solemn. Sir Robert Sibbald, a doctor of physic, and the most learned antiquary in Scotland, who had lived in a course of philosophical virtue, but in great doubts as to revealed religion, was prevailed on by the earl of Perth to turn papist, in hopes to find that certainty among them, which he could not arrive at upon his own principles. But he had no sooner done this, than he began to be ashamed, that he had made such a step upon so little enquiry. So he went to London, and retired for some months from all company, and went into a deep course of study, by which he came to see into the errors of popery, with so full a conviction, that he came down to Scotland some weeks before the parliament, and could not be at quiet till he had published his recantation openly in a church. The bishop of Edinburgh was so much a courtier, that, apprehending many might go to hear it, and that it might give offence at court, he sent him to do it in a church in the country. But the recantation of so learned a man, upon so much study, had a great effect upon many*.

Rosse and Paterson, the two governing bishops, resolved to let the king see how compliant they would be. And they procured an address to be signed by several of their bench, offering to concur with the king in all that he desired, with relation to those of his own religion, (for the courtly style now was not to name popery any other way than by calling it the king's religion) provided the laws might still continue in force and be executed against the presbyterians. With this Paterson was sent up. He communicated the matter to the earl of Middleton, who advised him never to shew that paper; it would be made use of against them, and render them odious: and the king and all his priests were so sensible, that it was an indecent thing for them to pretend to any special favour, that they were resolved to move for nothing but a general toleration. And so he persuaded him to go back without presenting it. This was told me by one who had it from the earl himself.

When the session of parliament was opened, duke Hamilton was silent in the debate. He promised he would not oppose the motion; but he would not be active to promote it. The duke of Queensborough was also silent; but the king was made believe that he managed the opposition under hand. Rosse and Paterson did so entirely forget what became their characters, that they used their utmost endeavours to persuade the parliament to comply with the king's desire. The archbishop of Glasgow opposed it, but fearfully. The bishop of Dunkeld, Bruce, did it openly and resolutely; and so did the bishop of Galloway. The rest were silent, but were resolved to vote for the continuance of the laws. Such was the meanness of most of the nobility, and of the other members, that few did hope that a resistance to the court could be maintained. Yet the parliament would consent to nothing, further than to a suspension of those laws during the king's life. The king despised this: so the session was put off, and the parliament was quickly dissolved. And, soon after that, both the archbishop of Glasgow and the bishop of Dunkeld were turned out, by an express command from the king. And Paterson was made archbishop of Glasgow. And one Hamilton, noted for profaneness and impiety, that sometimes broke out into blasphemy, was made bishop of Dunkeld. No reason was assigned for turning out those bishops, but the king's pleasure.

The nation, which was become very corrupt, and both ignorant and insensible in the matters of religion, began now to return to its old zeal against popery. Few proselytes were made after this. The episcopal clergy were in many places so sunk into sloth and ignorance, that they were not capable of conducting this zeal. Some of them about Edinburgh, and in divers other places, began to mind those matters, and recovered some degrees of credit by the opposition they made to popery. But the presbyterians, though they were now freed from the great severities they had long smarted under, yet expressed on all occasions their unconquerable aversion to popery. So the court was soon convinced, that they were not to be depended on.

But, what opposition soever the king met with in the isle of Britain, things went on more to his mind in Ireland. The earl of Clarendon, upon his first coming over, gave public and positive assurances that the king would maintain their act of settlement. This he did very often, and very solemnly; and proceeded accordingly. In the mean while the earl of Tirconnel went on more roundly. He not only put Irish papists into such posts in the army as became void, but upon the slightest pretences he broke the English protestant officers, to make room for the others: and in conclusion, without so much as pretending a colour for it, he turned them all out. And now an army, paid by virtue of the act of settlement to secure it, was wrested out of legal hands, and put in the hands of those who were engaged, both in religion and interest, to destroy the settlement, and those concerned in it; which was too gross a violation of law to be in any sort palliated. So the English protestants of Ireland looked on themselves as at mercy, since the army was now made up of their enemies. And all that the lord lieutenant, or the lord chancellor could say, did not quiet their fears: good words could not give security against such deeds as they saw every day. Upon this the earl of Clarendon, and the earl of Tirconnel, fell into perpetual jarrings, and were making such complaints one of another, that the king resolved to put an end to those disorders by recalling both the earl of Clarendon and Porter. He made the earl of Tirconnel lord lieutenant, and Fitton lord chancellor, who were both not only professed but zealous papists. Fitton knew no other law but the king's pleasure*.

This struck all people there with great terror, when a man of Tirconnel's temper, so entirely trusted and depended on by the Irish, capable of the boldest undertakings, and of the cruelest execution, had now the government put so entirely in his hands. The papists of England either dissembled very artificially, or they were much troubled at this, which gave so great an alarm every where. It was visible, that father Peter, and the Jesuits, were resolved to engage the king so far, that matters should be put past all retreating and compounding; that so the king might think no more of governing by parliament, but by a military force; and, if that should not stick firm to him, by assistance from France, and by an Irish army.

An accident happened at this time, that gave the queen great offence, and put the priests much out of countenance. The king continued to go still to Mrs. Sedley; and she gained so much on him, that at last she prevailed to be made countess of Dorchester. As soon as the queen heard of this, she gave order to bring all the priests that were admitted to a particular confidence, into her closet. And, when she had them about her, she sent to desire the king to come and speak to her. When he came, he was surprised to see such a company about her, but much more when they fell all on their knees before him. And the queen broke out into a bitter mourning for this new honour, which they expected would be followed with the setting her up openly as mistress. The queen was then in an ill habit of body, and had an illness that, as was thought, would end in a consumption. And it was believed that her sickness was of such a nature, that it gave a very melancholy presage, that, if she should live, she could have no children. The priests said to the king, that a blemish in his life blasted their designs; and the more it appeared, and the longer it was continued, the more ineffectual all their endeavours would prove. The king was much moved with this, and was out of countenance for what he had done. But to quiet them all, he promised them, that he would see the lady no more; and pretended, that he gave her this title in order to the breaking with her the more decently. And, when the queen did not seem to believe this, he promised that he would send her to Ireland, which was done accordingly: but after a stay there for some months, she came over again; and that ill commerce was still continued. The priests were no doubt the more apprehensive of this, because she was bold and lively, and was always treating them and their proceedings with great contempt*.

The court was now much set on making of converts, which failed in most instances, and produced repartees, that, whether true or false, were much repeated, and were heard with great satisfaction.

The earl of Mulgrave was lord chamberlain. He was apt to comply in every thing that he thought might be acceptable; for he went with the king to mass, and kneeled at it; and, being looked on as indifferent to all religions, the priests made an attack on him. He heard them gravely arguing for transubstantiation. He told them, he was willing to receive instruction: he had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who had made the world and all men in it; but it must not be an ordinary force of argument that could make him believe that man was quits with God, and made God again.

The earl of Middleton had married into a popish family, and was a man of great parts and a generous temper, but of loose principles in religion. So a priest was sent to instruct him. He began with transubstantiation, of which he said he would convince him immediately: and began thus, "You believe the Trinity." Middleton stopped him, and said, "Who told you so?" At which he seemed amazed. So the earl said, he expected he should convince him of his belief, but not question him of his own. With this the priest was so disordered, that he could proceed no further. One day the king gave the duke of Norfolk the sword of state to carry before him to the chapel; and he stood at the door. Upon which the king said to him, "My lord, your father would have gone further:" to which the duke answered, "Your majesty's father was the better man, and he would not have gone so far." Kirk was also spoken to, to change his religion; and replied briskly, that he was already pre-engaged, for he had promised the king of Morocco, that if ever he changed his religion, he would turn Mahometan.

But the person that was the most considered, was the earl of Rochester. He told me, that upon the duke of Monmouth's defeat, the king did so immediately turn to other measures, that, though before that the king talked to him of all his affairs with great freedom, and commonly every morning of the business that was to be done that day; yet the very day after the duke's execution the king changed his method, and never talked more to him of any

* Catherine Sedley was more distinguished for her wit and taste than for her beauty. Charles the Second once declared he thought his brother's mistresses were given to him by his confessor as penance. She was the daughter of Sir Charles Sedley, noticed in a previous page. The priests at length prevailed, and she was ordered to retire into France, or her pension of 4,000*l.* would cease.—(Bersby's Memoirs.) Her daughter by the king married the earl of Anglesea, and the duke of Buckingham. In the reign of William, the countess of Dorchester having returned to England, married the earl of Portmore. She continued to correspond with the exiled king; and her letters being intercepted, she was in danger of an impeachment. She died in 1717.—(Singer's Clarendon Correspondence; Dalrymple's Memoirs; Grainger.) She had more wit than discretion. Meeting the duchess of Portsmouth and lady Orkney in the palace of George the First, she exclaimed, "Who would have thought we three w——s should meet here?" Speaking of some others of James the Second's favourites, she said, "Why does he choose us? we are none of us handsome; and if we have wit, he has not enough to find it out." To her two sons by the earl of Portmore, she observed, "If any body should call you sons of a w——e, you must bear it, for you are so; but if they call you bastards, fight till you die, for you are an honest man's sons."—Noble's History.

business, but what concerned the treasury : so that he saw he had now no more the root he formerly had. He was looked on as so much united to the clergy, that the papists were all set against him. He had, in a want of money, procured a considerable loan, by which he was kept in his post longer than was intended. At last, as he related the matter to me, the king spoke to him, and desired he would suffer himself to be instructed in religion. He answered, he was fully satisfied about his religion : but upon the king's pressing it, that he would hear his priests, he said, he desired then to have some of the English clergy present, to which the king consented ; only he excepted to Tillotson and Stillingfleet. Lord Rochester said, he would take those who should happen to be in waiting ; for the forms of the chapel were still kept up. And doctor Patrick and Jane were the men. Upon this a day was set for the conference.

But his enemies had another story. He had notice given him, that he would shortly lose the white staff : upon which his lady, who was then sick, wrote to the queen, and begged she would honour her so far as to come, and let her have some discourse with her. The queen came, and stayed above two hours with her. She complained of the ill offices that were done them. The queen said, all the protestants were now turning against them, so that they knew not how they could trust any of them. Upon which that lady said, her lord was not so wedded to any opinion, as not to be ready to be better instructed. And it was said, that this gave the rise to the king's proposing a conference ; for it has been observed to be a common method of making proselytes with the more pomp, to propose a conference : but this was generally done, after they were well assured, that, let the conference go which way it might, the person's decision for whom it was appointed should be on their side. The earl denied he knew any thing of all this to me : and his lady died not long after. It was further said by his enemies, that the day before the conference he had an advertisement from a sure hand, that nothing he could do would maintain him in his post, and that the king had engaged himself to put the treasury in commission, and to bring some of the popish lords into it. Patrick told me, that at the conference there was no occasion for them to say much.

The priests began the attack ; and, when they had done, the earl said, if they had nothing stronger to urge, he would not trouble those learned gentlemen to say any thing ; for he was sure he could answer all that he had heard. And so answered it all with much heat and spirit, not without some scorn, saying, were these grounds to persuade men to change their religion ? This he urged over and over again with great vehemence. The king, seeing in what temper he was, broke off the conference, charging all that were present to say nothing of it *.

Soon after that he lost his white staff, but had a pension of 4,000*l.* a year for his own life and his son's, besides his grant upon the lord Grey, and another valued at 20,000*l.* So here were great regards had to him : no place having ever been sold, even by a person in favour, to such advantage. The sum that he had procured to be lent the king being 400,000*l.*, and it being all ordered to go towards the repair of the fleet, this began to be much talked of. The stores were very ill furnished ; and the vessels themselves were in decay. But now orders were given, with great dispatch to put the whole fleet in condition to go to sea, though the king was then in full peace with all his neighbours. Such preparations seemed to be made upon some great design.

The priests said every where, but chiefly at Rome, that the design was against the States ; and that both France and England would make war on them all of the sudden ; for it was generally known that the Dutch fleet was in no good condition. The interests of France, and of the priests, made this to be the more easily believed. The embroiling the king with the prince of Orange was that which the French desired above all other things, hoping that such a war, being successful, might put the king on excluding the prince from the succession to the crown in the right of his wife, which was the thing that both the French, and priests, desired most ; for they saw that, unless the queen had a son, all their designs must stand still at present, and turn abortive in conclusion, as long as the nation had such a successor in view.

* The "Memoirs of king James" say that this conference was an artifice of lord Sunderland's to get Rochester discharged. This and the particulars of other conferences upon the same subject, are in Singer's Clarendon Correspondence.

This carries me now to open the state of affairs in Holland, and at the prince of Orange's court. I must first say somewhat of myself: for this summer, after I had rambled above a year, I came into Holland. I stayed three, or four, months in Geneva, and Switzerland, after I came out of Italy. I stayed also some time among the Lutherans at Strasburg and Franckfort, and among the Calvinists at Heidleberg. Besides the further opportunities I had to know their way in Holland, I made it my business to observe all their methods, and to know all the eminent men among them. I saw the churches of France in their best state, while they were every day looking when this dreadful storm should break out, which has scattered them up and down the world. I was all the winter at Geneva, where we had constantly fresh stories brought us of the miseries of those who were suffering in France. Refugees were coming over every day, poor and naked, and half starved before they got thither. And that small state was under great apprehensions of being swallowed up, having no strength of their own, and being justly afraid that those at Bern would grow weary of defending them, if they should be vigorously attacked. The rest of Switzerland was not in such imminent danger: but, as they were full of refugees, and all sermons and discourses were much upon the persecution in France, so Basil was exposed in such manner, that the French could possess themselves of it when they pleased, without the least resistance. Those of Strasburg, as they have already lost their liberty, so they were every day looking for some fatal edict, like that which the French had fallen under. The churches of the Palatinate, as they are now the frontier of the empire, exposed to be destroyed by every new war, so they are fallen into the hands of a bigoted family. All the other churches on the Rhine see how near they are to ruin. And as the United Provinces were a few years before this very near being swallowed up, so they were now well assured that two great kings designed to ruin them.

Under so cloudy a prospect it should be expected, that a spirit of true devotion and of a real reformation should appear more, both among the clergy and laity; that they should all apprehend that God was highly offended with them, and was therefore punishing some, and threatening others, in a most unusual manner. It might have been expected, that those unhappy contests between Lutherans and Calvinists, Arminians, and anti-Arminians, with some minuter disputes that have enflamed Geneva and Switzerland, should have been at least suspended, while they had a common enemy to deal with, against whom their whole force united was scarce able to stand. But these things were carried on rather with more eagerness, and sharpness, than ever. It is true, there has appeared much of a primitive charity towards the French refugees; they have been in all places well received, kindly treated, and bountifully supplied. Yet even among them there did not appear a spirit of piety and devotion suitable to their condition: though persons who have willingly suffered the loss of all things, and have forsaken their country, their houses, estates, and their friends, and some of them their nearest relations, rather than sin against their consciences, must be believed to have a deeper principle in them, than can well be observed by others.

I was indeed amazed at the labours and learning of the ministers among the reformed. They understood the scriptures well in the original tongues: they had all the points of controversy very ready, and did thoroughly understand the whole body of divinity. In many places they preached every day, and were almost constantly employed in visiting their flock. But they performed their devotions but slightly, and read their prayers, which were too long, with great precipitation and little zeal. Their sermons were too long and too dry: and they were so strict, even to jealousy, in the smallest points in which they put orthodoxy, that one who could not go into all their notions, but was resolved not to quarrel with them, could not converse much with them with any freedom. I have, upon all the observation that I have made, often considered the inward state of the reformation, and the decay of the vitals of Christianity in it, as that which gives more melancholy impressions than all the outward dangers that surround it.

In England things were much changed, with relation to the court, in the compass of a year. The terror all people were under from an ill chosen, and an ill constituted, parliament, was now almost over; and the clergy were come to their wits, and were beginning to recover their reputation. The nation was like to prove much firmer than could have been expected, especially in so short a time. Yet after all, though many were like to prove themselves better protestants than was looked for, they were not become much better Christians; and few were turning to a stricter course of life: nor were the clergy more diligent in their labours among their people, in which respect it must be confessed that the English clergy are the most remiss of any. The curates in popery, besides their saying mass every day, their exactness to their breviary, their attending on confessions and the multiplicity of offices to which they are obliged, do so labour in instructing the youth, and visiting the sick, that, in all the places in which I could observe them, it seemed to be the constant employment of their lives: and in the foreign churches, though the labours of the ministers may seem mean, yet they are perpetually in them. All these things lay so much on my thoughts, that I was resolved to retire into some private place, and to spend the rest of my life in a course of stricter piety and devotion, and in writing such books, as the state of matters with relation to religion should call for, whether in points of speculation or practice. All my friends advised my coming near England, that I might be easier sent to, and informed of all our affairs, and might accordingly employ my thoughts and time. So I came down the Rhine this summer, and was resolved to have settled in Groning or Friesland.

When I came to Utrecht, I found letters written to me by some of the prince of Orange's court, desiring me to come first to the Hague, and wait on the prince and princess, before I should settle any where. Upon my coming to the Hague, I was admitted to wait on them. I found they had received such characters of me from England, that they resolved to treat me with great confidence; for, at my first being with them, they entered into much free discourse with me concerning the affairs of England. The prince, though naturally cold and reserved, yet laid aside a great deal of that with me. He seemed highly dissatisfied with the king's conduct. He apprehended that he would give such jealousies of himself, and come under such jealousies from his people, that these would throw him into a French management, and engage him into such desperate designs as would force violent remedies. There was a gravity in his whole deportment that struck me. He seemed very regardless of himself, and not apt to suspect designs upon his person. But I had learned somewhat of the design of a brutal Savoyard, who was capable of the blackest things, and who for a foul murder had fled into the territory of Geneva, where he lay hid in a very worthy family, to whom he had done some services before. He had formed a scheme of seizing on the prince, who used to go in his chariot often on the sands near Scheveling, with but one person with him, and a page or two on the chariot. So he offered to go in a small vessel of twenty guns, that should lie at some distance at sea, and to land in a boat with seven persons besides himself, and to seize on the prince, and bring him aboard, and so to France. This he wrote to M. de Louvoy, who upon that wrote to him to come to Paris, and ordered money for his journey. He, being a talking man, spoke of this, and shewed M. de Louvoy's letter, and the copy of his own: and he went presently to Paris. This was brought me by Mr. Fatio, the celebrated mathematician, in whose father's house that person had lodged. When I told the prince this, and had Mr. Fatio at the Hague to attest it, he was not much moved at it. The princess was more apprehensive; and by her direction I acquainted Mr. Fagel, and some others of the States, with it, who were convinced that the thing was practicable. And so the States desired the prince to suffer himself to be constantly attended on by a guard when he went abroad, with which he was not without some difficulty brought to comply. I fancied his belief of predestination made him more adventurous than was necessary. But he said as to that, he firmly believed a providence; for if he should let that go, all his religion would be much shaken; and he did not see how providence could be certain, if all things did not arise out of the absolute will of God. I found those who had the charge of his education, had taken more care to possess him with the Calvinistical notions of absolute decrees, than to guard him against the ill effects of those opinions in practice: for in Holland the main thing the ministers infuse into their people, is an abhorrence of the Arminian doctrine, which spreads so much there, that their jealousies of it make them look after that, more than after the most important matters.

The prince had been much neglected in his education; for all his life long he hated constraint. He spoke little. He put on some appearance of application; but he hated business of all sorts; yet he hated talking, and all house games more. This put him on a perpetual course of hunting, to which he seemed to give himself up, beyond any man I ever knew : but I looked on that always as a flying from company and business. The depression of France was the governing passion of his whole life. He had no vice, but of one sort, in which he was very cautious and secret. He had a way that was affable and obliging to the Dutch ; but he could not bring himself to comply enough with the temper of the English, his coldness and slowness being very contrary to the genius of the nation.

The princess possessed all that conversed with her with admiration. Her person was majestic and created respect. She had great knowledge, with a true understanding, and a noble expression. There was a sweetness in her deportment that charmed, and an exactness in piety and virtue that made her a pattern to all that saw her. The king gave her no appointments to support the dignity of a king's daughter ; nor did he send her any presents, or jewels, which was thought a very indecent, and certainly was a very ill-advised thing. For the settling an allowance for her and the prince would have given such a jealousy of them, that the English would have apprehended a secret correspondence and confidence between them ; and the not doing it shewed the contrary very evidently. But, though the prince did not increase her court and state upon this additional dignity, she managed her privy purse so well, that she became eminent in her charities : and the good grace with which she bestowed favours did always increase their value. She had read much, both in history and divinity. And when a course of humours in her eyes forced her from that, she set herself to work with such a constant diligence, that she made the ladies about her ashamed to be idle. She knew little of our affairs till I was admitted to wait on her. And I began to lay before her the state of our court, and the intrigues in it, ever since the restoration ; which she received with great satisfaction, and shewed true judgment, and a good mind, in all the reflections that she made. I will only mention one in this place : she asked me, what had sharpened the king so much against Mr. Jurieu, the most copious, and the most zealous writer of the age, who wrote with great vivacity as well as learning. I told her, he mixed all his books with a most virulent acrimony of style, and among other things he had written with great indecency of Mary Queen of Scots, which cast reflections on them that were descended from her ; and was not very decent in one, that desired to be considered as zealous for the prince and herself. She said, Jurieu was to support the cause that he defended, and to expose those that persecuted it, in the best way he could. And, if what he said of Mary Queen of Scots was true, he was not to be blamed, who made that use of it : and, she added, that if princes would do ill things, they must expect that the world will take revenges on their memory, since they cannot reach their persons : that was but a small suffering, far short of what others suffered at their hands. So far I have given the character of those persons, as it appeared to me upon my first admittance to them. I shall have occasion to say much more of them in the sequel of this work.

I found the prince was resolved to make use of me. He told me it would not be convenient for me to live any where but at the Hague ; for none of the outlawed persons came thither. So I would keep myself, by staying there, out of the danger that I might legally incur by conversing with them, which would be unavoidable if I lived any where else. He also recommended me both to Fagel, Dykvelt, and Halewyn's confidence, with whom he chiefly consulted. I had a mind to see a little into the prince's notions, before I should engage myself deeper into his service. I was afraid lest his struggle with the Louvestein party, as they were called, might have given him a jealousy of liberty and of a free government. He assured me, it was quite the contrary : nothing but such a constitution could resist a powerful aggressor long, or have the credit that was necessary to raise such sums, as a great war might require. He condemned all the late proceedings in England, with relation to the charters, and expressed his sense of a legal and limited authority very fully. I told him, I was such a friend to liberty, that I could not be satisfied with the point of religion alone, unless it was accompanied with the securities of law. I asked his senses of the church of England. He said, he liked our worship well, and our government in the church, as much better than parity ; but he blamed our condemning the foreign churches, as he had observed some of our divines did. I told him, whatever some hotter men might say, all were not of that mind. When he found I was in my opinion for toleration, he said, that was all he would ever desire to bring us to, for quieting our contentions at home. He also promised to me, that he should never be prevailed with to set up the Calvinistical notions of the decrees of God, to which I did imagine some might drive him. He wished some of our ceremonies, such as the surplice and the cross in baptism, with our bowing to the altar, might be laid aside. I thought it necessary to enter with him into all these particulars, that so I might be furnished from his own mouth, to give a full account of his sense to some in England, who would expect it of me, and were disposed to believe what I should assure them of. This discourse was of some hours' continuance: and it passed in the princess's presence. Great notice came to be taken of the free access and long conferences I had with them both. I told him, it was necessary for his service, to put the fleet of Holland in a good condition. And this he proposed soon after to the States, who gave the hundredth penny for a fund to perfect that. I moved to them both, the writing to the bishop of London, and to the king concerning him. And, though the princess feared it might irritate the king too much, in conclusion I persuaded them to it.

The king, hearing of this admission I had, began in two or three letters to reflect on me, as a dangerous man, whom they ought to avoid and beware of. To this no answer was made. Upon the setting up the ecclesiastical commission, some from England pressed them to write over against it, and to begin a breach upon that. I told them, I thought that was no way advisable: they could not be supposed to understand our laws so well, as to oppose those things on their own knowledge; so that I thought this could not be expected by them, till some resolute person would dispute the authority of the court, and bring it to an argument, and so to a solemn decision. I likewise said, that I did not think every error in government would warrant a breach: if the foundations were struck at, that would vary the case; but illegal acts in particular instances could not justify such a conclusion. The prince seemed surprised at this; for the king made me pass for a rebel in my heart: and he now saw how far I was from it. I continued on this ground to the last.

That which fixed me in their confidence was, the liberty I took, in a private conversation with the princess, to ask her, what she intended the prince should be, if she came to the crown. She, who was new to all matters of that kind, did not understand my meaning, but fancied that whatever accrued to her would likewise accrue to him in the right of marriage. I told her it was not so: and I explained king Henry the Seventh's title to her, and what had passed when Queen Mary married Philip king of Spain. I told her, a titular kingship was no acceptable thing to a man, especially if it was to depend on another's life: and such a nominal dignity might endanger the real one that the prince had in Holland. She desired me to propose a remedy. I told her the remedy, if she could bring her mind to it, was to be contented to be his wife, and to engage herself to them, that she would give him the real authority as soon as it came into her hands, and endeavour effectually to get it to be legally vested in him during life: this would lay the greatest obligation on him possible, and lay the foundation of a perfect union between them, which had been of late a little embroiled: this would also give him another sense of all our affairs: I asked pardon for the presumption of moving her in such a tender point: but I solemnly protested, that no person living had moved me in it, or so much as knew of it, or should ever know of it, but as she should order it. I hoped she would consider well of it; for, if she once declared her mind, I hoped she would never go back or retract it. I desired her therefore to take time to think of it. She presently answered me, she would take no time to consider of any thing, by which she could express her regard and affection to the prince; and ordered me to give him an account of all that I had laid before her, and to bring him to her, and I should hear what she would say upon it. He was that day a hunting; and next day I acquainted him with all that had passed, and carried him to her; where she in a very frank manner told him, that she did not know that the laws of England were so contrary to the laws of God, as I had informed her: she did not think that the husband was ever to be obedient to the wife: she promised him he should always bear rule; and she asked only, that he would obey the command of "husbands love your wives," as she should do that, "wives be obedient to your husbands in all things." From this lively introduction we engaged into a long discourse of the affairs of England. Both seemed well pleased with me, and with all that I had suggested. But such was the prince's cold way, that he said not one word to me upon it, that looked like acknowledgment. Yet he spoke of it to some about him in another strain. He said, he had been nine years married, and had never the confidence to press this matter on the queen, which I had now brought about easily in a day. Ever after that he seemed to trust me entirely.

Complaints came daily over from England of all the high things that the priests were every where throwing out. Penn, the quaker, came over to Holland. He was a talking vain man, who had been long in the king's favour, he being the vice-admiral's son. He had such an opinion of his own faculty of persuading, that he thought none could stand before it: though he was singular in that opinion; for he had a tedious luscious way, that was not apt to overcome a man's reason, though it might tire his patience. He undertook to persuade the prince to come into the king's measures, and had two or three long audiences of him upon the subject: and he and I spent some hours together on it. The prince readily consented to a toleration of popery, as well as of the dissenters, provided it were proposed and passed in parliament: and he promised his assistance, if there was need of it, to get it to pass. But for the tests, he would enter into no treaty about them. He said, it was a plain betraying the security of the protestant religion to give them up. Nothing was left unsaid that might move him to agree to this in the way of interest: the king would enter into an entire confidence with him, and would put his best friends in the chief trusts. Penn undertook for this so positively, that he seemed to believe it himself, or he was a great proficient in the art of dissimulation. Many suspected that he was a concealed papist. It is certain, he was much with father Peter, and was particularly trusted by the earl of Sunderland. So, though he did not pretend any commission for what he promised, yet we looked on him as a man employed. To all this the prince answered, that no man was more for toleration in principle than he was: he thought the conscience was only subject to God: and as far as a general toleration, even of papists, would content the king, he would concur in it heartily: but he looked on the tests as such a real security, and indeed the only one, when the king was of another religion, that he would join in no counsels with those that intended to repeal those laws that enacted them. Penn said the king would have all or nothing: but that, if this was once done, the king would secure the toleration by a solemn and unalterable law. To this the late repeal of the edict of Nantes, that was declared perpetual and irrevocable, furnished an answer that admitted of no reply. So Penn's negotiation with the prince had no effect.

He pressed me to go over to England, since I was in principle for toleration: and he assured me the king would prefer me highly. I told him, since the tests must go with this toleration, I could never be for it. Among other discourses, he told me one thing, that was not accomplished in the way in which he had a mind I should believe it would be, but had a more surprising accomplishment. He told me a long series of predictions, which, as he said, he had from a man that pretended a commerce with angels, who had foretold many things that were passed very punctually. But he added, that, in the year 1688, there would such a change happen in the face of affairs as would amaze all the world. And after the Revolution, which happened that year, I asked him before much company, if that was the event that was predicted. He was uneasy at the question; but did not deny what he had told me, which, he said, he understood of the full settlement of the nation upon a toleration, by which he believed all men's minds would be perfectly quieted and united*.

* William Penn, the son of the admiral of the same name, noticed in previous pages, was born in London, during 1644. His early education was at Chigwell school, in Essex; and in 1660 he was a gentleman commoner of Christchurch, Oxford. Attracted by the preaching of a quaker named Low, he frequented their meetings, and was consequently expelled from college. His father acted in the same spirit of severity, but at length sent him to France, where he acquired the accomplishments usual at the period. Upon his return he studied the law at Lincoln's Inn, but the plague forced him thence in 1665. Proceeding to some of his father's estates in Ireland, he again met with Low, and finally became a member of the quaker fraternity, from which neither paternal nor magisterial severity could separate him. In 1668, becoming an itinerant preacher, he was sent to the Tower, where during seven months' confinement, he wrote his "No Cross, no Crown," and "Innocency with her open face," which obtained his release. When his father died he came into possession of 1,500*l.* a year, but this did not prevent his preaching, for which he was committed to Newgate. His trial came on at the Old Bailey. He pleaded his own cause, and was acquitted.—(See State Trials.) After travelling for some time in Holland and Germany, he returned to this

Now I go from this to prosecute the recital of English affairs. Two eminent bishops died this year, Pearson, bishop of Chester, and Fell, bishop of Oxford. The first of these was in all respects the greatest divine of the age: a man of great learning, strong reason, and of a clear judgment. He was a judicious and grave preacher, more instructive than affective; and a man of a spotless life, and of an excellent temper. His book on the Creed is among the best that our church has produced. He was not active in his diocese, but too remiss and easy in his episcopal function; and was a much better divine than a bishop. He was a speaking instance of what a great man could fall too: for his memory went from him so entirely, that he became a child some years before he died.

Fell, bishop of Oxford, was a man of great strictness in the course of his life, and of much devotion. His learning appears in that noble edition of St. Cyprian that he published. He had made great beginnings in learning before the Restoration; but his continued application to his employments after that, stopped the progress that otherwise he might have made. He was made soon after dean of Christchurch, and afterwards bishop of Oxford. He set himself to promote learning in the university, but most particularly in his own college, which he governed with great care: and was indeed in all respects a most exemplary man, a little too much heated in the matter of our disputes with the dissenters. But, as he was among the first of our clergy that apprehended the design of bringing in popery, so he was one of the most zealous against it. He had much zeal for reforming abuses; and managed it perhaps with too much heat, and in too peremptory a way. But we have so little of that among us, that no wonder if such men are censured by those who love not such patterns, nor such severe task-masters*.

Ward, of Salisbury, fell also under a loss of memory and understanding: so that he who was both in mathematics and philosophy, and in the strength of judgment and understanding, one of the first men of his time, though he came too late into our profession to become very eminent in it, was now a great instance of the despicable weakness to which man can fall. The court intended once to have named a coadjutor for him. But there being no precedent for that since the Reformation, they resolved to stay till he should die.

The other two bishoprics were less considerable: so they resolved to fill them with the two worst men that could be found out. Cartwright was promoted to Chester. He was a man of good capacity, and had made some progress in learning. He was ambitious and servile, cruel and boisterous, and, by the great liberties he allowed himself, he fell under much scandal of the worst sort. He had set himself long to raise the king's authority above law; which, he said, was only a method of government to which kings might submit as they pleased; but their authority was from God, absolute and superior to law, which they might country. In 1672 he married and settled at Rickmansworth. In 1681, king Charles, in return for his father's services, and in consideration of a debt due to him from the crown, granted Penn a province of North America. He then devoted himself to establishing a colony there, and to prepare for it a constitution. His liberal and enlightened conduct secured the success of this new country, now so well known as Pennsylvania.—(See "Frame of Government of Pennsylvania.") Penn was much courted and favoured by James the Second, but the "Clarendon Correspondence" informs us that he laboured to thwart the jesuitical influence that predominated in that reign. Notwithstanding, William the Third and others suspected him of favouring the Romish creed; and though he fully refuted this suspicion, (see his correspondence with archbishop Tillotson) yet the king assured a friend of the earl of Dartmouth, that "Penn is no more a quaker than I am."—(Oxford edition of this work.) Queen Anne favoured him, and he constantly attended her court, which certainly does not accord with the practice of his sect. A law-suit involved him in more trouble; but whilst retired within the rules of the Fleet prison, he found opportunity to write his "Fruits of Solitude," and "Fruits of a Father's Love." Finally, overcoming his difficulties, he retired to his elegant residence at Ruscomb, near Twyford, in Buckinghamshire and died there in 1718. Burnet speaks of him too unfavourably; he was unquestionably a man of sound sense and wit; benevolent and just. Dean Swift says, "he spoke very agreeably, and with much spirit."—See Clarkson's Life of Penn, and his numerous works in Wood's Athenæ Oxon.

* Dr. John Pearson was a native of Norfolk, being born at Snoring in 1612. He was at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. His "Exposition of the Creed" consists of a course of sermons, preached at St. Clement's, Eastcheap. It needs no more commendation than is given by Burnet. In 1662 he was one of the commissioners for reviewing the liturgy. He was successively master of Jesus and Trinity colleges, Cambridge. He was promoted to the see of Chester in 1673.—Biog. Britannica.

Dr. John Fell was born in 1625, at Longworth, in Berkshire. He was educated at Thame, and Christchurch, Oxford. After various vicissitudes he was raised to the bishopric of this city in 1676. His biographies of Dr. Hammond and Dr. Allstree have had many readers. His other works are numerous and excellent.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Biog. Britannica.

exert, as oft as they found it necessary for the ends of government. So he was looked on as a man that would more effectually advance the design of popery, than if he should turn over to it. And indeed, bad as he was, he never made that step, even in the most desperate state of his affairs.

The see of Oxford was given to Dr. Parker, who was a violent independent at the time of the Restoration, with a high profession of piety in their way. But he soon changed, and struck into the highest form of the church of England; and wrote many books with a strain of contempt and fury against all the dissenters, that provoked them out of measure; of which an account was given in the history of the former reign. He had exalted the king's authority in matters of religion in so indecent a manner, that he condemned the ordinary form of saying the king was under God and Christ, as a crude and profane expression: saying, that though the king was indeed under God, yet he was not under Christ, but above him. Yet, not being preferred as he expected, he wrote after that many books, on design to raise the authority of the church to an independence on the civil power. There was an entertaining liveliness in all his books: but it was neither grave nor correct. He was a covetous and ambitious man; and seemed to have no other sense of religion but as a political interest, and a subject of party and faction. He seldom came to prayers, or to any exercises of devotion; and was so lifted up with pride, that he was become insufferable to all that came near him. These two men were pitched on as the fittest instruments that could be found among all the clergy to betray and ruin the church. Some of the bishops brought to archbishop Sancroft articles against them, which they desired he would offer to the king in council, and pray that the mandate for consecrating them might be delayed, till time were given to examine particulars. And bishop Lloyd told me, that Sancroft promised to him not to consecrate them, till he had examined the truth of the articles, of which some were too scandalous to be repeated. Yet when Sancroft saw what danger he might incur, if he were sued in a premunire, he consented to consecrate them.

The deanery of Christchurch, the most important post in the university, was given to Massey, one of the new converts, though he had neither the gravity, the learning, nor the age that was suitable to such a dignity. But all was supplied by his early conversion: and it was set up for a maxim to encourage all converts. He at first went to prayers in the chapel. But soon after he declared himself more openly*. Not long after this the president of Magdalen college died. That is esteemed the richest foundation in England, perhaps in Europe: for, though the certain rents are but about four or five thousand pounds, yet it is thought that the improved value of the estate belonging to it is about forty thousand pounds. So it was no wonder that the priests studied to get this endowment into their hands.

They had endeavoured to break in upon the university of Cambridge in a matter of less importance, but without success; and now they resolved to attack Oxford, by a strange fatality in their counsels. In all nations the privileges of colleges and universities are esteemed such sacred things, that few will venture to dispute these, much less to disturb them, when their title is good, and their possession is of a long continuance; for in these not only the present body espouses the matter, but all who have been of it, even those that have only followed their studies in it, think themselves bound in honour and gratitude to assist and support them. The priests began where they ought to have ended, when all other things were brought about to their mind. The Jesuits fancied that, if they could get footing in the university, they would gain such a reputation by their methods of teaching youth, that they would carry them away from the university tutors, who were certainly too remiss. Some of the more moderate among them proposed, that the king should endow a new college in both universities, which needed not have cost above two thousand pounds a-year, and in these set his priests to work. But either the king stuck at the charge which this would put him to, or his priests thought it too mean, and below his dignity, not to lay his hand

* Dr. Douglas justly observes that Burnet's account of this transaction leads the reader to understand that Massey, at the time of his appointment to the deanery, had not openly deserted protestantism; but we now know to the contrary. Massey produced and pleaded his disupon these great bodies : so rougher methods were resolved on. It was reckoned, that by frightening them they might be driven to compound the matter, and deliver up one or two colleges to them ; and then, as the king said sometimes in the circle, they who taught best would be most followed.

They began with Cambridge upon a softer point, which yet would have made way for all the rest. The king sent his letter, or mandamus, to order F. Francis, an ignorant benedictine monk, to be received a master of arts ; once to open the way for letting them into the degrees of the university. The truth is, the king's letters were scarce ever refused in conferring degrees ; and when ambassadors, or foreign princes, came to those places, they usually gave such degrees to those who belonged to them as were desired. The Morocco ambassador's secretary, who was a mahometan, had that degree given him ; but a great distinction was made between honorary degrees given to strangers, who intended not to live among them, and those given to such as intended to settle among them ; for every master of arts having a vote in the convocation, they reckoned that if they gave this degree, they must give all that should be pretended to on the like authority : and they knew all the king's priests would be let in upon them, which might occasion in present great distraction and contentions among them ; and in time they might grow to be a majority in the convocation, which is their parliament. They refused the mandamus with great unanimity, and with a firmness that the court had not expected from them. New and repeated orders, full of severe threatenings in case of disobedience, were sent to them : and this piece of raillery was everywhere set up, that a papist was reckoned worse than a mahometan, and that the king's letters were less considered than the ambassador from Morocco had been. Some feeble or false men of the university tried to compound the matter by granting this degree to F. Francis, but enacting at the same time, that it should not be a precedent for any other of the like nature. This was not given way to : for it was said, that in all such cases the obedience that was once paid would be a much stronger argument for continuing to do it, as oft as it should be desired, than any such proviso could be against it.

Upon this the vice-chancellor was summoned before the ecclesiastical commission to answer this contempt. He was a very honest but a very weak man. He made a poor defence. And it was no small reflection on that great body, that their chief magistrate was so little able to assert their privileges, or to justify their proceedings. He was treated with great contempt by Jeffreys*. But he having acted only as the chief person of that body, all that was thought fit to be done against him was to turn him out of his office. That was but an annual office, and of no profit : so this was a slight censure, chiefly when it was all that followed on such heavy threatenings. The university chose another vice-chancellor (Dr. Balderson), who was a man of much spirit ; and in his speech, which in course he made upon his being chosen, he promised that, during his magistracy, neither religion, nor the rights of the body, should suffer by his means. The court did not think fit to insist more upon this matter : which was too plain a confession, either of their weakness in beginning such an ill-grounded attempt, or of their feebleness in letting it fall, doing so little, after they had talked so much about it. And now all people began to see that they had taken wrong notions of the king, when they thought that it would be easy to engage him into bold things, before he could see into the ill consequences that might attend them, but that being once engaged he would resolve to go through with them at all adventures. When I knew him, he seemed to have set up that for a maxim, that a king when he made a step was never to go back, nor to encourage faction, and disobedience, by yielding to it.

After this unsuccessful attempt upon Cambridge, another was made upon Oxford, that lasted longer, and had greater effects, which I shall set all down together, though the conclusion of this affair ran far into the year after this that I now write of. The presidentship of Magdalen's was given by the election of the fellows. So the king sent a mandamus, requiring them to choose one Farmer, an ignorant and vicious person, who had not one qualification that could recommend him to so high a post, besides that of changing his religion.

* This was Dr. Peachell. The coarse manner in which he was treated by Jeffreys is fully related in Woolrych's Life of this judge.

Mandamus letters had no legal authority in them; but all the great preferments of the church being in the king's disposal, those who did pretend to favour were not apt to refuse his recommendation, lest that should be afterwards remembered to their prejudice. But now, since it was visible in what channel favour was likely to run, less regard was had to such a letter. The fellows of that house did upon this choose Dr. Hough, one of their body, who, as he was in all respects a statutable man, so he was a worthy and a firm man, not apt to be threatened out of his right. They carried their election according to their statutes to the bishop of Winchester (Dr. Mews), their visitor, and he confirmed it. So that matter was legally settled. This was highly resented at court. It was said, that, in case of a mandamus for an undeserving man, they ought to have represented the matter to the king, and staid till they had his pleasure: it was one of the chief services that the universities expected from their chancellors, which made them always choose men of great credit at court, that by their interest such letters might be either prevented or recalled. The duke of Ormond was now their chancellor; but he had little credit in the court, and was declining in his age, which made him retire into the country. It was much observed that this university, that had asserted the king's prerogative in the highest strains of the most abject flattery possible, both in their addresses and in a wild decree they had made but three years before this, in which they had laid together a set of such high-flown maxims as must establish an uncontrollable tyranny, should be the first body of the nation that should feel the effects of it most sensibly. The cause was brought before the ecclesiastical commission. The fellows were first asked why they had not chosen Farmer in obedience to the king's letter? And to that they answered by offering a list of many just exceptions against him. The subject was fruitful, and the scandals he had given were very public. The court was ashamed of him, and insisted no more on him; but they said, that the house ought to have showed more respect to the king's letter, than to have proceeded to an election in contempt of it.

The ecclesiastical commission took upon them to declare Hough's election null, and to put the house under suspension. And, that the design of the court in this matter might be carried on without the load of recommending a papist, Parker, bishop of Oxford, was now recommended; and the fellows were commanded to proceed to a new election in his favour. They excused themselves, since they were bound by their oaths to maintain their statutes: and by these, an election being once made and confirmed, they could not proceed to a new choice, till the former was annulled in some court of law: church benefices and college preferments were freeholds, and could only be judged in a court of record: and, since the king was now talking so much of liberty of conscience, it was said, that the forcing men to act against their oaths, seemed not to agree with those professions. In opposition to this it was said, that the statutes of colleges had been always considered as things that depended entirely on the king's good pleasure: so that no oaths to observe them could bind them, when it was in opposition to the king's command.

This did not satisfy the fellows: and though the king, as he went through Oxford in his progress in the year 1687, sent for them, and ordered them to go presently and choose Parker for their president, in a strain of language ill suited to the majesty of a crowned head, (for he treated them with foul language, pronounced in a very angry tone,) yet it had no effect on them. They insisted still on their oaths, though with a humility and submission that they hoped would have mollified him. They continued thus firm. A subaltern commission was sent from the ecclesiastical commission to finish the matter. Bishop Cartwright was the head of this commission, as sir Charles Hedges was the king's advocate to manage the matter. Cartwright acted in so rough a manner, that it showed he was resolved to sacrifice all things to the king's pleasure. It was an afflicting thing, which seemed to have a peculiar character of indignity in it, that this first act of violence committed against the legal possessions of the church, was executed by one bishop, and done in favour of another.

The new president was turned out. And, because he could not deliver the keys of his house, the doors were broken open: and Parker was put in possession. The fellows were required to make their submission, to ask pardon for what was passed, and to accept of the bishop for their president. They still pleaded their oath, and were all turned out, except two that submitted. So that it was expected to see that house soon stocked with papists*. The nation, as well as the university, looked on all this proceeding with a just indignation. It was thought an open piece of robbery and burglary, when men, authorised by no legal commission, came and forcibly turned men out of their possession and freehold. This agreed ill with the professions that the king was still making, that he would maintain the church of England as by law established: for this struck at the whole estate, and all the temporalities of the church. It did so inflame the church party and the clergy, that they sent over very pressing messages upon it to the prince of Orange, desiring that he would interpose and espouse the concerns of the church; and that he would break upon it, if the king would not redress it. This I did not see in their letters. Those were of such importance, since the writing them might have been carried to high treason, that the prince did not think fit to show them. But he often said, he was pressed by many of those who were afterwards his bitterest enemies, to engage in their quarrel. When that was communicated to me I was still of opinion that, though this was indeed an act of despotical and arbitrary power, yet I did not think it struck at the whole: so that it was not in my opinion a lawful case of resistance; and I could not concur in a quarrel occasioned by such a single act, though the precedent set by it might go to everything.

Now the king broke with the church of England. And, as he was apt to go warmly upon every provocation, he gave himself such liberties in discourse upon that subject, that it was plain all the services they had done him, both in opposing the exclusion and upon his first accession to the crown, were forgotten. Agents were now found out, to go among the dissenters, to persuade them to accept of the favour the king intended them, and to concur with him in his designs.

The dissenters were divided into four main bodies. The presbyterians, the independents, the anabaptists, and the quakers. The two former had not the visible distinction of different rites: and their depressed condition made, that the dispute about the constitution, and subordination, of churches, which had broken them when power was in their hands, was now out of doors: and they were looked on as one body, and were above three parts in four of all the dissenters. The main difference between these was, that the presbyterians seemed reconcilable to the church; for they loved episcopal ordination and a liturgy, and upon some amendments seemed disposed to come into the church; and they liked the civil government and limited monarchy. But as the independents were for a commonwealth in the state, so they put all the power of the church in the people, and thought that their choice was an ordination: nor did they approve of set forms of worship. Both were enemies to this high prerogative that the king was assuming, and were very averse to popery. They generally were of a mind as to the accepting the king's favour; but were not inclined to take in the papists into a full toleration, much less could they be prevailed on to concur in taking off the tests. The anabaptists were generally men of virtue, and of an universal charity: and as they were far from being in any treating terms with the church of England, so nothing but an universal toleration could make them capable of favour or employments. The quakers had set up such a visible distinction in the matter of the hat, and saying thou and thee, that they had all as it were a badge fixed on them; so they were easily known. Among these Penn had the greatest credit, as he had a free access at court. To all these it was proposed that the king designed the settling the minds of the different parties in the nation, and the

* Dr. John Hough was a native of Middlesex, and born in 1651. He was a demy of Magdalen college, Oxford. In 1681, he went as chaplain to the duke of Ormond into Ireland. He was prebendary of Worcester when elected president of his college in opposition to Anthony Farmer. Dr. Samuel Parker, who was made to supersede him, only lived a few months, and then a professed Roman catholic was appointed to the presidency, namely Bonaventure Gifford, a Sorbonne doctor and secular priest, bishop elect of Madaura. At the Revolution, Dr. Hough and the fellows of Magdalen were restored, and in 1690 he was enthroned bishop of Oxford, then of Lichfield, and finally of Worcester. He died in enriching it by enacting a perpetual law, that should be passed with such solemnities as had accompanied the Magna Charta; so that not only penal laws should be for ever repealed, but that public employments should be opened to men of all persuasions, without any tests, or oaths, limiting them to one sort, or party, of men. There were many meetings among the leading men of the several sects.

It was visible to all men, that the courting them at this time was not from any kindness or good opinion that the king had of them. They had left the church of England, because of some forms in it that they thought looked too like the church of Rome. They needed not to be told, that all the favour expected from popery was once to bring it in under the colour of a general toleration, till it should be strong enough to set on a general persecution: and therefore, as they could not engage themselves to support such an arbitrary prerogative as was now made use of, so neither should they go into any engagements for popery. Yet they resolved to let the points of controversy alone, and leave those to the management of the clergy, who had a legal bottom to support them. They did believe that this indignation against the church party, and this kindness to them, were things too unnatural to last long. So the more considerable among them resolved not to stand at too great a distance from the court, nor to provoke the king so far, as to give him cause to think they were irreconcilable to him, lest they should provoke him to make up matters on any terms with the church party. On the other hand, they resolved not to provoke the church party, or by any ill behaviour of theirs drive them into a reconciliation with the court. It is true Penn shewed both a scorn of the clergy, and virulent spite against them, in which he had not many followers.

The king was so fond of his army that he ordered them to encamp on Hounslow Heath, and to be exercised all the summer long. This was done with great magnificence, and at a vast expense; but that which abated the king's joy in seeing so brave an army about him was, that it appeared visibly, and on many occasions, that his soldiers had as great an aversion to his religion as his other subjects had expressed. The king had a chapel in his camp, where mass was said; but so few went to it, and those few were treated by the rest with so much scorn, that it was not easy to bear it. It was very plain that such an army was not to be trusted in any quarrel, in which religion was concerned.

The few papists that were in the army were an unequal match for the rest. The heats about religion were likely to breed quarrels: and it was once very near a mutiny. It was thought that these encampments had a good effect on the army. They encouraged one another, and vowed they would stick together, and never forsake their religion. It was no small comfort to them to see they had so few papists among them; which might have been better disguised at a distance, than when they were all in view. A resolution was formed upon this at court, to make recruits in Ireland, and to fill them up with Irish papists; which succeeded as ill as all their other designs did, as shall be told in its proper place.

The king had for above a year managed his correspondence with Rome secretly. But now the priests resolved to drive the matter past reconciling. The correspondence with that court, while there was none at Rome with a public character, could not be decently managed, but by cardinal Howard's means. He was no friend to the Jesuits; nor did he like their over-driving matters. So they moved the king to send an ambassador to Rome. This was high treason by law. Jeffreys was very uneasy at it. But the king's power of pardoning had been much argued in the earl of Danby's case, and was believed to be one of the unquestionable rights of the crown. So he knew a safe way in committing crimes: which was, to take out pardons as soon as he had done illegal things.

The king's choice of Palmer, earl of Castlemain, was liable to great exception. For, as he was believed to be a Jesuit, so he was certainly as hot and eager in all high notions, as any of them could be. The Romans were amazed when they heard that he was to be the person. His misfortunes were so eminent and public, that they who take their measures much from astrology, and from the characters they think are fixed on men, thought it strange to see such a negotiation put in the hands of so unlucky a man. It was managed with great splendour, and at a vast charge*.

* For an account of this embassy, and its pageantry, see Misson's "Voyage to Italy," ii. 256.

He was unhappy in every step of it. He disputed with a nice sort of affectation every punctilio of the ceremonial. And when the day, set for his audience, came, there happened to be such an extraordinary thunder, and such deluges of rain, as disgraced the show, and heightened the opinion of the ominousness of this embassy. After this was over, he had yet many disputes with relation to the ceremony of visits. The points he pressed were, first, the making P. Renaldi, of Este, the queen's uncle, a cardinal : in which he prevailed ; and it was the only point in which he succeeded. He tried if it was possible to get father Petre to be made a cardinal. But the pope was known to be intractable in that point, having fixed it as a maxim not to raise any of that order to the purple. Count Mansfield told me, as he came from Spain, that our court had pressed the court of Spain to join their interest with ours at Rome for his promotion. They gave it out that he was a German by birth, and undertook that he should serve the Austrian interest. They also promised the court of Madrid great assistance in other matters of the last importance, if they would procure this : adding, that this would prove the most effectual means for the conversion of England. Upon which, the count told me, he was asked concerning father Petre. He, who had gone often to Spain through England, happened to know that Jesuit, and told them he was no German, but an Englishman. They tried their strength at Rome for his promotion, but with no success.

The ambassador at Rome pressed cardinal Cibo much to put an end to the differences between the pope and the king of France, in the matter of the franchises, that it might appear that the pope had a due regard to a king that had extirpated heresy, and to another king who was endeavouring to bring other kingdoms into the sheepfold. What must the world say, if two such kings, like whom no ages had produced any, should be neglected, and ill used, at Rome for some punctilios ? He added, that, if these matters were settled, and if the pope would enter into concert with them, they would set about the destroying heresy every where, and would begin with the Dutch ; upon whom, he said, they would fall without any declaration of war, treating them as a company of rebels, and pirates, who had not a right, as free states and princes have, to a formal denunciation of war. Cibo, who was then cardinal patron, was amazed at this, and gave notice of it to the imperial cardinals. They sent it to the emperor, and he signified it to the prince of Orange. It is certain that one prince's treating with another, to invade a third, gives a right to that third prince to defend himself, and to prevent those designs. And, since what an ambassador says is understood as said by the prince whose character he bears, this gave the States a right to make use of all advantages that might offer themselves. But they had yet better grounds to justify their proceedings, as will appear in the sequel.

When the ambassador saw that his remonstrances to the cardinal patron were ineffectual, he demanded an audience of the pope ; and there he lamented that so little regard was had to two such great kings. He reflected on the pope, as shewing more zeal about temporal concerns than the spiritual ; which, he said, gave scandal to all Christendom. He concluded, that, since he saw intercessions made in his master's name were so little considered, he would make haste home : to which the pope made no other answer, but "lei è padrone," he might do as he pleased. But he sent one after the ambassador, as he withdrew from the audience, to let him know how much he was offended with his discourses, that he received no such treatment from any person, and that the ambassador was to expect no other private audience. Cardinal Howard did what he could to soften matters. But the ambassador was so entirely in the hands of the Jesuits, that he had little regard to any thing that the cardinal suggested. And so he left Rome after a very expensive, but insignificant embassy.

The pope sent in return a nuncio, Dada, now a cardinal. He was highly civil in all his deportment ; but it did not appear that he was a man of great depth, nor had he power to do much. The pope was a jealous and fearful man, who had no knowledge of any sort, but in the matters of the revenue, and of money : for he was descended from a family that was become rich by dealing in banks. And, in that respect, it was a happiness to the papacy that he was advanced : for it was so involved in vast debts, by a succession of many wasteful pontificates, that his frugal management came in good time to set those matters in better order. It was known that he did not so much as understand Latin. I was told at Rome, that when he was made cardinal, he had a master to teach him to pronounce that little Latin that he had occasion for at high masses. He understood nothing of divinity. I remembered what a Jesuit at Venice had said to me, whom I met sometimes at the French ambassador's there, when we were talking of the pope's infallibility: he said, that being in Rome during Altieri's pontificate, who lived some years in a perfect dotage, he confessed it required a very strong faith to believe him infallible: but he added pleasantly, the harder it was to believe it, the act of faith was the more meritorious. The submitting to pope Innocent's infallibility was a very implicit act of faith, when all appearances were so strongly against it. The pope hated the Jesuits, and expressed a great esteem for the Jansenists; not that he understood the ground of the difference, but because they were enemies to the Jesuits, and were ill-looked on by the court of France. He understood the business of the regale a little better, it relating to the temporalities of the church. And therefore he took all those under his protection who refused to submit to it. Things seemed to go far towards a breach between the two courts: especially after the articles which were set out by the assembly of the clergy of France in the year 1682, in favour of the councils of Constance and Basil, in opposition to the papal pretensions. The king of France, who was not accustomed to be treated in such a manner, sent many threatening messages to Rome, which alarmed the cardinals so much, that they tried to mollify the pope. But it was reported at Rome, that he made a noble answer to them, when they asked him what he would do, if so great a king should send an army to fall upon him? He said, he could suffer martyrdom.

He was so little terrified with all those threatenings, that he had set on foot a dispute about the franchises. In Rome all those of a nation put themselves under the protection of their ambassador, and are, upon occasions of ceremony, his cortege. These were usually lodged in his neighbourhood, pretending that they belonged to him. So that they exempted themselves from the orders and justice of Rome, as a part of the ambassador's family. And that extent of houses or streets in which they lodged was called the franchises: for in it they pretended they were not subject to the government of Rome. This had made these houses to be well filled, not only with those of that nation, but with such Romans as desired to be covered with that protection. Rome was now much sunk from what it had been: so that these franchises were become so great a part of the city, that the privileges of those that lived in them were giving every day new disturbances to the course of justice, and were the common sanctuaries of criminals. So the pope resolved to reduce the privileges of ambassadors to their own families, within their own palaces. He first dealt with the emperor's and the king of Spain's ambassadors, and brought them to quit their pretensions to the franchises; but with this provision, that, if the French did not the same, they would return to them. So now the pope was upon forcing the French to submit to the same methods. The pope said, his nuncio, or legate, at Paris, had no privilege but for his family, and for those that lived in his palace. The French rejected this with great scorn. They said, the pope was not to pretend to an equality with so great a king. He was the common father of Christendom: so those who came thither, as to the centre of unity, were not to be put on the level with the ambassadors that passed between sovereign princes. Upon this the king of France pretended that he would maintain all the privileges and franchises that his ambassadors were possessed of. This was now growing up to be the matter of a new quarrel, and of fresh disputes, between those courts.

The English ambassador being so entirely in the French interests, and in the confidence of the Jesuits, he was much less considered at Rome than he thought he ought to have been. The truth is, the Romans, as they have very little sense of religion, so they considered the reduction of England as a thing impracticable. They saw no prospect of any profits likely to arise in any of their offices by bulls, or compositions: and this was the notion that they had of the conversion of nations, chiefly as it brought wealth and advantages to them.

I will conclude all that I shall say in this place of the affairs of Rome with a lively saying of queen Christina to myself at Rome. She said, it was certain that the church was governed by the immediate care and providence of God: for none of the four popes that she had known, since she came to Rome, had common sense. She added, they were the first and the last of men. She had given herself entirely for some years to the study of astrology : and upon that she told me the king would live yet many years, but added that he would have no son.

I come, from the relation of this embassy to Rome, to give an account of other negotiations. The king found Skelton managed his affairs in Holland with so little sense, and gave such an universal distaste, that he resolved to change him. But he had been so servilely addicted to all his interests, that he would not discourage him. And, because all his concerns with the court of France were managed with Barillon, the French ambassador at London, he was sent to Paris.

The king found out one White, an Irishman, who had been long a spy of the Spaniards. And when they did not pay his appointments well, he accepted of the title of marquis d'Albeville from them in part of payment. And then he turned to the French, who paid their tools more punctually. But though he had learned the little arts of corrupting under-secretaries, and had found out some secrets by that way, which made him pass for a good spy, yet, when he came to negotiate matters in a higher form, he proved a most contemptible and ridiculous man, who had not the common appearances either of decency or of truth.

He had orders, before he entered upon business with the prince or princess, to ask of them not only to forbid me the court, but to promise to see me no more. The king had written two violent letters against me to the princess. She trusted me so far, that she showed them to me : and was pleased to answer them according to the hints that I suggested. But now it was put so home, that this was to be complied with, or a breach was immediately to follow upon it. So this was done. And they were both so true to their promise, that I saw neither the one nor the other till a few days before the prince set sail for England. The prince sent Dykvelt and Halewyn constantly to me, with all the advertisements that came from England. So I had the whole secret of English affairs still brought me.

That which was first resolved on was, to send Dykvelt to England with directions how to talk with all sorts of people : to the king, to those of the church, and to the dissenters. I was ordered to draw his instructions, which he followed very closely. He was ordered to expostulate decently, but firmly, with the king, upon the methods he was pursuing, both at home and abroad ; and to see if it was possible to bring him to a better understanding with the prince. He was also to assure all the church party, that the prince would ever be firm to the church of England, and to all our national interests. The clergy, by the methods in which they corresponded with him, which I suppose was chiefly by the bishop of London's means, had desired him to use all his credit with the dissenters, to keep them from going into the measures of the court ; and to send over very positive assurances that, in case they stood firm now to the common interest, they would in a better time come into a comprehension of such as could be brought into a conjunction with the church, and to a toleration of the rest. They had also desired him to send over some of the preachers whom the violence of the former years had driven to Holland ; and to prevail effectually with them to oppose any false brethren whom the court might gain to deceive the rest : which the prince had done. And to many of them he gave such presents, as enabled them to pay their debts and to undertake the journey. Dykvelt had orders to press them all to stand off, and not to be drawn in by any promises the court might make them to assist them in the elections of parliament. He was also instructed to assure them of a full toleration ; and likewise of a comprehension, if possible, whensoever the crown should devolve on the princess. He was to try all sorts of people, and to remove the ill impressions that had been given them of the prince : for the church party was made believe he was a presbyterian, and the dissenters were possessed with a conceit of his being arbitrary and imperious. Some had even the impudence to give out that he was a papist. But the ill terms in which the king and he lived put an end to those reports at that time. Yet they were afterwards taken up, and managed with much malice to create a jealousy of him. Dykvelt was not gone off when D'Albeville came to the Hague. He did all he could to divert the journey : for he knew well Dykvelt's way of penetrating into secrets, he himself having been often employed by him, and well paid for several discoveries made by his means.

D'Albeville assured the prince and the States that the king was firmly resolved to maintain his alliance with them : that his naval preparations were only to enable him to preserve the peace of Europe : for he seemed much concerned to find that the States had such apprehensions of these, that they were putting themselves in a condition not to be surprised by them. In his secret negotiations with the prince and princess, he began with very positive assurances that the king intended never to wrong them in their right of succession : that all that the king was now engaged in was only to assert the rights of the crown, of which they would reap the advantage in their turn : the test was a restraint on the king's liberty, and therefore he was resolved to have it repealed : and he was also resolved to lay aside all penal laws in matters of religion : they saw too well the advantages that Holland had, by the liberty of conscience that was settled among them, to oppose him in this particular : the king could not abandon men, because they were of his own religion, who had served him well, and had suffered only on his account, and on the account of their conscience. He told them how much the king condemned the proceedings in France ; and that he spoke of that king as a poor bigot, who was governed by the archbishop of Paris and Madame de Maintenon ; whereas he knew Père de la Chaise had opposed the persecution as long as he could. But the king hated those maxims : and therefore he received the refugees very kindly, and had given orders for a collection of charity over the kingdom for their relief.

This was the substance both of what D'Albeville said to the prince and princess, and of what the king himself said to Dykvelt upon those subjects. At that time the king thought he had made a majority of the house of commons sure : and so he seemed resolved to have a session of parliament in April. And of this D'Albeville gave the prince positive assurances. But the king had reckoned wrong : for many of those who had been with him in his closet were either silent, or had answered him in such respectful words, that he took these for promises. But, when they were more strictly examined, the king saw his error : and so the sitting of the parliament was put off.

To all these propositions the prince and princess, and Dykvelt in their name, answered, that they were fixed in a principle against persecution in matters of conscience ; but they could not think it reasonable to let papists in to sit in parliament, or to serve in public trusts : the restless spirit of some of that religion, and of their clergy in particular, shewed they could not be at quiet till they were masters : and the power they had over the king's spirit, in making him forget what he had promised upon his coming to the crown, gave but too just a ground of jealousy : it appeared that they could not bear any restraints, nor remember past services longer, than those who did them could comply in everything with that which was desired of them : they thought the prerogative, as limited by law, was great enough : and they desired no such exorbitant power as should break through all laws : they feared that such an attack upon the constitution might rather drive the nation into a commonwealth : they thought the surest as well as the best way was to govern according to law : the church of England had given the king signal proofs of their affection and fidelity ; and had complied with him in everything, till he came to touch them in so tender a point as the legal security they had for their religion : their sticking to that was very natural : and the king's taking that ill from them was liable to great censure : the king, if he pleased to improve the advantages he had in his hand, might be both easy and great at home, and the arbiter of all affairs abroad : but he was prevailed on by the importunities of some restless priests to embroil all his affairs to serve their ends : they could never consent to abolish those laws which were the best, and now the only fence of that religion which they themselves believed true. This was the substance of their answers to all the pressing messages that were often repeated by D'Albeville. And upon this occasion the princess spoke so often, and with such firmness to him, that he said, she was more intractable on those matters than the prince himself. Dykvelt told me he argued often with the king on all these topics, but he found him obstinately fixed in his resolution. He said he was the head of the family, and the prince ought to comply with him ; but that he had always set himself against him. Dykvelt answered that the prince could not carry his compliance so far, as to give up his religion to his pleasure ; but that in all other things he had shown a very ready submission to his will : the peace of Nimeguen, of which the king was guarantee, was openly violated in the article relating to the principality of Orange : yet since the king did not think fit to espouse his interests in that matter, he had been silent, and had made no protestations upon it: so the king saw that he was ready to be silent under so great an injury, and to sacrifice his own concerns rather than disturb the king's affairs. To this the king made no answer. The earl of Sunderland and the rest of the ministry pressed Dykvelt mightily to endeavour to bring the prince to concur with the king. And they engaged to him, that, if that were once settled, the king would go into close measures with him against France. But he put an end to all those propositions. He said, the prince could never be brought to hearken to them.

At this time a great discovery was made of the intentions of the court, by the Jesuits of Liege, who, in a letter that they wrote to their brethren at Friburg, in Switzerland, gave them a long account of the affairs of England. They told them, that the king was received into a communication of the merits of their order: that he expressed great joy at his becoming a son of the society; and professed, he was as much concerned in all their interests as in his own: he wished they could furnish him with many priests to assist him in the conversion of the nation, which he was resolved to bring about, or to die a martyr in endeavouring it; and that he would rather suffer death for carrying on that, than live ever so long and happy without attempting it. He said, he must make haste in this work, otherwise, if he should die before he had compassed it, he would leave them worse than he found them. They added, among many particulars, that, when one of them kneeled down to kiss his hand, he took him up, and said, since he was a priest, he ought rather to kneel to him, and to kiss his hand. And, when one of them was lamenting that his next heir was an heretic, he said, "God would provide an heir."

The Jesuits at Friburg showed this about. And one of the ministers, on whom they were taking some pains, and of whom they had some hopes, had got a sight of it. And he obtained leave to take a copy of it, pretending that he would make good use of it. He sent a copy of it to Heidegger, the famous professor of divinity at Zurich: and from him I had it. Other copies of it were likewise sent, both from Geneva and Switzerland. One of those was sent to Dykvelt; who upon that told the king, that his priests had other designs, and were full of those hopes that gave jealousies which could not be easily removed: and he named the Liege letter, and gave the king a copy of it. He promised to him he would read it; and he would soon see whether it was an imposture framed to make them more odious or not. But he never spoke of it to him afterwards. This Dykvelt thought was a confessing that the letter was no forgery. Thus Dykvelt's negotiation at London, and D'Albeville's at the Hague, ended without any effect on either side.

But, if his treating with the king was without success, his management of his instructions was more prosperous. He desired that those who wished well to their religion and their country would meet together, and concert such advices and advertisements as might be fit for the prince to know, that he might govern himself by them. The marquis of Halifax, and the earls of Shrewsbury, Devonshire, Danby, and Nottingham, the lords Mordaunt and Lumley, Herbert and Russel among the admirals, and the bishop of London, were the persons chiefly trusted. And upon the advices that were sent over by them the prince governed all his motions. They met often at the earl of Shrewsbury's. And there they concerted matters, and drew the declaration on which they advised the prince to engage.

In this state things lay for some months. But the king resolved to go on in his design of breaking through the laws. He sent a proclamation of indulgence to Scotland in February. It set forth in the preamble, that the king had an absolute power vested in him, so that all his subjects were bound to obey him without reserve: by virtue of this power, the king repealed all the severe laws that were passed in his grandfather's name during his infancy: he with that took off all disabilities that were by any law laid on his Roman catholic subjects, and made them capable of all employments and benefices: he also slackened all the laws made against the moderate presbyterians: and promised he would never force his subjects by any invincible necessity to change their religion: and he repealed all laws imposing tests on those who held any employments: instead of which he set up a new one, by which they should renounce the principles of rebellion, and should oblige themselves to maintain the king in this his absolute power against all mortals.

This was published in Scotland to make way for that which followed it some months after in England. It was strangely drawn, and liable to much just censure. The king by this raised his power to a pitch, not only of suspending, but of repealing laws, and of enacting new ones by his own authority. His claiming an absolute power, to which all men were bound to obey without reserve, was an invasion of all that was either legal or sacred. The only precedent that could be found for such an extraordinary pretension, was in the declaration that Philip the Second of Spain sent by the duke of Alva into the Netherlands, in which he founded all the authority that he committed to that bloody man, on the absolute power that rested in him. Yet in this the king went further than Philip, who did not pretend that the subjects were bound to obey without reserve. Every prince that believes the truth of religion, must confess that there are reserves in the obedience of their subjects, in case their commands should be contrary to the laws of God. The requiring all persons that should be capable of employments to swear to maintain this, was to make them feel their slavery too sensibly. The king's promising to use "no invincible necessity" to force his subjects to change their religion, showed that he allowed himself a very large reserve in this grace that he promised his subjects; though he allowed them none in their obedience. The laws that had passed during king James's minority had been often ratified by himself after he was of age. And they had received many subsequent confirmations in the succeeding reigns; and one in the king's own reign. And the test that was now taken away was passed by the present king, when he represented his brother. Some took also notice of the word "moderate presbyterians," as very ambiguous.

The court finding that so many objections lay against this proclamation (as indeed it seemed penned on purpose to raise new jealousies), let it fall, and sent down another some months after that was more cautiously worded; only absolute power was so dear to them, that it was still asserted in the new one. By it, full liberty was granted to all presbyterians to set up conventicles in their own way. They did all accept of it without pretending any scruples. And they magnified this, as an extraordinary stroke of providence, that a prince, from whom they expected an increase of the severities under which the laws had brought them, should thus of a sudden allow them such an unconfined liberty. But they were not so blind as not to see what was aimed at by it. They made addresses upon it full of acknowledgments, and of protestations of loyalty. Yet, when some were sent among them, pressing them to dispose all their party to concur with the king in taking away the tests and penal laws, they answered them only in cold and general words.

In April the king set out a declaration of toleration and liberty of conscience for England. But it was drawn up in much more modest terms than the Scotch proclamation had been. In the preamble, the king expressed his aversion to persecution on the account of religion, and the necessity that he found of allowing his subjects liberty of conscience, in which he did not doubt of the concurrence of his parliament: he renewed his promise of maintaining the church of England, as it was by law established: but with this he suspended all penal and sanguinary laws in matters of religion: and, since the service of all his subjects was due to him by the laws of nature, he declared them all equally capable of employments, and suppressed all oaths or tests that limited this: in conclusion, he promised he would maintain all his subjects in all their properties, and particularly in the possession of the abbey lands.

This gave great offence to all true patriots, as well as to the whole church party. The king did now assume a power of repealing laws by his own authority: for though he pretended only to suspend them, yet no limitation was set to this suspension: so it amounted to a repeal, the laws being suspended for all time to come. The preamble, that pretended so much love and charity, and that condemned persecution, sounded strangely in the mouth of a popish prince. The king's saying that he did not doubt of the parliament's concurring with him in this matter seemed ridiculous; for it was visible by all the prorogations, that the king was but too well assured, that the parliament would not concur with him in it. And the promise to maintain the subjects in their possessions of the abbey lands, looked as if the design of setting up popery was thought very near being effected, since otherwise there was no need of mentioning any such thing.

Upon this a new set of addresses went round the dissenters. And they, who had so long reproached the church of England, as too courtly in their submissions and flatteries, seemed now to vie with them in those abject strains. Some of them, being penned by persons whom the court had gained, contained severe reflections on the clergy, and on their proceedings. They magnified the king's mercy and favour, and made great protestations of fidelity and gratitude. Many promised to endeavour that such persons should be chosen to serve in parliament, as should concur with the king in the enacting what he now granted so graciously. Few concurred in those addresses: and the persons that brought them up were mean and inconsiderable. Yet the court was lifted up with this. The king, and his priests, were delighted with these addresses out of measure: and they seemed to think that they had gained the nation, and had now conquered those who were hitherto their most irreconcilable enemies. The king made the cruelty of the church of England the common subject of discourse. He reproached them for setting on so often a violent persecution of the dissenters. He said he had intended to have set on this toleration sooner, but that he was restrained by some of them, who had treated with him, and had undertaken to show favour to those of his religion, provided they might be still suffered to vex the dissenters. He named the persons that had made those propositions to him. In which he suffered much in his honour: for as the persons denied the whole thing, so the freedom of discourse in any such treaty, ought not to have been made use of to defame them.

But, to carry this further, and to give a public and an odious proof of the rigour of the ecclesiastical courts, the king ordered an enquiry to be made into all the vexatious suits into which dissenters had been brought in these courts, and into all the compositions that they had been forced to make, to redeem themselves from further trouble: which, as was said, would have brought a scandalous discovery of all the ill practices of those courts. For the use that many that belonged to them had made of the laws with relation to the dissenters, was, to draw presents from such of them as could make them; threatening them with a process in case they failed to do that, and upon their doing it, leaving them at full liberty to neglect the laws as much as they pleased. It was hoped at court, that this fury against the church would have animated the dissenters to turn upon the clergy, with some of that fierceness with which they themselves had been lately treated. Some few of the hotter of the dissenters answered their expectations. Angry speeches and virulent books were published. Yet these were disowned by the wiser men among them: and the clergy, by a general agreement, made no answer to them. So that the matter was let fall, to the great grief of the popish party. Some of the bishops, that were gained by the court, carried their compliance to a shameful pitch: for they set on addresses of thanks to the king for the promise he had made, in the late declaration of maintaining the church of England: though it was visible that the intent of it was to destroy the church. Some few were drawn into this. But the bishop of Oxford had so ill success in his diocese, that he got but one single clergyman to concur with him in it. Some foolish men retained still their old peevishness. But the far greater part of the clergy began to open their eyes, and see how they had been engaged by ill-meaning men, who were now laying by the mask, into all the fury that had been driven on for many years by a popish party. And it was often said, that if ever God should deliver them out of the present distress, they would keep up their domestic quarrels no more, which were so visibly and so artfully managed by our enemies to make us devour one another, and so in the end to be consumed one of another. And when some of those who had been always moderate, told these, who were putting on another temper, that they would perhaps forget this as soon as the danger was over, they promised the contrary very solemnly. It shall be told afterwards how well they remembered this. Now the bed-chamber and drawing-room were as full of stories to the prejudice of the clergy, as they were formerly to the prejudice of the dissenters. It was said they had been loyal as long as the court was in their interests, and was venturing all on their account; but as soon as this changed, they changed likewise.

The king, seeing no hope of prevailing on his parliament, dissolved it; but gave it out, that he would have a new one before winter. And, the queen being advised to go to the Bath for her health, the king resolved on a great progress through some of the western counties.

Before he set out, he resolved to give the pope's nuncio a solemn reception at Windsor. He apprehended some disorder might have happened if it had been done at London. He thought it below both his own dignity, and the pope's, not to give the nuncio a public audience. This was a hard point for those who were to act a part in this ceremony; for all commerce with the see of Rome being declared high treason by law, this was believed to fall within the statute. It was so apprehended by queen Mary. Cardinal Pool was obliged to stay in Flanders till all those laws were repealed. But the king would not stay for that. The duke of Somerset, being the lord of the bed-chamber then in waiting, had advised with his lawyers: and they told him, he could not safely do the part that was expected of him in the audience. So he told the king that he could not serve him upon that occasion; for he was assured it was against the law. The king asked him, if he did not know that he was above the law. The other answered, that, whatever the king might be, he himself was not above the law. The king expressed a high displeasure, and turned him out of all employments*. The ceremony passed very heavily: and the compliment was pronounced with so low a voice, that no person could hear it; which was believed done by concert.

When this was over, the king set out for his progress, and went from Salisbury all round as far as to Chester. In the places through which the king passed he saw a visible coldness both in the nobility and gentry, which was not easily borne by a man of his temper. In many places they pretended occasions to go out of their counties. Some stayed at home. And those who waited on the king seemed to do it rather out of duty and respect, than with any cordial affection. The king on his part was very obliging to all that came near him, and most particularly to the dissenters, and to those who had passed long under the notion of commonwealth's men. He looked very graciously on all that had been of the duke of Monmouth's party. He addressed his discourse generally to all sorts of people. He ran out on the point of liberty of conscience: he said, this was the true secret of the greatness and wealth of Holland. He was well pleased to hear all the ill-natured stories that were brought him of the violences committed of late, either by the justices of peace, or by the clergy. He everywhere recommended to them the choosing such parliament men, as would concur with him in settling this liberty as firmly as the Magna Charta had been: and to this he never forgot to add the taking away the tests. But he received such cold and general answers that he saw he could not depend on them. The king had designed to go through many more places: but the small success he had in those which he visited made him shorten his progress. He went and visited the queen at the Bath, where he stayed only a few days, two or three at most: and she continued on in her course of bathing. Many books were now written for liberty of conscience; and, since all people saw what security the tests gave, these spoke of an equivalent to be offered, that should give a further security beyond what could be pretended from the tests. It was never explained what was meant by this: so it was thought an artificial method to lay men asleep with a high sounding word. Some talked of new laws to secure civil liberty, which had been so much shaken by the practices of these last years, ever since the Oxford parliament. Upon this a very extravagant thing was given out, that the king was resolved to set up a sort of a commonwealth: and the papists began to talk everywhere very high for public liberty, trying by that to recommend themselves to the nation.

When the king came back from his progress, he resolved to change the magistracy in most of the cities of England. He began with London. He not only changed the court of aldermen, but the government of many of the companies of the city: for great powers had been reserved in the new charters that had been given, for the king to put in, and to put out, at pleasure: but it was said at the granting them, that these clauses were put in only to keep them in a due dependence on the court, but that they should not be made use of, unless great provocation was given. Now all this was executed with great severity and contempt. Those who had stood up for the king, during the debates about the exclusion, were now turned out with disgrace: and those who had appeared most violently against him were put in the magistracy, who took liberties now in their turn to insult their neighbours. All this turned upon the king, who was so given up to the humours of his priests, that he sacrificed both his honour, and gratitude, as they dictated. The new men, who were brought in, saw this too visibly to be much wrought on by it.

The king threw off his old party in too outrageous a manner ever to return to them again. But he was much surprised to find that the new mayor and aldermen took the test, and ordered the observation of Gunpowder-treason day to be continued. When the sheriffs came, according to custom, to invite the king to the lord mayor's feast, he commanded them to go and invite the nuncio ; which they did. And he went upon the invitation, to the surprise of all who saw it. But the mayor and aldermen disowned the invitation ; and made an entry of it in their books, that the nuncio came without their knowledge. This the king took very ill. And upon it, he said, he saw the dissenters were an ill-natured sort of people, that could not be gained. The king signified to the lord mayor that he might use what form of worship he liked best in Guildhall chapel. The design in this was to engage the dissenters to make the first change from the established worship : and, if a presbyterian mayor should do this in one year, a popish mayor might do it in another. But the mayor put the decision of this upon persons against whom the court could have no exception. He sent to those, to whom the governing of the diocese of London was committed during the suspension, and asked their opinion in it ; which they could not but give in behalf of the established worship : and they added, that the changing it was against law. So this project miscarried ; and the mayor, though he went sometimes to the meetings of the dissenters, yet he came often to church, and behaved himself more decently than was expected of him.

This change in the city not succeeding as the court had expected, did not discourage them from appointing a committee to examine the magistracy in the other cities, and to put in, or out, as they saw cause for it. Some were putting the nation in hope that the old charters were to be restored. But the king was so far from that, that he was making every day a very arbitrary use of the power of changing the magistracy, that was reserved in the new charters. These regulators, who were for most part dissenters gained by the court, went on very boldly ; and turned men out upon every story that was made of them, and put such men in their room as they confided in. And in these they took their measures often so hastily, that men were put in one week, and turned out the other.

After this, the king sent orders to the lords-lieutenants of the counties, to examine the gentlemen and freeholders upon three questions. The first was, whether, in case they should be chosen to serve in parliament, they would consent to repeal the penal laws, and those for the tests. The second was, whether they would give their vote for choosing such men as would engage to do that. And the third was, whether they would maintain the king's declaration. In most of the counties the lords-lieutenants put those questions in so careless a manner, that it was plain they did not desire they should be answered in the affirmative. Some went further, and declared themselves against them. And a few of the more resolute refused to put them. They said, this was the prelimiting and packing of a parliament, which in its nature was to be free, and under no previous engagement. Many counties answered very boldly in the negative : and others refused to give any answer, which was understood to be equivalent to a negative. The mayor, and most of the new aldermen of London, refused to answer. Upon this many were turned out of all commissions.

This, as all the other artifices of the priests, had an effect quite contrary to what they promised themselves from it : for those who had resolved to oppose the court were more encouraged than ever, by the discovery now made of the sense of the whole nation in those matters. Yet such care was taken in naming the sheriffs and mayors that were appointed for the next year, that it was believed that the king was resolved to hold a parliament within that time, and to have such a house of commons returned, whether regularly chosen, or not, as should serve his ends.

It was concluded, that the king would make use both of his power and of his troops, either to force elections, or to put the parliament under a force when it should meet : for it was so positively said that the king would carry his point, and there was so little appearance of his being able to do it in a fair and regular way, that it was generally believed some very desperate resolution was now taken up. His ministers were now so deeply engaged in illegal things, that they were very uneasy, and were endeavouring either to carry on his designs with success, so as to get all settled in a body that should carry the face and appearance of a parliament, or at least to bring him to let all fall, and to come into terms of agreement with his people; in which case, they reckoned, one article would be an indemnity for all that had been done.

The king was every day saying, that he was king, and he would be obeyed, and would make those who opposed him feel that he was their king; and he had both priests and flatterers about him, that were still pushing him forward. All men grew melancholy with this sad prospect. The hope of the true protestants was in the king's two daughters; chiefly on the eldest, who was out of his reach, and was known to be well instructed, and very zealous in matters of religion. The princess Anne was still very stedfast and regular in her devotions, and was very exemplary in the course of her life. But, as care had been taken to put very ordinary divines about her for her chaplains, so she had never pursued any study in those points with much application. And, all her court being put about her by the king and queen, she was beset with spies. It was therefore much apprehended that she would be strongly assaulted, when all other designs should so far succeed as to make that seasonable. In the mean while she was let alone by the king, who was indeed a very kind and indulgent father to her. Now he resolved to make his first attack on the princess of Orange. D'Albeville went over to England in the summer, and did not come back before the twenty-fourth of December, Christmas eve: and then he gave the princess a letter from the king, bearing date the fourth of November: he was to carry this letter; and his dispatches being put off longer than was intended, that made this letter come so late to her.

The king took the rise of his letter from a question she had put to D'Albeville, desiring to know what were the grounds upon which the king himself had changed his religion. The king told her, he was bred up in the doctrine of the church of England by Dr. Stewart, whom the king his father had put about him; in which he was so zealous, that when he perceived the queen his mother had a design upon the duke of Gloucester, though he preserved still the respect that he owed her, yet he took care to prevent it. All the while that he was beyond sea, no catholic, but one nun, had ever spoken one word to persuade him to change his religion; and he continued for the most part of that time firm to the doctrine of the church of England. He did not then mind those matters much; and, as all young people are apt to do, he thought it a point of honour not to change his religion. The first thing that raised scruples in him was, the great devotion that he had observed among catholics: he saw they had great helps for it: they had their churches better adorned, and did greater acts of charity, than he had ever seen among protestants. He also observed, that many of them changed their course of life, and became good Christians, even though they continued to live still in the world. This made him first begin to examine both religions. He could see nothing in the three reigns in which religion was changed in England, to incline him to believe that they who did it were sent of God. He read the history of that time, as it was written in the chronicle. He read both Dr. Heylin, and Hooker's preface to his Ecclesiastical Policy, which confirmed him in the same opinion. He saw clearly that Christ had left an infallibility in his church, against which "the gates of Hell cannot prevail:" and it appeared that this was lodged with St. Peter from our Saviour's words to him, St. Mat. xvi. ver. 18. Upon this the certainty of the Scriptures, and even of Christianity itself, was founded. The Apostles acknowledged this to be in St. Peter, Acts xv. when they said, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." It was the authority of the church that declared the Scriptures to be canonical; and certainly they who declared them could only interpret them; and wherever this infallibility was, there must be a clear succession. The point of the infallibility being once settled, all other controversies must needs fall. Now the Roman church was the only church that either has infallibility, or that pretended to it. And they who threw off this authority did open a door to atheism and infidelity, and took people off from true devotion, and set even Christianity itself loose to all that would question it, and to Socinians and Latitudinarians who doubted of every thing. He had discoursed of these things with some divines of the church of England; but had received no satisfaction from them. The Christian religion gained its credit by the miracles which the apostles wrought, and by the holy lives and sufferings of the martyrs, whose blood was the seed of the church. Whereas Luther and Calvin, and those who had set up the church of England, had their heads fuller of temporal matters than of spiritual, and had let the world loose to great disorders. Submission was necessary to the peace of the church; and when every man will expound the scriptures, this makes way to all sects, who pretend to build upon it. It was also plain, that the church of England did not pretend to infallibility; yet she acted as if she did; for ever since the reformation she had persecuted those who differed from her, dissenters as well as papists, more than was generally known. And he could not see why dissenters might not separate from the church of England, as well as she had done from the church of Rome. Nor could the church of England separate herself from the catholic church, any more than a county of England could separate itself from the rest of the kingdom. This, he said, was all that his leisure allowed him to write; but he thought that these things, together with the king his brother's papers, and the duchess's papers, might serve, if not to justify the catholic religion to an unbiassed judgment, yet at least to create a favourable opinion of it.

I read this letter in the original; for the prince sent it to me together with the princess's answer, but with a charge not to take a copy of either, but to read them over as often as I pleased; which I did till I had fixed both pretty well in my memory. And, as soon as I had sent them back, I sat down immediately to write out all that I remembered, which the princess owned to me afterwards, when she read the abstracts I made, were punctual almost to a tittle. It was easy for me to believe that this letter was all the king's inditing; for I had heard it almost in the very same words from his own mouth. The letter was written very decently, and concluded very modestly. The princess received this letter, as was told me, on the twenty-fourth of December, at night. Next day being Christmas-day, she received the sacrament, and was during the greatest part of the day in public devotions: yet she found time to draw first an answer, and then to write it out fair; and she sent it by the post on the twenty-sixth of December. Her draught, which the prince sent me, was very little blotted, or altered. It was long, about two sheets of paper; for, as an answer runs generally out into more length than the paper that is to be answered, so the strains of respect, with which her letter was full, drew it out to a greater length.

She began with answering another letter that she had received by the post; in which the king had made an excuse for failing to write the former post day. She was very sensible of the happiness of hearing so constantly from him; for no difference in religion could hinder her from desiring both his blessing and his prayers, though she was ever so far from him. As for the paper that M. Albeville delivered her, he told her, that his majesty would not be offended if she wrote her thoughts freely to him upon it.

She hoped he would not look on that as want of respect in her. She was far from sticking to the religion in which she was bred out of a point of honour; for she had taken much pains to be settled in it upon better grounds. Those of the church of England who had instructed her, had freely laid before her that which was good in the Romish religion, that so, seeing the good and the bad of both, she might judge impartially; according to the apostle's rule of "proving all things, and holding fast that which was good." Though she had come young out of England, yet she had not left behind her either the desire of being well informed, or the means for it. She had furnished herself with books, and had those about her who might clear any doubts to her. She saw clearly in the scriptures that she must work her own salvation with fear and trembling, and that she must not believe by the faith of another, but according as things appeared to herself. It ought to be no prejudice against the reformation, if many of those who professed it led ill lives. If any of them lived ill, none of the principles of their religion allowed them in it. Many of them led good lives, and more might do it by the grace of God. But there were many devotions in the church of Rome, on which the reformed could set no value.

She acknowledged that, if there was an infallibility in the church, all other controversies must fall to the ground; but she could never yet be informed where that infallibility was lodged: whether in the pope alone, or in a general council, or in both. And she desired to know in whom the infallibility rested, when there were two or three popes at a time, acting one against another, with the assistance of councils, which they called general; and at least the succession was then much disordered. As for the authority that is pretended to have been given to St. Peter over the rest, that place which was chiefly alleged for it was otherwise interpreted by those of the church of England, as importing only the confirmation of him in the office of an apostle, when in answer to that question, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me," he had by a triple confession washed off his triple denial. The words that the king had cited were spoken to the other apostles, as well as to him. It was agreed by all, that the apostles were infallible, who were guided by God's holy spirit. But that gift, as well as many others, had ceased long ago. Yet in that, St. Peter had no authority over the other apostles; otherwise St. Paul understood our Saviour's words ill, who "withstood him to his face, because he was to be blamed." And if St. Peter himself could not maintain that authority, she could not see how it could be given to his successors, whose bad lives agreed ill with his doctrine.

Nor did she see, why the ill use that some made of the scriptures ought to deprive others of them. It is true, all sects made use of them, and find somewhat in them that they draw in to support their opinions: yet for all this our Saviour said to the Jews, "Search the Scriptures;" and St. Paul ordered his epistles to be read to all the Saints in the churches: and he says in one place, "I write as to wise men, judge what I say." And if they might judge an apostle, much more any other teacher. Under the law of Moses, the Old Testament was to be read, not only in the hearing of the scribes, and the doctors of the law, but likewise in the hearing of the women and children. And since God had made us reasonable creatures, it seemed necessary to employ our reason chiefly in the matters of the greatest concern. Though faith was above our reason, yet it proposed nothing to us that was contradictory to it. Every one ought to satisfy himself in these things: as our Saviour convinced Thomas, by making him to thrust his own hand into the print of the nails, not leaving him to the testimony of the other apostles, who were already convinced. She was confident that, if the king would hear many of his own subjects, they would fully satisfy him as to all those prejudices, that he had at the reformation; in which nothing was acted tumultuously, but all was done according to law. The design of it was only to separate from the Roman church, in so far as it had separated from the primitive church; in which they had brought things to as great a degree of perfection, as those corrupt ages were capable of. She did not see how the church of England could be blamed for the persecution of the dissenters; for the laws made against them were made by the State, and not by the church; and they were made for crimes against the state. Their enemies had taken great care to foment the division, in which they had been but too successful. But, if he would reflect on the grounds upon which the church of England had separated from the church of Rome, he would find them to be of a very different nature from those for which the dissenters had left it.

Thus, she concluded, she gave him the trouble of a long account of the grounds upon which she was persuaded of the truth of her religion: in which she was so fully satisfied, that she trusted by the grace of God that she should spend the rest of her days in it; and she was so well assured of the truth of our Saviour's words, that she was confident the gates of hell should not prevail against it, but that he would be with it to the end of the world. All ended thus, that the religion which she professed taught her her duty to him, so that she should ever be his most obedient daughter and servant.

To this the next return of the post brought an answer from the king, which I saw not. But the account that was sent me of it was: the king took notice of the great progress he saw the princess had made in her enquiries after those matters: the king's business did not allow him the time that was necessary to enter into the detail of her letter: he desired she would read those books that he had mentioned to her in his former letters, and some others that he intended to send her: and, if she desired to be more fully satisfied, he proposed to her to discourse about them with F. Morgan, an English jesuit then at the Hague.

I have set down very minutely every particular that was in those letters, and very nearly in the same words. It must be confessed, that persons of this quality seldom enter into such a discussion. The king's letter contained a studied account of the change of his religion, which he had repeated often : and it was perhaps prepared for him by some others. There were some things in it, which, if he had made a little more reflection on them, it may be supposed he would not have mentioned. The course of his own life was not so strict, as to make it likely that the good lives of some papists had made such impressions upon him. The easy absolutions that are granted in that church, are a much juster prejudice in this respect against it, than the good lives of a few can be supposed to be an argument for it. The adorning their churches was a reflection that did no great honour to him that made it. The severities used by the church of England against the dissenters, were urged with a very ill grace by one of the church of Rome, that has delighted herself so often by being, as it were, bathed with the blood of those they call heretics : and, if it had not been for the respect that a daughter paid her father, here greater advantages might have been taken. I had a high opinion of the princess's good understanding, and of her knowledge in those matters, before I saw this letter : but this surprised me. It gave me an astonishing joy, to see so young a person all of the sudden, without consulting any one person, to be able to write so solid and learned a letter, in which she mixed with the respect that she paid a father so great a firmness, that by it she cut off all further treaty. And her repulsing the attack, that the king made upon her, with so much resolution and force, did let the popish party see, that she understood her religion as well as she loved it.

But now I must say somewhat of myself : after I had stayed a year in Holland, I heard from many hands, that the king seemed to forget his own greatness when he spoke of me, which he took occasion to do very often. I had published some account of the short tour I had made, in several letters ; in which my chief design was to expose both popery and tyranny. The book was well received, and was much read ; and it raised the king's displeasure very high *.

My continuing at the Hague made him conclude, that I was managing designs against him. And some papers in single sheets came out, reflecting on the proceedings of England, which seemed to have a considerable effect on those who read them. These were printed in Holland ; and many copies of them were sent into all the parts of England. All which inflamed the king the more against me ; for he believed they were written by me, as indeed most of them were. But that which gave the crisis to the king's anger was, that he heard I was to be married to a considerable fortune at the Hague. So a project was formed to break this, by charging me with high treason for corresponding with lord Argyle, and for conversing with some that were outlawed for high treason.

The king ordered a letter to be written in his name to his advocate in Scotland, to prosecute me for some probable thing or other ; which was intended only to make a noise, not doubting but this would break the intended marriage. A ship coming from Scotland the day in which this prosecution was ordered, that had a quick passage, brought me the first news of it, long before it was sent to D'Albeville. So I petitioned the States, who were then sitting, to be naturalized, in order to my intended marriage. And this passed of course, without the least difficulty ; which perhaps might have been made, if this prosecution, now begun in Scotland, had been known. Now I was legally under the protection of the States of Holland ; yet I wrote a full justification of myself, as to all particulars laid to my charge, in some letters that I sent to the earl of Middleton. But in one of these I said, that, being now naturalized in Holland, my allegiance was, during my stay in these parts, transferred from his majesty to the States. I also said, in another letter, that, if upon my non-appearance a sentence should pass against me, I might be perhaps forced to justify myself, and to give an account of the share that I had in affairs these twenty years past ; in which I might be led to mention some things, that I was afraid would displease the king ; and therefore I should be sorry if I were driven to it.

Now the court thought they had somewhat against me ; for they knew they had nothing before. So the first citation was let fall, and a new one was ordered on these two accounts. It was pretended to be high treason to say my allegiance was now transferred ; and it was set forth, as a high indignity to the king, to threaten him with writing a history of the transactions passed these last twenty years. The first of these struck at a great point, which was a part of the law of nations. Every man that was naturalized took an oath of allegiance to the prince, or state, that naturalized him. And, since no man can serve two masters, or be under a double allegiance, it is certain that there must be a transfer of allegiance, at least during the stay in the country where one is so naturalized.

This matter was kept up against me for some time, the court delaying proceeding to any sentence for several months. At last a sentence of outlawry was given; and upon that Albeville said, that, if the States would not deliver me up, he would find such instruments as should seize on me, and carry me away forcibly. The methods he named of doing this were very ridiculous. And he spoke of it to so many persons, that I believe his design was rather to frighten me, than that he could think to effect them. Many overtures were made to some of my friends in London, not only to let this prosecution fall, but to promote me, if I would make myself capable of it. I entertained none of these. I had many stories brought me of the discourses among some of the brutal Irish, then in the Dutch service; but, I thank God, I was not moved with them. I resolved to go on, and to do my duty, and to do what service I could to the public, and to my country; and resigned myself up entirely to that Providence that had watched over me to that time with an indulgent care, and had made all the designs of my enemies against me turn to my great advantage.

I come now to the year 1638, which proved memorable, and produced an extraordinary and unheard-of revolution. The year in this century made all people reflect on the same year in the former century, in which the power of Spain received so great a check, that the decline of that monarchy began then; and England was saved from an invasion, that, if it had succeeded as happily as it was well laid, must have ended in the absolute conquest, and utter ruin of the nation. Our books are so full of all that related to that armada, boasted to be invincible, that I need add no more to so known and so remarkable a piece of our history. A new eighty-eight raised new expectations, in which the surprising events did far exceed all that could have been looked for.

I begin the year with Albeville's negotiation after his coming to the Hague. He had before his going over given in a threatening memorial upon the business of Bantam, that looked like a prelude to a declaration of war; for he demanded a present answer, since the king could no longer bear the injustice done him in that matter, which was set forth in very high words. He sent this memorial to be printed at Amsterdam, before he had communicated it to the States. The chief effect that this had, was, that the actions of the company did sink for some days. But they rose soon again: and by this it was said, that Albeville himself made the greatest gain. The East-India fleet was then expected home every day. So the merchants, who remembered well the business of the Smyrna fleet in the year seventy-two, did apprehend that the king had sent a fleet to intercept them, and that this memorial was intended only to prepare an apology for that breach, when it should happen; but nothing of that sort followed upon it. The States did answer this memorial with another, that was firm, but more decently expressed: by their last treaty with England it was provided, that, in case any disputes should arise between the merchants of either side, commissioners should be named on both sides to hear and judge the matter: the king had not yet named any of his side; so that the delay lay at his door: they were therefore amazed to receive a memorial in so high a strain, since they had done all that by the treaty was incumbent on them. Albeville, after this, gave in another memorial, in which he desired them to send over commissioners for ending that dispute. But, though this was a great fall from the height in which the former memorial was conceived, yet in this the thing was so ill apprehended, that the Dutch had reason to believe that the king's ministers did not know the treaty, or were not at leisure to read it; for, according to the treaty, and the present posture of that business, the king was obliged to send over commissioners to the Hague to judge of that affair. When this memorial was answered, and the treaty was examined, the matter was let fall.

Albeville's next negotiation related to myself. I had printed a paper in justification of myself, together with my letters to the earl of Middleton; and he, in a memorial, complained of two passages in that paper. One was, that I said it was yet too early to persecute men for religion, and therefore crimes against the state were pretended by my enemies: this, he said, did insinuate, that the king did in time intend to persecute for religion. The other was, that I had put in it an intimation, that I was in danger by some of the Irish papists. This, he said, was a reflection on the king, who hated all such practices. And to this he added, that by the laws of England all the king's subjects were bound to seize on any person that was condemned in his courts, in what manner soever they could: and therefore he desired, that both I, and the printer of that paper, might be punished. But now upon his return to the Hague, I being outlawed by that time, he demanded, that, in pursuance of an article of the treaty that related to rebels or fugitives, I might be banished the Provinces. And to this he craved once and again a speedy answer.

I was called before the deputies of the States of Holland, that I might answer the two memorials that lay before them relating to myself. I observed the difference between them. The one desired that the States would punish me, which did acknowledge me to be their subject. The other, in contradiction to that, laid claim to me as the king's rebel. As to the particulars complained of, I had made no reflection on the king; but to the contrary. I said, my enemies found it was not yet time to persecute for religion. This insinuated, that the king could not be brought to it; and no person could be offended with this, but he who thought it was now not too early to persecute. As to that of the danger in which I apprehended myself to be in, I had now more reason than before to complain of it, since the envoy had so publicly affirmed, that every one of the king's subjects might seize on any one that was condemned, in what manner soever they could, which was either dead or alive. I was now the subject of the States of Holland, naturalized in order to a marriage among them, as they all knew; and therefore I claimed their protection. So, if I was charged with any thing that was not according to law, I submitted myself to their justice. I should decline no trial, nor the utmost severity, if I had offended in any thing. As for the two memorials that claimed me as a fugitive and a rebel, I could not be looked on as a fugitive from Scotland. It was now fourteen years since I had left that kingdom, and three since I came out of England with the king's leave. I had lived a year in the Hague openly; and nothing was laid to my charge. As for the sentence that was pretended to be passed against me, I could say nothing to it, till I saw a copy of it.

The States were fully satisfied with my answer: and ordered a memorial to be drawn according to them. They also ordered their ambassador to represent to the king that he himself knew how sacred a thing naturalization was. The faith and honour of every state was concerned in it. I had been naturalized upon marrying one of their subjects, which was the justest of all reasons. If the king had any thing to lay to my charge, justice should be done in their courts. The king took the matter very ill; and said, it was an affront offered him, and a just cause of war. Yet, after much passion, he said, he did not intend to make war upon it; for he was not then in a condition to do it. But he knew there were designs against him, to make war on him, against which he should take care to secure himself; and he should be on his guard. The ambassador asked him, of whom he meant that. But he did not think fit to explain himself further. He ordered a third memorial to be put in against me, in which the article of the treaty was set forth; but no notice was taken of the answers made to that by the States: but it was insisted on, that, since the States were bound not to give sanctuary to fugitives and rebels, they ought not to examine the grounds on which such judgments were given, but were bound to execute the treaty. Upon this it was observed, that the words in treaties ought to be explained according to their common acceptation, or the sense given them in the civil law, and not according to any particular forms of courts, where for non-appearance a writ of outlawry, or rebellion, might lie. The sense of the word rebel in common use was, a man that had borne arms, or had plotted against his prince; and a fugitive was a man that fled from justice. The heat with which the king seemed inflamed against me, carried him to say, and do, many things that were very little to his honour.

I had advertisements sent me of a further progress in his designs against me. He had it suggested to him, that, since a sentence was passed against me for non-appearance, and the States refused to deliver me up, he might order private persons to execute the sentence as they could: and it was written over very positively, that 5,000*l.* would be given to any one that should murder me. A gentleman of an unblemished reputation wrote me word, that he himself by accident saw an order drawn in the secretary's office, but not yet signed, for 3,000*l.* to a blank person that was to seize, or destroy, me*. And he also affirmed, that prince George had heard of the same thing, and had desired the person to whom he trusted it to convey the notice of it to me: and my author was employed by that person to send the notice to me. The king asked Jeffreys what he might do against me in a private way, now that he could not get me into his hands. Jeffreys answered, he did not see how the king could do any more than he had done. He told this to Mr. Kirk to send it to me; for he concluded the king was resolved to proceed to extremities, and only wanted the opinion of a man of the law to justify a more violent method. I had so many different advertisements sent me of this, that I concluded a whisper of such a design might have been set about, on design to frighten me into some mean submission, or into silence at least: but it had no other effect on me, but that I thought fit to stay more within doors, and to use a little more than ordinary caution. I thank God, I was very little concerned at it. I resigned up my life very freely to God. I knew my own innocence, and the root of all the malice that was against me. And I never possessed my own soul in a more perfect calm, and in a clearer cheerfulness of spirit, than I did during all those threatenings, and the apprehensions that others were in concerning me.

Soon after this a letter written by Fagel, the pensioner of Holland, was printed; which leads me to look back a little into a transaction that passed the former year. There was one Steward, a lawyer of Scotland, a man of great parts, and of as great ambition. He had given over the practice of the law, because all that were admitted to the bar in Scotland were required to renounce the covenant, which he would not do. This recommended him to the confidence of that whole party. They had made great use of him, and trusted him entirely. Penn had engaged him, who had been long considered by the king, as the chief manager of all the rebellions and plots that had been on foot these twenty years past, more particularly of Argyle's, to come over: and he undertook that he should not only be received into favour, but into confidence. He came, before he crossed the seas, to the prince, and promised an inviolable fidelity to him, and to the common interests of religion and liberty. He had been often with the pensioner, and had a great measure of his confidence. Upon his coming to court, he was caressed to a degree that amazed all who knew him. He either believed that the king was sincere in the professions he made, and that his designs went no further than to settle a full liberty of conscience; or, he thought, that it became a man who had been so long in disgrace, not to shew any jealousies at first, when the king was so gracious to him. He undertook to do all that lay in his power to advance his designs in Scotland, and to represent his intentions so at the Hague, as might incline the prince to a better opinion of them.

He opened all this in several letters to the pensioner: and in these he pressed him vehemently, in the king's name, and by his direction, to persuade the prince to concur with the king in procuring the laws to be repealed. He laid before him the inconsiderable number of the papists: so that there was no reason to apprehend much from them. He also enlarged on the severities that the penal laws had brought on the dissenters. The king was resolved not to consent to the repealing them, unless the tests were taken away with them; so that the refusing to consent to this might at another time bring them under another severe prosecution. Steward, after he had written many letters to this purpose without receiving any answers, tried if he could serve the king in Scotland with more success, than it seemed he was likely to have at the Hague. But he found there, that his old friends were now much alienated from him, looking on him as a person entirely gained by the court.

The pensioner laid all his letters before the prince. They were also brought to me. The prince upon this thought, that a full answer made by Fagel, in such a manner as that it might be published as a declaration of his intentions, might be of service to him in many respects ; chiefly in popish courts, that were on civil accounts inclined to an alliance against France, but were now possessed with an opinion of the prince, and of his party in England, as designing nothing but the ruin and extirpation of all the papists in those kingdoms. So the pensioner wrote a long answer to Steward, which was put in English by me.

He began it with great assurances of the prince and princess's duty to the king. They were both of them much against all persecution on the account of religion. They freely consented to the covering papists from the severities of the laws made against them on the account of their religion, and also that they might have the free exercise of it in private. They also consented to grant a full liberty to dissenters ; but they could not consent to the repeal of those laws, that tended only to the securing the protestant religion ; such as those concerning the tests, which imported no punishment, but only an incapacity of being in public employments, which could not be complained of as great severities. This was a caution observed in all nations, and was now necessary, both for securing the public peace and the established religion. If the numbers of the papists were so small as to make them inconsiderable, then it was not reasonable to make such a change for the sake of a few ; and if those few, that pretended to public employments, would do all their own party so great a prejudice, as not to suffer the king to be content with the repeal of the penal laws, unless they could get into the offices of trust, then their ambition was only to be blamed, if the offers now made were not accepted. The matter was very strongly argued through the whole letter ; and the prince and princess's zeal for the protestant religion was set out in terms, that could not be very acceptable to the king. The letter was carried by Steward to the king, and was brought by him into the cabinet council ; but nothing followed then upon it. The king ordered Steward to write back, that he would either have all, or nothing. All the lay-papists of England, who were not engaged in the intrigues of the priests, pressed earnestly that the king would accept of the repeal of the penal laws ; which was offered, and would have made them both easy and safe for the future. The emperor was fully satisfied with what was offered ; and promised to use his interest at Rome, to get the pope to write to the king to accept of this, as a step to the other : but I could not learn whether he did it, or not. If he did, it had no effect. The king was in all points governed by the jesuits, and the French ambassador.

Father Petre, as he had been long in the confidence, was now brought to the council board, and made a privy councillor : and it was given out that the king was resolved to get a cardinal's cap for him, and to make him archbishop of York. The pope was still firm to his resolution against it : but it was hoped that the king would conquer it, if not in the present, yet at furthest in the next pontificate. The king resolved at the same time not to disgust the secular priests : so bishop Leyburn, whom cardinal Howard had sent over with the episcopal character, was made much use of in appearance, though he had no great share in the counsels. There was a faction formed between the seculars and the jesuits, which was sometimes near breaking out into an open rupture. But the king was so partial to the jesuits, that the others found they were not on equal terms with them. There were three other bishops consecrated for England. And these four were ordered to make a progress and circuit over England, confirming, and doing other episcopal offices, in all the parts of England. Great numbers gathered about them, wheresoever they went.

The Jesuits thought all was sure, and that their scheme was so well laid that it could not miscarry ; and they had so possessed that contemptible tool of theirs, Albeville, with this, that he seemed upon his return to the Hague to be so sanguine, that he did not stick to speak out, what a wiser man would have suppressed though he had believed it. One day, when the prince was speaking of the promises the king had made, and the oath that he had sworn to maintain the laws and the established church, he, instead of pretending that the king still kept his word, said, upon some occasions princes must forget their promises. And, when the prince said, that the king ought to have more regard to the church of England, which was the main body of the nation. Albeville answered, that the body which he called the church of England would not have a being two years to an end. Thus he spoke out the designs of the court, both too early and too openly ; but at the same time he behaved himself in all other respects so poorly, that he became the jest of the Hague. The foreign ministers, M. d'Avaux, the French ambassador, not excepted, did not know how to excuse, or bear with, his weakness, which appeared on all occasions and in all companies.

What he wrote to England upon his first audiences was not known; but it was soon after spread up and down the kingdom, very artificially and with much industry, that the prince and princess had now consented to the repeal of the tests, as well as of the penal laws. This was written over by many hands to the Hague. The prince, to prevent the ill effects that might follow on such reports, gave orders to print the pensioner's letter to Steward; which was sent to all the parts of England, and was received with an universal joy. The dissenters saw themselves now safe in his intentions towards them. The church party was confirmed in their zeal for maintaining the tests. And the lay papists seemed likewise to be so well pleased with it, that they complained of those ambitious priests, and hungry courtiers, who were resolved, rather than lay down their aspirings and other projects, to leave them still exposed to the severities of the laws, though a freedom from these was now offered to them. But it was not easy to judge, whether this was sincerely meant by them, or if it was only a popular art, to recommend themselves under such a moderate appearance. The court saw the hurt that this letter did them. At first they hoped to have stifled it by calling it an imposture. But when they were driven from that, the king began to speak severely and indecently of the prince, not only to all about him, but even to foreign ministers: and resolved to put such marks of his indignation upon him, as should let all the world see how deep it was.

There were six regiments of the king's subjects, three English and three Scotch, in the service of the States. Some of them were old regiments, that had continued in their service during the two wars in the late king's reign. Others were raised since the peace in seventy-three. But these came not into their service under any capitulation, that had reserved an authority to the king to call for them at his pleasure. When Argyle and Monmouth made their invasion, the king desired that the States would lend them to him. Some of the towns of Holland were so jealous of the king, and wished Monmouth's success so much, that the prince found some difficulty in obtaining the consent of the States to send them over. There was no distinction made among them between papists and protestants, according to a maxim of the States with relation to their armies: so there were several papists in those regiments. And the king had showed such particular kindness to these, while they were in England, that at their return they formed a faction which was breeding great distractions among them. This was very uneasy to the prince, who began to see that he might have occasion to make use of those bodies, if things should be carried to a rupture between the king and him: and yet he did not know how he could trust them, while such officers were in command. He did not see neither how he could get rid of them well. But the king helped him out of that difficulty: he wrote to the States, that he had occasion for the six regiments of his subjects that were in their service, and desired that they should be sent over to him.

This demand was made all of the sudden, without any previous application to any of the States, to dispose them to grant it, or to many of the officers to persuade them to ask their congé to go over. The States pretended the regiments were theirs: they had paid levy money for them, and had them under no capitulation: so they excused themselves, that they could not part with them. But they gave orders, that all the officers that should ask their congé, should have it. Thirty, or forty, came and asked, and had their congé. So now the prince was delivered from some troublesome men by this management of the king's. Upon that, these bodies were so modelled, that the prince knew that he might depend entirely on them: and he was no more disturbed by those insolent officers, who had for some years behaved themselves rather as enemies, than as persons in the States' pay.

The discourse of a parliament was often taken up, and as often let fall: and it was not easy to judge in what such fluctuating counsels would end. Father Petre had gained such an ascendant, that he was considered as the first minister of state. The nuncio had moved the king to interpose, and mediate a reconciliation between the court of Rome and France. But he answered, that, since the pope would not gratify him in the promotion of father Petre, he would leave him to free himself of the trouble, into which he had involved himself.

the best way he could. And our court reckoned, that as soon as the pope felt himself pressed, he would fly to the king for protection, and grant him everything that he asked of him in order to obtain it. That Jesuit gave daily new proofs of a weak and ill-governed passion, and discovered all the ill qualities of one, that seemed raised up to be the common incendiary, and to drive the king and his party to the precipice.

Towards the end of April the king thought fit to renew the declaration that he had set out the former year for liberty of conscience, with an addition, declaring that he would adhere firmly to it, and that he would put none in any public employments, but such as would concur with him in maintaining it. He also promised, that he would hold a parliament in the November following. This promise of a parliament so long beforehand was somewhat extraordinary. Both father Petre, and Penn, engaged the king to it, but with a different prospect. Penn, and all the tools who were employed by him, had still some hopes of carrying a parliament to agree with the king, if too much time was not lost : whereas the delaying a parliament raised jealousies, as if none were intended, but that it was only talked of to amuse the nation till other designs were ripe.

On the other hand, father Petre and his cabal saw that the king was kept off from many things that they proposed, with the expectation of the concurrence of a parliament : and the fear of giving new disgusts, which might obstruct that, had begotten a caution that was very uneasy to them. They thought that much time was already lost, and that they made but a small progress. They began to apprehend that the regulators, who were still feeding them with hopes, and were asking more time, and more money, did intend only to amuse them, and to wear out the business into more length, and to keep themselves the longer in credit and in pay ; but that they did not in their hearts wish well to the main design, and therefore acted but an insincere part with the king. Therefore they resolved to put that matter to the last trial, reckoning that, if the king saw it was in vain to hope for anything in a parliamentary way, he might be more easily carried to extreme and violent methods.

The king was not satisfied with the publishing his declaration : but he resolved to oblige the clergy to read it in all their churches in the time of divine service. And now it appeared what bad effects were likely to follow on that officious motion that Sancroft had made, for obliging the clergy to read the declaration that king Charles set out in the year 1681, after the dissolution of the Oxford parliament. An order passed in council, requiring the bishops to send copies of the declaration to all their clergy, and to order them to read it on two several Sundays in time of divine service.

This put the clergy under great difficulties. And they were at first much divided about it. Even many of the best and worthiest of them were under some distraction of thought. They had many meetings, and argued the point long among themselves, in and about London. On the one hand it was said, that if they refused to read it, the king would proceed against them for disobedience. It did not seem reasonable to run so great a hazard upon such a point, that was not strong enough to bear the consequences that might follow on a breach. Their reading it did not import their approving it. But was only a publication of an act of their king's. So it was proposed, to save the whole, by making some declaration, that their reading it was a mere act of obedience, and did not import any assent and approbation of theirs. Others thought, that the publishing this in such manner was only imposed on them, to make them odious and contemptible to the whole nation, for reading that which was intended for their ruin. If they carried their compliance so far, that might provoke the nobility and gentry to carry theirs much further. If they once yielded the point, that they were bound to read every declaration, with this salvo that it did not import their approving it, they would be then bound to read everything that should be sent to them : the king might make declarations in favour of all the points of popery, and require them to read them : and they could not see where they must make their stop, if they did it not now. So it seemed necessary to fix on this, as a rule, that they ought to publish nothing in time divine service but that which they approved of. The point at present was not whether toleration was a lawful, or an expedient, thing. The declaration was founded on the claim of a dispensing power, which the king did now assume, that tended to the total subversion of the government, and the making it arbitrary ; whereas, by the constitution, it was a legal administration. It also allowed such an infinite liberty, with the suspension of all penal laws, and that without any limitation, that paganism itself might be now publicly professed. It was visible, that the design in imposing the reading of it on them was only to make them ridiculous, and to make them contribute to their own ruin. As for the danger that they might incur, they saw their ruin was resolved on - and nothing they could do was likely to prevent it, unless they would basely sacrifice their religion to their worldly interests. It would be perhaps a year sooner, or later, by any other management : it was therefore fit, that they should prepare themselves for suffering ; and not endeavour to prevent it by doing that, which would draw on them the hatred of their friends, and the scorn of their enemies.

These reasons prevailed : and they resolved not to read the declaration. They saw of what importance it was that they should be unanimous in this. Nothing could be of more fatal consequence than their being divided in their practice. For, if any considerable body of the clergy, such as could carry the name of the church of England, could have been prevailed on to give obedience, and only some number, how valuable soever the men might be, should refuse to obey ; then the court might still pretend that they would maintain the church of England, and single out all those who had not given obedience, and fall on them, and so break the church within itself upon this point, and then destroy the one half by the means of the rest. The most eminent were resolved not to obey : and those who might be prevailed on to comply would by that means fall under such contempt, that they could not have the credit or strength to support the established religion. The court depended upon this, that the greater part would obey : and so they would be furnished with a point of state, to give a colour for turning out the disobedient, who were likely to be the men that stood most in their way, and crossed their designs most, both with their learning and credit.

Those few bishops that were engaged in the design of betraying the church, were persuaded that this would be the event of the matter : and they possessed the king with the hope of it so positively, that he seemed to depend upon it. The correspondence over England was managed with that secrecy, that these resolutions were so communicated to the clergy in the country, that they were generally engaged to agree in their conduct, before the court came to apprehend that they would be so unanimous, as it proved in conclusion that they were.

The archbishop of Canterbury, Sancroft, resolved upon this occasion to act suitably to his post and character. He wrote round his province, and desired that such of the bishops as were able would come up and consult together in a matter of this great concern : and he asked the opinion of those whom their age and infirmities disabled from taking the journey. He found that eighteen of the bishops, and the main body of the clergy, concurred in the resolution against reading the declaration. So he, with six of the bishops that came up to London, resolved, in a petition to the king, to lay before him the reasons that determined them not to obey the order of council that had been sent them : this flowed from no want of respect to his majesty's authority, nor from any unwillingness to let favour be shown to dissenters ; in relation to whom they were willing to come to such a temper as should be thought fit when that matter should be considered and settled in parliament and convocation : but, this declaration being founded on such a dispensing power as had been often declared illegal in parliament, both in the year 1662 and in the year 1672, and in the beginning of his own reign, and was a matter of so great consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, they could not in prudence, honour, and conscience, make themselves so far parties to it, as the publication of it once and again in God's house, and in the time of divine service, must amount to.

The archbishop was then in an ill state of health. So he sent over the six bishops with the petition to the king, signed by himself and the rest. The king was much surprised with this, being flattered and deceived by his spies. Cartwright, bishop of Chester, was possessed with a story that was too easily believed by him, and was by him carried to the king, who was very apt to believe everything that suited with his own designs. The story was, that the bishops intended, by a petition to the king, to let him understand that orders of this kind used to be addressed to their chancellors, but not to themselves ; and to pray him to continue that method : and that by this means they hoped to get out of this difficulty. This was very acceptable to the court, and procured the bishops a quick admittance. And they had proceeded so carefully that nothing concerted among them had broken out; for they had been very secret and cautious. The king, when he heard their petition, and saw his mistake, spoke roughly to them. He said, he was their king, and he would be obeyed: and they should be made to feel what it was to disobey him. The six bishops, were St. Asaph, Ely, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chichester, and Bristol. The answer they made the king was in these words: "The will of God be done." And they came from the court in a sort of triumph. Now matters were brought to a crisis. The king was engaged on his part, as the bishops were on theirs. So all people looked on with great expectations, reckoning that upon the issue of this business a great decision would be made, both of the designs of the court, and of the temper of the nation.

The king consulted for some days with all that were now employed by him, what he should do upon this emergent; and talked with people of all persuasions. Lob, an eminent man among the dissenters, who was entirely gained to the court, advised the king to send the bishops to the Tower. Father Petre seemed now as one transported with joy: for he thought the king was engaged to break with the church of England. And it was reported that he broke out into that indecent expression upon it, that they should be made to eat their own dung. The king was long in doubt. Some of the popish nobility pressed him earnestly to let the matter fall: for now it appeared, that the body of the clergy were resolved not to read the declaration. Those who did obey were few and inconsiderable. Only seven obeyed in the city of London, and not above two hundred all England over: and of these some read it the first Sunday, but changed their minds before the second: others declared in their sermons, that though they obeyed the order, they did not approve of the declaration: and one, more pleasantly than gravely, told his people that, though he was obliged to read it, they were not obliged to hear it; and he stopped till they all went out, and then he read it to the walls. In many places, as soon as the minister began to read it, all the people rose and went out*.

The king did what he could to encourage those that did obey his order. Parker, bishop of Oxford, died about this time. He wrote a book against the tests full of petulant scurrility, of which I shall only give one instance. He had reflected much on the whole popish plot, and on Oates's evidence: and upon that he called the test, the sacrament of the Oatesian villany. He treated the parliament, that enacted the tests, with a scorn that no popish writer had yet ventured on: and he said much to excuse transubstantiation, and to free the church of Rome from the charge of idolatry. This raised such a disgust at him, even in those that had been formerly but too much influenced by him, that, when he could not help seeing that, he sunk upon it. I was desired to answer his book with the severity that he deserved: and I did it with an acrimony of style, that nothing but such a time, and such a man, could in any sort excuse. It was said, the king sent him my papers, hearing that nobody else durst put them in his hands, hoping that it would raise his indignation, and engage him to answer them. One Hall, a conformist in London, who was looked on as half a presbyterian, yet, because he read the declaration, was made bishop of Oxford. One of the popish bishops was upon the king's mandamus chosen, by the illegal fellows of Magdalen's college, their president. The sense of the nation, as well as of the clergy, had appeared so signally on this occasion, that it was visible, that the king had not only the seven petitioning bishops to deal with, but the body of the whole nation, both clergy and laity.

The violent advices of father Petre, and the Jesuit party, were so fatally suited to the king's own temper and passion, that they prevailed over the wiser counsels of almost all that were advised with. But the king, before he would bring the matter to the council, secretly engaged all the privy councillors to concur with him: and, after a fortnight's consultation, the bishops were cited to appear before the council. The petition was offered to them; and they were asked if they owned it to be their petition. They answered, it seemed they were * The earl of Dartmouth says he was then at Westminster school. As soon as bishop Sprat, who was then dean, gave order for the declaration being read, there was so great a murmur and noise in the Abbey, that no one could hear him; but, before he had finished, there was to be proceeded against upon that account ; so they hoped the king would not press them to a confession, and then make use of it against them : after they had offered this, they owned the petition. They were next charged with the publication of it ; for it was then printed. But they absolutely denied that was done by their means. The archbishop had written the petition all in his own hand, without employing any person to copy it out : and though there was one draught written of the petition, as it was agreed on, from which he had written out the original which they had all signed, yet he had kept that still in his own possession, and had never shown it to any person : so it was not published by them : that must have been done by some of those to whom the king had shown it.

They were in the next place required to enter into bonds, to appear in the court of king's bench, and answer to an information of misdemeanor. They excepted to this ; and said, that by their peerage they were not bound to do it. Upon their insisting on this, they were sent to the Tower, by a warrant signed by the whole board, except father Petre, who was passed over by the king's order. This set the whole city into the highest fermentation that was ever known in memory of man. The bishops were sent by water to the Tower : and all along as they passed the banks of the river were full of people, who kneeled down and asked their blessing, and with loud shouts expressed their good wishes for them, and their concern in their preservation. The soldiers, and other officers in the Tower, did the same. An universal consternation appeared in all people's looks. But the king was not moved with all this. And, though two days after, upon the queen's pretended delivery, the king had a fair occasion to have granted a general pardon, to celebrate the joy of that birth (and it was given out by those papists that had always affected to pass for moderate men, that they had all pressed this vehemently), the king was inflexible : he said, his authority would become contemptible, if he suffered such an affront to pass unpunished.

A week after their commitment, they were brought upon a habeas corpus to the king's bench bar, where their counsel offered to make it appear to be an illegal commitment : but the court allowed it good in law. They were required to enter into bonds for small sums, to answer to the information that day fortnight.

The bishops were discharged of their imprisonment : and people of all sorts ran to visit them as confessors, one company going in as another went out. The appearance in Westminster-hall was very solemn : about thirty of the nobility accompanying them. All the streets were full of shoutings the rest of the day, and with bonfires at night.

When the day fixed for their trial came, there was a vast concourse. Westminster-hall, and all the places about, were full of people, who were strangely affected with the matter. Even the army, that was then encamped on Hounslow Heath, showed such a disposition to mutiny, that it gave the king no small uneasiness. The trial came on, which was chiefly managed against the bishops by sir William Williams. He had been speaker in two successive parliaments, and was a zealous promoter of the exclusion : and he had continued many years a bold pleader in all causes against the court : but he was a corrupt and vicious man, who had no principles, but followed his own interests. Sawyer, the attorney-general, who had for many years served the ends of the court in a most abject and obsequious manner, would not support the dispensing power : so he was turned out, Powis being advanced to be attorney-general : and Williams was made solicitor-general. Powis acted his part in this trial as fairly as his post could admit of. But Williams took very indecent liberties. And he had great advantages over Sawyer and Finch, who were among the bishops' counsel, by reflecting on the precedents and proceedings during their being the king's counsel. The king's counsel could not have full proof that the bishops' hands were truly theirs, and were forced to have recourse to the confession they had made at the council board : which was thought very dishonourable, since they had made that confession in confidence, trusting to the king's honour, though it did not appear that any promise was made, that no advantage should be taken of that confession. No proof was brought of their publishing it, which was the main point. The presenting it to the king, and afterwards their owning it to be their petition, when it was put to them at the council board, was all that the king's counsel could offer for proof of this ; which was an apparent strain, in which even those judges that were the surest to the court, did not seem to be satisfied. It was much urged against them, that this petition was a libel, tending to the defaming the king's government.

But to this it was answered, that they having received an order, to which they found they could not give obedience, thought it was incumbent on them, as bishops and as subjects, to lay before the king their reasons for it: all subjects had a right to petition the king: they, as peers, were of his great council, and so had yet a better claim to that: and that more particularly in matters of religion; for the act of uniformity in queen Elizabeth's time had required them under a curse to look carefully after those matters; the dispensing power had been often brought into debate in parliament, and was always voted to be against law: and the late king had yielded the point by recalling his declaration: so they thought, they had a right to represent these things to the king. And occasion was often taken to reflect on the dispensing power. To this the king's counsel replied, that the votes of one, or both houses were not laws, till they were enacted by king and parliament: and the late king's passing once from a point of his prerogative did not give it up, but only waved it for that time: they urged much the sacredness of the king's authority; that a paper might be true in fact, and yet be a libel; that in parliament the two houses had a right to petition, but it was sedition to do it in a point of government out of parliament.

The trial did last long, above ten hours. The crowds continued in expectation all the while, and expressed so great a concern for the bishops, that the witnesses who were brought against them were not only treated with much scorn and loud laughter upon every occasion, but seemed to be in such danger, that they escaped narrowly, going away by a back passage. Two of the judges, Powel and Halloway, delivered their opinion, that there was no seditious matter in the petition, and that it was no libel. Wright was now brought into this court and made chief justice; and Herbert was made chief justice of the common pleas: Herbert was with the court in the main of the king's dispensing power, but was against them in most particulars: so he could not serve their ends in this court. Wright was the more proper tool. He in his charge called the petition a libel: but he did not think the publication was proved.

The jury was fairly returned. When they were shut up, they were soon agreed upon their verdict, to acquit the bishops. But it was thought to be both the more solemn, and the safer way, to continue shut up till the morning. The king still flattered himself with the hope that the bishops would be brought in guilty. He went that morning to the camp: for the ill humour the army was in the day before, made him think it necessary to go and keep them in awe and order, by his own presence.

The court sat again next day. And then the jury came in with their verdict. Upon which there were such shoutings, so long continued, and as it were echoed into the city, that all people were struck with it. Every man seemed transported with joy. Bonfires were made all about the streets. And the news going over the nation, produced the like rejoicings and bonfires all England over. The king's presence kept the army in some order. But he was no sooner gone out of the camp, than he was followed with an universal shouting, as if it had been a victory obtained*. And so fatally was the king pushed on to his ruin, that * The following are more particular details, relative to this memorable transaction. The petition was as follows:

"The Petition of some of the Bishops to King James the Second, against promulgating his 'Declaration for liberty of conscience.'

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

"The humble Petition of William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and of divers of the suffragan Bishops of that province, now present with him, in behalf of ourselves and other of our absent brethren, and of the Clergy of our respective dioceses.

"Humbly sheweth,

"That the great averseness they find in themselves to the distributing and publishing, in all their churches, your Majesty's late declaration for liberty of conscience, proceedeth neither from any want of duty and obedience to your Majesty, (our holy mother, the Church of England, being, both in her principles and constant practice, unquestionably loyal; and having, to her great honour, been more than once publicly acknowledged to be so by your gracious Majesty,) nor yet from any want of due tenderness to Dissenters: in relation to whom they are willing to come to such a temper, as shall be thought fit, when that matter shall be considered and settled in Parliament and Convocation; but, among many other considerations, from this especially, because that declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power, as hath been often declared illegal in Parliament; and particularly in the years 1662 and 1672, and in the beginning of your Majesty's reign: and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in Church and State, that your petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it, as the distribution of it he seemed not to be, by all this, enough convinced of the folly of those violent counsels. He intended still to pursue them. It was therefore resolved on, to bring this matter of the contempt of the order of council, in not reading the declaration, before the ecclesiastical commis-all over the nation, and the solemn publication of it once and again, even in God's house, and in the time of his divine service, must amount to in common and reasonable construction.

"Your petitioners, therefore, most humbly and earnestly beseech your Majesty, that you will be graciously pleased not to insist upon the distributing and reading your Majesty's said declaration.

"And your petitioners will ever pray, &c."—Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 478.

This petition was signed by William Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; William Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph; Francis Turner, of Ely; John Lake, of Chichester; Thomas Ken, of Bath and Wells; Thomas White, of Peterborough; and Jonathan Trelawney, of Bristol. It was signed in the presence of, and consented to, by Henry, bishop of London<sup>a</sup>; Dr. Tillotson, dean of Canterbury; Stillingfleet, dean of St. Paul's; Patrick, dean of Peterborough; Tenison, vicar of St. Martin's in the Fields; Grove, rector of St. Andrew's Undershaft; and Sherlock, master of the Temple.

When the bishops came to present the petition, they were "brought to the king in his closet within his bed-chamber, where the bishop of St. Asaph, with the rest, all being upon their knees, delivered the petition to his majesty. He was pleased at first to receive the petitioners and their petition graciously, and, having opened it, said, 'This is my lord of Canterbury's own hand.' To which the bishops replied, 'Yes, Sir; it is his own hand.' But the king, having read it over, and then folding it up, said thus, or to this effect:

King. This is a great surprise to me: here are strange words. I did not expect this from you; especially from some of you. This is a standard of rebellion.

St. Asaph, and some of the rest, replied, that they had adventured their lives for his majesty, and would lose the last drop of their blood, rather than lift up a finger against him.

King. I tell you this is a standard of rebellion: I never saw such an address.

Bristol, falling down on his knees, said, Rebellion! Sir, I beseech you, do not say so hard a thing of us. For God's sake, do not believe we are, or can be, guilty of rebellion; it is impossible that I, or any of my family, should be so. Your majesty cannot but remember that you sent me down into Cornwall, to quell Monmouth's rebellion; and I am as ready to do what I can to quell another, if there were occasion.

Chichester. Sir, we have quelled one rebellion, and will not raise another.

Ely. We rebel! Sir, we are ready to die at your feet.

Bath and Wells. Sir, I hope you will give that liberty to us, which you allow to all mankind.

Peterborough. Sir, you allow liberty of conscience to all mankind: the reading this declaration is against our conscience.

King. I will keep this paper. It is the strangest address which I ever saw: it tends to rebellion. Do you question my dispensing power? Some of you here have printed and preached for it, when it was for your purpose.

Peterborough. Sir, what we say of the dispensing power, refers only to what was declared in parliament.

King. The dispensing power was never questioned by the men of the church of England.

St. Asaph. It was declared against in the first parliament called by his late majesty, and by that which was called by your majesty.

The King, insisting upon the tendency of the petition to rebellion, said, he would have his declaration published.

Bath and Wells. We are bound to fear God, and honour the king: we desire to do both. We will honour you; we must fear God.

Bristol. We will do our duty to your majesty in every thing to the utmost, which does not interfere with our duty to God.

King. Is this what I have deserved of you, who have supported the church of England, and will support it? I will remember you that have signed this paper: I will keep this paper; I will not part with it. I did not expect this from you; especially from some of you: I will be obeyed in publishing my declaration.

Bath and Wells. God's will be done!

King. What is that?

Bath and Wells and Peterborough. God's will be done!

King. If I think fit to alter my mind, I will send to you. God hath given me this dispensing power, and I will maintain it. I tell you, there are seven thousand men, and of the church of England too, that have not bowed their knees to Baal.

This is the sum of what passed, as far as the bishops could recollect it; and this being said, they were dismissed."—Archbishop Sancroft's MSS.; Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 479, &c.

"On Friday, June 8th, at five in the afternoon, his majesty came into the privy council. About half an hour after, the archbishop and six bishops, who were attending in the next room, were called into the council chamber, and graciously received by his majesty. The lord chancellor took a paper then lying on the table, and, showing it to the archbishop, asked him in words to this effect:—'Is this the petition that was written and signed by your grace, and which these bishops presented to his majesty?' The archbishop received the paper from the lord chancellor, and, addressing himself to his majesty, said to this purpose: 'Sir, I am called hither as a criminal, which I never was before in my life, and little thought I ever should be, especially before your majesty: but, since it is my unhappiness to be so at this time, I hope your majesty will not be offended, that I am cautious of answering questions. No man is obliged to answer questions that may tend to the accusing of himself.' His majesty called this chicanery, and hoped he would not deny his hand. The archbishop still insisted upon it, that there could be no other end of this question, but to draw such an answer from him as might afford ground for an accusation; and therefore desired there might be no answer required of him. St. Asaph said, 'All divines of all christian churches agree in this, that no man in our circumstances is obliged to answer any such questions.' The king still pressing for an answer with some seeming impatience, the archbishop said, 'Sir, though we are not obliged to give any answer to this question, yet, if your majesty lays your command upon us, we shall answer it, in trust upon your majesty's justice and generosity, that we shall not suffer for our obedience, as we must if our answer should be brought in evidence against us.' His majesty said, 'No, I will not command you; if you will deny your own hand, sioners. They did not think fit to cite the archbishop and bishops before them: for they did not doubt they would plead to their jurisdiction, and refuse to acknowledge their authority; which they hoped their chancellors, and the inferior clergy, would not venture on.

I know not what to say to you,' &c. The lord chancellor said, 'Withdraw.' After about half a quarter of an hour, they were called in again. Then the lord chancellor said, 'His majesty has commanded me to require you to answer this question: Whether these be your hands that are set to this petition?' His majesty himself also said, 'I command you to answer this question.' Then the archbishop took the petition, and, having read it over, said, 'I own that I wrote this petition, and that this is my hand.' Then the lord chancellor asked each of the bishops; and they all acknowledged their hands, and that they delivered this petition. Then they were commanded to withdraw. After a while, they were called in a third time. Then the lord chancellor told them, 'It is his majesty's pleasure to have you proceeded against for this petition; but it shall be with all fairness at Westminster Hall. There will be an information against you, which you are to answer; and in order to that, you are to enter into a recognisance.' The archbishop said, 'that without a recognisance they should be ready to appear, and to answer, whenever they were called.' One of the bishops said, the lord Lovelace had been called before the council, to answer to a complaint that was brought against him, and that he was allowed to answer it in Westminster Hall, without entering into any recognisance; and that they hoped they might be allowed to answer in like manner. The lord chancellor said, 'the lord Lovelace had affronted his majesty, and behaved himself very rudely before them; and, therefore, his majesty would have him proceeded against in the common way; but, for the bishops there present, his majesty was pleased to treat them with all favour in respect of their character; and therefore he would have them enter into a recognisance.' His majesty was pleased to say, 'I offer you this as a favour, and I would not have you refuse it.' St. Asaph said, 'Whatsoever favour your majesty vouchsafes to offer to any person, you are pleased to leave it to him whether he will accept it or no; and you do not expect he should accept it to his own prejudice. We conceive that this entering into recognisance may be prejudicial to us; and, therefore, we hope your majesty will not be offended at our declining it.' Then the lord chancellor said, 'There are but three ways to proceed in matters of this kind: it must be either by commitment, or by recognisance, or by subpoena out of the king's bench. His majesty was not willing to take the common way in proceeding against you, but he would give you leave to enter into recognisance;' and his lordship again advised them to accept it. Some of the bishops said, they were informed that no man was obliged to enter into recognisance, unless there were special matter against him, and that there was an oath of it made against that person. This they said, not considering that now the petition was made special matter, and that their confessing it was as good as an oath. But at last they insisted on this, that there was no precedent for it, that any member of the house of peers should be bound in recognisance for misdemeanour. The lord chancellor said there were precedents for it; but, being desired to name one, he named none. The bishops desired to be proceeded against the common way; but that was not allowed, and they were a third time commanded to withdraw.

"A while after, they were called in the fourth time, and asked, whether they had considered of it better? and whether they would accept of his majesty's favour? The archbishop said, he had the advice of the best counsel in town, and they warned him of this, assuring him it would be to his prejudice; and therefore he desired that it might not be required, offering his promise again to appear and to answer, whensoever he should be called. But his majesty seemed to be displeased, and said, 'You will believe others before you will believe me.' So they were the fourth time commanded to withdraw.

"A good while after this, the earl of Berkely came forth to the bishops, and endeavoured first to persuade the archbishop to enter into recognisance, which he thought had been agreed between them over-night; for on Thursday night, almost at bed-time, his lordship came to the archbishop at Lambeth, and, after half an hour's discourse, at last came to speak of his appearing at council the next day, and then advised his grace to offer a recognisance. His grace said, 'I am advised to that way.' His lordship said, 'That is well;' and soon after took his leave. Now he seemed to look upon it as something strange, that his grace should refuse to enter into recognisance; but finding him fixed, he endeavoured to persuade the other bishops. He told them he would do it, if he were in their case; but finding them all of a mind, he went outward from the council, but soon after returned that way into the council chamber again; from whence, about half an hour after, came forth Mr. Riley, a serjeant-at-arms, with the warrant, signed with fifteen hands, to carry the seven bishops to the Tower; and another warrant, with nineteen hands and seals, for the lieutenant of the Tower to keep them in safe custody."—Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 481.

Dialogue between the King and Bishops, after the third or fourth coming in.

A. Sir, we appear before you this day, by virtue of your summons, as criminals; the first time that ever I stood as a criminal before any man, and I am sorry that it happens to be before my sovereign lord. We are advised, Sir, that they, who are in this condition of criminals, are not obliged to answer to any questions which may be to their prejudice; notwithstanding, if your majesty requires it of us, we will tell you the true matter of fact, trusting in your majesty's justice and generosity, that no advantage shall be taken against us from our confession.

Q. Is this your petition?

R. Pray, Sir, give us leave to see it; and if, upon perusal, it appears to be the same—yes, Sir, this is our petition, and these are our subscriptions.

Q. Who were present at the forming of it?

R. All who have subscribed it.

Q. Were no other persons present?

R. It is our great infelicity that we are here as criminals; and your majesty is so just and generous that you will not require us to accuse either ourselves or others.

Q. Upon what occasion came you to London?

R. I received an intimation from the archbishop, that my advice and assistance was required in the affairs of the church.

Q. What were the affairs which you consulted of?

R. The matter of the petition.

Q. What is the temper you are ready to come to with the dissenters?

R. We refer ourselves to the petition.

Q. What mean you by the dispensing power being declared illegal in parliament?

R. The words are so plain that we cannot use any plainer.

Q. What want of prudence or honour is there in obeying the king?

Citations were sent out requiring the chancellors and archdeacons to send in the lists of all the clergy, both of such as had obeyed, and of those who had not obeyed the order of council. Some of these were now so much animated, with the sense that the nation had expressed of the bishops' imprisonment and trial, that they declared they would not obey this order: and others excused themselves in softer terms. When the day came to which they were cited, the bishop of Rochester, though he himself had obeyed the order, and had hitherto gone along, sitting with the other commissioners, but had always voted on the milder side, yet now, when he saw matters were running so fast to the ruin of the church, he not only would sit no longer with them, but wrote a letter to them; in which he said, it was impossible for him to go on with them any longer, for though he himself had obeyed the order of council, which he protested he did because he thought he was bound in conscience to do it, yet he did not doubt but that those who had not obeyed it had gone upon the same principle of following their conscience, and he would much rather choose to suffer with them, than to concur in making them suffer. This stopped proceedings for that day, and put the court to a stand. So they adjourned themselves till December, and they never sat any more.

This was the progress of that transaction, which was considered all Europe over as the

R. What is against conscience is against prudence and honour too, especially in persons of our character.

Q. Why is it against conscience?

R. Because our consciences oblige us (as far as we are able) to preserve our laws and religion according to the Reformation.

Q. Is the dispensing power then against law?

R. We refer ourselves to the petition.

Q. How could the distributing and reading the declaration make you parties to it?

R. We refer ourselves to our petition, whether the common and reasonable construction of mankind would not make it so.

Q. Did you disperse a printed letter in the country, or otherwise dissuade any of the clergy from reading it?

R. If this be one of the articles of misdemeanour against us, we desire to answer it with the rest.

General. We acknowledge the petition: we are summoned to appear here to answer such matters of misdemeanour as shall be objected; we therefore humbly desire a copy of our charge, and that time convenient may be allowed us to advise about it, and answer it. We are here in obedience to his majesty's command, to receive our charge, but humbly desire we may be excused from answering questions, from whence occasion may be taken against us.—Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 483.

Henry, earl of Clarendon, in his Diary, May 18, 1688, says, "In the evening, the bishops, six in number, presented a petition to the king, praying that his majesty would recall his proclamation for reading the Proclamation of Indulgence in the churches. It was written with the archbishop's own hand, and signed by himself and the other six. The king took them into the room within the bed-chamber; when he had read the petition, he was angry, and said, he did not expect such a petition from them. This the bishop of St. Asaph told me when he came home."

So angry was James, that the next day he appears to have sent for all the judges to Whitehall, to consult them upon this episcopal offence.—(Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 172.) On the 28th, Lord Sunderland sent a summons to them to appear before the king in council, on the 8th of June, to answer to such matters of misdemeanour as should be then objected against them.—(Ibid. 173.) The king was informed that lord Clarendon had been present when the bishops' petition was drawn up at Lambeth; and this is not at all improbable, since he mentions in his diary that he had frequent conferences subsequently with them, at his own house. On the 8th of June they appeared before the council, and were called upon to enter into recognizances to appear in the court of King's Bench on the first day of the following term; and, upon refusing, they were committed to the Tower: and the attorney-general was ordered to prefer an information against them. On the following day, lord Clarendon relates that "multitudes of people went to the Tower to the bishops." The lord chancellor (Jeffreys) told lord Clarendon that he regretted very much that the king had been induced to proceed with the prosecution of the bishops, which at one time he had declined; "some men (he added) would hurry the king to his destruction."

On the 15th of June the attorney-general moved to have the bishops brought to the bar of the court of King's Bench. "Both the hall and palace yard were extremely crowded: all the way, as the bishops came from the bridge, where they landed, to the very court, the people made a lane for them, and begged their blessings. When they were in court, the information against them was read. The bishops' counsel offered several pleas, but they were all overruled; judge Powell dissenting from his brethren on every point. At last they pleaded the general issue; and so their trials were appointed to be this day fortnight. The court took their own recognizances to appear then, the archbishop in 200*l.*, the rest in 100*l.* each; and so they went home; the people in like manner crowding for their blessing. As I was taking coach in the little Palace-yard, I found the bishop of St. Asaph in the midst of a crowd, the people thinking it a blessing to kiss any of these bishops' hands, or garments."—Ibid. 177.

On the 21st the chancellor had introduced to the king, Sir Samuel Astry; and, as he was to strike the jury, it was immediately reported it was for foul play against the bishops.—(Ib. 178.) According to the same authority, sir Robert Clarke had been very busy at sir Samuel Astry's about the jury. This was not portentous of good, and the chance of justice being administered, was still farther diminished, if, as the lord chancellor told lord Clarendon, the judges were "most of them rogues."—(Ib. 179.) On the 29th they were brought to trial; the proceedings lasted from nine in the morning until after six in the evening. "When the jury withdrew, the court adjourned until ten the next morning; and at that time, the jury, (sir Roger Langley, foreman) brought in their verdict 'not guilty;' upon which there was a most wonderful shout, that one would have thought the hall had cracked, inasmuch that the court took notice of it. In the evening multitudes of bonfires were made to celebrate the acquittal."

trial, whether the king or the church were like to prevail. The decision was as favourable as was possible. The king did assume to himself a power to make laws void, and to qualify men for employments, whom the law had put under such incapacities, that all they did was null and void. The sheriffs and mayors of towns were no legal officers; judges (one of them being a professed papist, Alibon,) who took not the test, were no judges: so that the government, and the legal administration of it, was broken. A parliament returned by such men was no legal parliament. All this was done by virtue of the dispensing power, which changed the whole frame of our government, and subjected all the laws to the king's pleasure; for, upon the same pretence of that power, other declarations might have come out, voiding any other laws that the court found stood in their way; since we had scarce any law that was fortified with such clauses, to force the execution of it, as those that were laid aside had in them. And when the king pretended that this was such a sacred point of government, that a petition, offered in the modestest terms, and in the humblest manner possible, calling it in question, was made so great a crime, and carried so far against men of such eminence; this, I confess, satisfied me, that here was a total destruction of our constitution, avowedly begun, and violently prosecuted. Here was not jealousy, nor fears; the thing was open and avowed. This was not a single act of illegal violence, but a declared design against the whole of our constitution. It was not only the judgment of a court of law: the king had now by two public acts of state, renewed in two successive years, openly published his design. This appeared such a total subversion, that, according to the principles, that some of the highest assertors of submission and obedience, Barklay and Grotius, had laid down, it was now lawful for the nation to look to itself, and see to its own preservation. And, as soon as any man was convinced that this was lawful, there remained nothing but to look to the prince of Orange, who was the only person that either could save them, or had a right to it: since by all the laws in the world, even private as well as public, he that has in him the reversion of any estate, has a right to hinder the possessor, if he goes about to destroy that, which is to come to him after the possessor's death.

Upon all this disorder that England was falling into, admiral Russel came to the Hague. He had a good pretence for coming over to Holland, for he had a sister then living in it. He was desired by many of great power and interest in England to speak very freely to the prince, and to know positively of him what might be expected from him. All people were now in a gaze: those who had little or no religion had no mind to turn papists, if they could see any probable way of resisting the fury with which the court was now driving; but men of fortune, if they saw no visible prospect, would be governed by their present interest: they were at present united; but, if a breaking should once happen, and some men of figure should be prevailed on to change, that might go far; especially in a corrupt and dissolute army, that was as it were let loose to commit crimes and violences every where, in which they were rather encouraged than punished; for it seemed to be set up as a maxim, that the army by rendering itself odious to the nation would become thereby entirely devoted to the court: but after all, though soldiers were bad Englishmen and worse Christians, yet the court found them too good protestants to trust much to them. So Russel put the prince to explain himself what he intended to do.

The prince answered, that, if he was invited by some men of the best interest, and the most valued in the nation, who should, both in their own name and in the name of others who trusted them, invite him to come and rescue the nation and the religion, he believed he could be ready by the end of September to come over. The main confidence we had was in the electoral prince of Brandenburg; for the old elector was then dying. And I told Russel at parting, that, unless he died, there would be great difficulties, not easily mastered, in the design of the prince's expedition to England.

He was then ill of a dropsy, which, coming after a gout of a long continuance, seemed to threaten a speedy end of his life. I had the honour to see him at Cleves; and was admitted to two long audiences, in which he was pleased to speak to me with great freedom. He was a prince of great courage. He both understood military matters well, and loved them much. He had a very perfect view of the state Europe had been in for fifty years, in which he had borne a great share in all affairs, having directed his own counsels himself. He had a wonderful memory, even in the smallest matters; for every thing passed under his eye. He had a quick apprehension, and a choleric temper. The heat of his spirits was apt to kindle too quick, till his interest cooled him; and that fetched him back, which brought him under the censure of changing sides too soon, and too often. He was a very zealous man in all the concerns of religion. His own life was regular, and free of all blemishes. He tried all that was possible to bring the Lutherans, and Calvinists, to some terms of reconciliation. He complained much of the rigidity of the Lutherans, more particularly of those in Prussia: nor was he well pleased with the stiffness of the Calvinists: and he inveighed against the synod of Dort, as that which had set all on fire, and made matters almost past reconciling. He thought, all positive decisions in those matters ought to be laid aside by both parties, without which nothing could bring them to a better temper.

He had a very splendid court; and to maintain that, and his great armies, his subjects were pressed hard by many uneasy taxes. He seemed not to have a just sense of the miseries of his people. His ministers had great power over him in all lesser matters, while he directed the greater; and he suffered them to enrich themselves excessively.

In the end of his life the electoress had gained great credit, and governed his counsels too much. He had set it up for a maxim, that the electoral families in Germany had weakened themselves so much, that they would not be able to maintain the liberty of the empire against the Austrian family, which was now rising by their victories in Hungary: the houses of Saxe, and the Palatine, and of Brunswick, and Hesse, had done this so much, by the dismembering some of their dominions to their younger children, that they were mouldering to nothing; he therefore resolved to keep all his dominions entire in one hand: this would make his family the balance to the house of Austria, on whom the rest of the empire must depend: and he suffered his electoress to provide for her children, and to enrich herself by all the ways she could think on, since he would not give them any share of his dominions. This she did not fail to do. And the elector, having just cause of complaint for being abandoned by the allies in the peace of Nimeguen, and so forced to restore what he had got from the Swedes, the French upon that gave him a great pension, and made the electoress such presents, that he was prevailed on to enter into their interests; and in this he made some ill steps in the decline of his life. But nothing could soften him with relation to that court, after they broke the edict of Nantes, and began the persecution of the protestants. He took great care of all the refugees. He set men on the frontier of France to receive and defray them; and gave them all the marks of Christian compassion, and of a bounty becoming so great a prince. But his age and infirmities, he being crippled with the gout, and the ill understanding that was between the prince electoral and electoress, had so disjointed his court, that little was to be expected from him.

Death came upon him quicker than was looked for. He received the intimations of it with the firmness that became both a Christian and a hero. He gave his last advices to his son, and to his ministers, with a greatness and a tenderness that both surprised and melted them all: and above all other things he recommended to them the concerns of the protestant religion, then in such an universal danger. His son had not his genius. He had not a strength of body, nor a force of mind, capable of great matters. But he was filled with zeal for the reformed religion; and he was at that time so entirely possessed with a confidence in the prince of Orange, and with a high esteem of him, as he was his cousin-german, that we had a much better prospect of all our affairs, by his succeeding his father. And this was increased by the great credit that Dankelman, who had been his governor, continued to have with him; for he had true notions of the affairs of Europe, and was a zealous protestant, and was likely to prove a very good minister, though he was too absolute in his favour, and was too much set on raising his own family. All at the Hague were looking with great concern on the affairs of Europe; these being, in many respects, and in many different places, brought to a very critical state.

I must now look back to England, where the queen's delivery was the subject of all men's discourse. And since so much depends on this, I will give as full and as distinct an account of all that related to that matter, as I could gather up either at that time or afterwards. The queen had been for six or seven years in such an ill state of health, that every winter brought her very near death. Those about her seemed well assured that she, who had buried all her children, soon after they were born, and had now for several years ceased bearing, would have no more children. Her own priests apprehended it, and seemed to wish for her death. She had great, and frequent distempers, that returned often, which put all people out of their hopes, or fears, of her having any children. Her spirits were now much on the fret. She was eager in the prosecution of all the king's designs. It was believed that she had a main hand in driving him to them all. And he, perhaps to make her gentler to him in his vagrant amours, was more easy to her in every thing else. The lady Dorchester was come back from Ireland; and the king went often to her. But it was visible, she was not likely to gain that credit in affairs to which she had aspired; and therefore this was less considered.

She had another mortification, when Fitz-James, the king's son, was made duke of Berwick*. He was a soft and harmless young man, and was much beloved by the king: but the queen's dislike kept him from making any great figure. He made two campaigns in Hungary, that were little to his honour; for, as his governor diverted the allowance that was given for keeping a table, and sent him always to eat at other tables, so, though in the siege of Buda there were many occasions given him to have distinguished himself, yet he had appeared in none of them. There was more care taken of his person than became his age and condition: yet his governor's brother was a jesuit, and in the secret; so every thing was ventured on by him, and all was forgiven him.

In September, the former year, the queen went to the Bath, where, as was already told, the king came and saw her, and stayed a few days with her. She after that pursued a full course of bathing: and, having resolved to return in the end of September, an accident took her to which the sex is subject; and that made her stay there a week longer. She came to Windsor on the sixth of October. It was said, that, at the very time of her coming to the king, her mother, the duchess of Modena, made a vow to the lady Loretto, that her daughter might by her means have a son. And it went current, that the queen believed herself to be with child in that very instant, in which her mother made her vow; of which, some travellers have assured me, there was a solemn record made at Loretto†. A conception said to be thus begun looked suspicious. It was now fixed to the sixth of October; so the nine months were to run to the sixth of July. She was in the progress of her big belly let blood several times; and the most astringent things that could be proposed were used.

It was soon observed that all things about her person were managed with a mysterious secrecy, into which none were admitted but a few papists. She was not dressed, nor undressed, with the usual ceremony. Prince George told me, that the princess went as far in desiring to be satisfied by feeling the motion, after she said she was quick, as she could go without breaking with her; and she had sometimes stayed by her even indecently long in mornings, to see her rise, and to give her her shift; but she never did either. She never offered any satisfaction in that matter by letter to the princess of Orange, nor to any of the ladies of quality, in whose word the world would have acquiesced. The thing upon this began to be suspected; and some libels were written, treating the whole as an imposture. The use the queen made of this was, to say, that since she saw some were suspecting her as capable of so black a contrivance, she scorned to satisfy those who could entertain such thoughts of her. How just soever this might be with relation to the libellers, yet certainly, if she was truly with child, she owed it to the king and herself, to the king's daughters, but most of all to the infant she carried in her belly, to give such reasonable satisfaction, as might put an end to jealousy. This was in her power to do every day; and her not doing it gave just grounds of suspicion.

Things went thus on till Monday in Easter week. On that day the king went to Rochester, to see some of the naval preparations; but was soon sent for by the queen, who apprehended she was in danger of miscarrying. Dr. Scarborough was come to Knightsbridge to see bishop Ward, my predecessor, who had been his ancient friend, and was then his patient: but the queen's coach was sent to call him in all haste, since she was near miscarrying.

* This was the king's illegitimate son by Arabella, sister to the lord Churchill.

† See an account of this affair in Misson's Voyage d'Italie, i. 314.

Dr. Windebank, who knew nothing of this matter, stayed long that morning upon an appointment for Dr. Wallgrave, another of the queen's physicians, who the next time he saw him excused himself; for the queen, he said, was then under the most apparent signs of miscarriage. Of this the doctor made oath; and it is yet extant.

On the same day the countess of Clarendon, being to go out of town for a few days, came to see the queen before she went, knowing nothing of what had happened to her: and she, being a lady of the bedchamber to queen dowager, did, according to the rule of the court, go into the queen's bedchamber without asking admittance. She saw the queen abed, bemoaning herself in a most doleful manner, saying often, "Undone, undone:" and one that belonged to her carried somewhat out of the bed, which she believed was linen taken from the queen. She was upon this in some confusion; and the countess of Powis coming in, went to her, and said with some sharpness, what do you here? And carried her to the door. Before she had got out of the court, one of the bedchamber women followed her, and charged her not to speak of any thing she had seen that day. This matter, whatever was in it, was hushed up; and the queen held on her course.

The princess had miscarried in the spring; so as soon as she had recovered her strength, the king pressed her to go to the Bath, since that had so good an effect on the queen. Some of her physicians, and all her other friends, were against her going. Lowen, one of her physicians, told me, he was against it: he thought she was not strong enough for the Bath, though the king pressed it with an unusual vehemence. Millington, another physician, told the earl of Shrewsbury, from whom I had it, that he was pressed to go to the princess, and advise her to go to the Bath. The person that spoke to him told him, the king was much set on it, and that he expected it of him, that he would persuade her to it. Millington answered, he would not advise a patient according to direction, but according to his own reason; so he would not go. Scarborough and Witherly took it upon them to advise it; so she went thither in the end of May.

As soon as she was gone, those about the queen did all of the sudden change her reckoning, and began it from the king's being with her at Bath. This came on so quick, that, though the queen had set the fourteenth of June for her going to Windsor, where she intended to lie in, and all the preparations for the birth and for the child were ordered to be made ready by the end of June, yet now a resolution was taken for the queen's lying in at St. James's; and directions were given to have all things quickly ready. The Bath water either did not agree with the princess, or the advices of her friends were so pressing, who thought her absence from the court at that time of such consequence, that in compliance with them she gave it out, it did not, and that therefore she would return in a few days.

The day after the court had this notice, the queen said, she would go to St. James's, and look for the good hour. She was often told, that it was impossible upon so short a warning to have things ready. But she was so positive, that she said, she would lie there that night, though she should lie upon the boards. And at night, though the shorter and quicker way was to go from Whitehall to St. James's through the Park, and she always went that way; yet now, by a sort of affectation, she would be carried thither by Charing Cross through the Pall Mall. And it was given out by all her train, that she was going to be delivered. Some said it would be next morning; and the priests said very confidently, that it would be a boy.

The next morning, about nine o'clock, she sent word to the king, that she was in labour. The queen dowager was next sent to; but no ladies were sent for: so that no women were in the room, but two dressers and one undresser, and the midwife. The earl of Arran sent notice to the countess of Sunderland; so she came. The lady Bellasis came also in time. The protestant ladies that belonged to the court, were all gone to church before the news was let go abroad; for it happened on Trinity Sunday, it being that year on the tenth of June. The king brought over with him from Whitehall a great many peers and privy councillors; and of these eighteen were let into the bedchamber; but they stood at the furthest end of the room. The ladies stood within the alcove. The curtains of the bed were drawn close, and none came within them but the midwife and an under dresser. The queen lay all the while abed; and, in order to the warming one side of it, a warming-pan was brought: but it was not opened, that it might be seen that there was fire and nothing else in it ; so here was matter for suspicion, with which all people were filled.

A little before ten, the queen cried out as in a strong pain, and immediately after the midwife said aloud, she was happily brought to bed. When the lords all cried out of what, the midwife answered, the queen must not be surprised ; only she gave a sign to the countess of Sunderland, who upon that touched her forehead, by which, it being the sign before agreed on, the king said he knew it was a boy. No cries were heard from the child ; nor was it shewn to those in the room. It was pretended more air was necessary. The under dresser went out with the child, or something else, in her arms to a dressing room, to which there was a door near the queen's bed ; but there was another entry to it from other apartments.

The king continued with the lords in the bedchamber for some minutes, which was either a sign of much phlegm upon such an occasion ; for it was not known whether the child was alive or dead ; or it looked like the giving time for some management. After a little while they went all into the dressing-room ; and then the news was published. In the mean while, nobody was called to lay their hands on the queen's belly, in order to a full satisfaction. When the princess came to town three days after, she had as little satisfaction given her. Chamberlain, the man-midwife, who was always ordered to attend her labour before, and who brought the plaisters for putting back the milk, wondered that he had not been sent to. He went according to custom with the plaisters ; but he was told they had no occasion for him. He fancied, that some other person was put in his place ; but he could not find that any had it. All that concerned the milk, or the queen's purgations, was managed still in the dark. This made all people inclined more and more to believe, there was a base imposture now put on the nation. That still increased. That night one Hemings, a very worthy man, an apothecary by his trade, who lived in St. Martin's Lane, the very next door to a family of an eminent papist ; (Brown, brother to the viscount Montacute, lived there :) the wall between his parlour and theirs being so thin, that he could easily hear any thing that was said with a louder voice, he (Hemings) was reading in his parlour late at night, when he heard one coming into the neighbouring parlour, and say with a doleful voice, "The prince of Wales is dead : " upon which a great many that lived in the house came down stairs very quick : upon this confusion he could not hear any thing more ; but it was plain, they were in a great consternation. He went with the news next morning to the bishops in the Tower. The countess of Clarendon came thither soon after, and told them, she had been at the young prince's door, but was denied access : she was amazed at it ; and asked, if they knew her. They said they did, but that the queen had ordered, that no person whatsoever should be suffered to come in to him. This gave credit to Hemings' story, and looked as if all was ordered to be kept shut up close, till another child was found. One, that saw the child two days after, said to me, that he looked strong, and not like a child so newly born. Windebank met Walgrave the day after this birth, and remembered him of what he had told him eight weeks before. He acknowledged what he had said, but added, that God wrought miracles ; to which no reply could, or durst be made by the other : it needed none. So healthy a child being so little like any of those the queen had borne, it was given out that he had fits, and could not live. But those who saw him every day observed no such thing. On the contrary, the child was in a very prosperous state. None of those fits ever happened when the princess was at court ; for she could not be denied admittance, though all others were. So this was believed to be given out to make the matter more credible. It is true, some weeks after that, the court being gone to Windsor, and the child sent to Richmond, he fell into such fits, that four physicians were sent for. They all looked on him as a dying child. The king and queen were sent for. The physicians went to a dinner prepared for them ; and were often wondering that they were not called for. They took it for granted, that the child was dead ; but when they went in after dinner to look on him, they saw a sound healthy child, that seemed to have had no sort of illness on him. It was said, that the child was strangely revived of a sudden. Some of the physicians told Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, that it was not possible for them to think it was the same child. They looked on one another, but durst not speak what they thought.

Thus I have related such particulars as I could gather of this birth ; to which some more shall be added, when I give an account of the proof that the king brought afterwards to put this matter out of doubt; but by which it became indeed more doubtful than ever. I took most of these from the informations that were sent over to the prince and princess of Orange, as I had many from the vouchers themselves. I do not mix with these the various reports that were, both then and afterwards, spread of this matter, of which bishop Lloyd has a great collection, most of them well attested. What truth soever may be in these, this is certain, that the method in which this matter was conducted, from first to last, was very unaccountable. If an imposture had been intended, it could not have been otherwise managed. The pretended excuse that the queen made, that she owed no satisfaction to those who could suspect her capable of such base forgery, was the only excuse that she could have made, if it had been really what it was commonly said to be. She seemed to be soon recovered, and was so little altered by her labour, either in her looks or voice, that this helped not a little to increase jealousies. The rejoicings over England upon this birth were very cold and forced. Bonfires were made in some places, and a set of congratulatory addresses went round the nation. None durst oppose them; but all was formal, and only to make a shew*.

The prince and princess of Orange received the news of this birth very decently. The first letters gave not those grounds of suspicion that were sent to them afterwards; so they sent over Zuytlestein to congratulate: and the princess ordered the prince of Wales to be prayed for in her chapel. Upon this occasion, it may not be improper to set down what the princess said to myself on this subject two years before. I had asked her, in the freedom of much discourse, if she knew the temper of her own mind, and how she could bear the queen's having a son. She said, she was sure it would give her no concern at all on her own account; God knew best what was fit for her; and, if it was not to serve the great ends of Providence, she was sure that, as to herself, she would rather wish to live and die in the condition she was then in. The advertisements formerly mentioned came over from so many hands, that it was impossible not to be shaken by them. It was also taken ill in England, that the princess should have begun so early to pray for the pretended prince; upon which the naming him discontinued. But this was so highly resented by the court of England, that the prince, fearing it might precipitate a rupture, ordered him to be again named in the prayers.

The prince set himself with great application to prepare for the intended expedition; for Zuytlestein brought him such positive advices, and such an assurance of the invitation he had desired, that he was fully fixed in his purpose. It was advised from England, that the prince could never hope for a more favourable conjuncture, nor for better grounds to break on, than he had at that time. The whole nation was in a high fermentation. The proceedings against the bishops, and those that were still kept on foot against the clergy, made all people think the ruin of the church was resolved on, and that on the first occasion it would be executed, and that the religion would be altered. The pretended birth made them reckon

* However interest and party prejudice at the time may have influenced Burnet and others to suspect the truth of the birth of prince James Francis Edward, better known by the political epithet of "the Pretender," few persons who will take the trouble to compare the conflicting statements that were published then, and subsequently, will think there is any circumstantial evidence adduced that at all shakes the direct testimony that he was the offspring of the queen. Lord Clarendon says that it was "every where ridiculed, as if scarce any one believed" the queen was pregnant; yet that popular prejudice that she was incapable of child-bearing is refuted by the fact that she subsequently gave birth to a princess in 1692, during her exile in France. Princess Anne evidently doubted the assertion that the pretender was really the offspring of the queen. The latter, during her pregnancy, carefully avoided letting the princess or any but her immediate attendants have an opportunity to see her person, which, considering the reports about her non-pregnancy, was very injudicious.

When the lords of the council waited upon the princess with the depositions made before them by the king, and the queen-dowager, she avoided expressing any concurrence, but merely observed, "My lords, this was not necessary; for I have so much duty for the king, that his word must be more to me than these depositions."—Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 198, 199.

Circumstantial evidence is certainly strong to justify the suspicions that were entertained; but all such evidence will bear two interpretations, and that which is in accordance with direct testimony must prevail. The queen's repugnance to be inspected is readily accounted for without having recourse to the explanation that she was carrying on a deception. Full particulars relative to this much-disputed point can be obtained from the numerous pamphlets of the time, the names of which can be found by a reference to Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica. See especially, "The several Declarations, &c. concerning the Birth of the Prince of Wales;" "A full answer to the Depositions, &c." Life of J. Kettlowell; Dalrymple's Memoirs.

that popery and slavery would be entailed on the nation. And, if this heat went off, people would lose heart. It was also visible, that the army continued well affected. They spoke openly against popery; they drank the most reproachful healths against them that could be invented, and treated the few papists that were among them with scorn and aversion. The king saw this so visibly, that he broke up the camp, and sent them to their quarters; and it was believed, that he would bring them no more together till they were modelled more to his mind. The seamen shewed the same inclinations. The Dutch had set out a fleet of twenty-four men of war, on pretence to secure their trade: so the king resolved to set out as strong a fleet. Strickland, who was a papist, had the command. He brought some priests aboard with him, who said mass, or at least performed such offices of their religion as are allowed in ships of war: and the chaplain, that was to serve the protestants in Strickland's ship, was sent away upon a slight pretence. This put the whole fleet into such a disorder, that it was likely to end in a mutiny. Strickland punished some for this; and the king came down to accommodate the matter. He spoke very softly to the seamen; yet this made no great impression; for they hated popery in general, and Strickland in particular. When some gained persons among the seamen tried their affections to the Dutch, it appeared they had no inclinations to make war on them. They said aloud, they were their friends and their brethren; but they would very willingly go against the French. The king saw all this, and was resolved to take other more moderate measures.

These advices were suggested by the earl of Sunderland, who saw the king was running violently to his own ruin. So, as soon as the queen admitted men to audiences, he had some very long ones of her. He represented to her, that the state of her affairs was quite changed by her having a son. There was no need of driving things fast, now they had a succession sure: time would bring all about, if matters were but softly managed. He told her, it would become her to set up for the author of gentle counsels, that she might by another administration lay the flame that was now kindled. By this she would gain the hearts of the nation, both to herself and to her son: she might be declared regent, in case the king should die before her son came to be of age. He found these advices began to be hearkened to; but, that he might have the more credit in pressing them, he, who had but too slight notions of religion, resolved to declare himself a papist. And then, he, being in the same interest with her, and most violently hated for this ill step he had made, gained such an ascendant over her spirit, that things were likely to be put in another management.

He made the step to popery all on the sudden, without any previous instruction or conference; so that the change he made looked too like a man who, having no religion, took up one, rather to serve a turn, than that he was truly changed from one religion to another. He has since been accused, as if he had done all this to gain the more credit, that so he might the more effectually ruin the king. There was a suspicion of another nature, that stuck with some in England, who thought that Mr. Sidney, who had the secret of all the correspondence that was between the prince, and his party in England, being in particular friendship with the earl of Sunderland, the earl had got into that secret; and they fancied he would get into the prince's confidence by Sidney's means. So I was written to, and desired to put it home to the prince, whether he was in any confidence or correspondence with the earl of Sunderland, or not? For, till they were satisfied in that matter, they would not go on; since they believed he would betray all, when things were ripe for it, and that many were engaged in the design. The prince upon that did say very positively, that he was in no sort of correspondence with him. His counsels lay then another way; and, if time had been given him to follow the scheme then laid down by him, things might have turned fatally; and the nation might have been so laid asleep with new promises, and a different conduct, that in a slow method they might have gained that, which they were so near losing, by the violent proceedings in which they had gone so far. The judges had orders in their circuits to proceed very gently, and to give new promises in the king's name. But they were treated every where with such contempt, that the common decencies were scarce paid them, when they were on the bench. And they now saw that the presentments of grand juries, and the verdicts of other juries, were no more under their direction. Things slept in England, as is usual, during the long vacation. But the court had little quiet, having every day fresh alarms from abroad, as well as great mortifications at home.

I must now change the scene, and give a large account of the affairs abroad, they having such a connection with all that followed in England. Upon the elector of Brandenburg's death, the prince sent Mr. Bentinck with the compliment to the new elector; and he was ordered to lay before him the state of affairs, and to communicate the prince's design to him, and to ask him, how much he might depend upon him for his assistance. The answer was full and frank. He offered all that was asked, and more. The prince resolved to carry over to England an army of nine thousand foot, and four thousand horse and dragoons. He intended to choose these out of the whole Dutch army. But for the security of the States, under such a diminution of their force, it was necessary to have a strength from some other princes. This was soon concerted between the prince and the new elector, with the landgrave of Hesse, and the duke of Lunenburg and Zell, who had a particular affection to the prince, and was a cordial friend to him on all occasions.

His brother, the duke of Hanover, was at that time in some engagements with the court of France. But, since he had married the princess Sophia of the Palatine House, I ventured to send a message to her by one of their court, who was then at the Hague. He was a French refugee, named Mr. Boucour. It was to acquaint her with our design with relation to England, and to let her know, that, if we succeeded, certainly a perpetual exclusion of all papists from the succession to the crown would be enacted; and, since she was the next protestant heir after the two princesses, and the prince of Orange, of whom at that time there was no issue alive, I was very confident, that, if the duke of Hanover could be disengaged from the interests of France, so that he came into our interests, the succession to the crown would be lodged in her person, and in her posterity; though on the other hand, if he continued, as he stood then, engaged with France, I could not answer for this. The gentleman carried the message, and delivered it. The duchess entertained it with much warmth, and brought him to the duke to repeat it to him. But at that time this made no great impression on him. He looked on it as a remote and a doubtful project; yet when he saw our success in England, he had other thoughts of it. Some days after this Frenchman was gone, I told the prince what I had done. He approved of it heartily; but was particularly glad, that I had done at, as of myself, without communicating it to him, or any way engaging him in it: for he said, if it should happen to be known that the proposition was made by him, it might do us hurt in England, as if he had already reckoned himself so far master, as to be forming projects concerning the succession to the crown.

But while this was in a secret management, the elector of Cologne's death came in very luckily to give a good colour to intrigues and preparations. The old elector was brother to Maximilian, duke of Bavaria. He had been long bishop, both of Cologne and Liege: he was also elected bishop of Munster: but the pope would never grant his bulls for that see; but he had the temporalities, and that was all he thought on. He had thus a revenue of near four millions of guilders, and four great bishoprics; for he was likewise bishop of Hildesheim. He could arm and pay twenty thousand men, besides that his dominions lay quite round the Netherlands. Munster lay between them and the northern parts of Germany; and from thence their best recruits came. Cologne commanded twenty leagues of the Rhine; by which, as an entrance was opened into Holland, which they had felt severely in the year 1672, so the Spanish Netherlands were entirely cut off from all assistance that might be sent them out of Germany: and Liege was a country full both of people and wealth, by which an entrance is open into Brabant; and if Maestricht was taken, the Maese was open down to Holland. So it was of great importance to the States to take care who should succeed him. The old man was a weak prince, much set on chemical processes, in hopes of the philosopher's stone. He had taken one of the princes of Furstenberg into his particular confidence, and was entirely governed by him. He made him one of the canons of Cologne; and he came to be dean at last. He made him not only his chief minister, but left the nomination of the canons that were preferred by him wholly to his choice. The bishop, and the dean and chapter, name those by turns. So, what by those the elector named on his motion, what by those he got to be chosen, he reckoned he was sure of succeeding the elector; and nothing but ill management could have prevented it. He had no hopes of succeeding at Munster, but he had taken much pains to secure Liege.

I need not enlarge further on this story than to remember that he got the elector to deliver his country up to the French in the year 1672, and that the treaty opened at Cologne was broken up on his being seized by the emperor's order. After he was set at liberty, he was, upon the recommendation of the court of France, made a cardinal, though with much difficulty. In the former winter, the emperor had been prevailed on by the Palatine family, to consent to the election of a coadjutor in Cologne. - But this was an artifice of the cardinal's, who deceived that family into the hopes of carrying the election for one of their branches. And they obtained the emperor's consent to it, without which it could not be done. But so ill grounded were the Palatine's hopes, that of twenty-five voices the cardinal had nineteen, and they had only six voices.

The contest at Rome about the franchises had now occasioned such a rupture there, that France and Rome seemed to be in a state of war. The count Lavardin was sent ambassador to Rome; but the pope refused to receive him, unless he would renounce the pretension to the franchises. So he entered Rome in a hostile manner, with some troops of horse, though not in form of troops; but the force was too great for the pope. He kept guards about his house, and in the franchises, and affronted the pope's authority on all occasions. The pope bore all silently, but would never admit him to an audience, nor receive any message nor intercession from the court of France; and kept off every thing, in which they concerned themselves; and therefore he would not confirm the election of a coadjutor to Cologne. So, that not being done when the elector died, the canons were to proceed to a new election; the former being void, because not confirmed: for if it had been confirmed, there would have been no vacancy.

The cabal against the cardinal grew so strong, that he began to apprehend he might lose it, if he had not leave from the pope to resign the bishopric of Strasburg, which the French had forced him to accept, only to lessen the pension that they paid him by giving him that bishopric. By the rules of the empire, a man that is already a bishop, cannot be chosen to another see, but by a postulation; and to that it is necessary to have a concurrence of two-thirds of the chapter. But it was at the pope's choice, whether he would accept of the resignation of Strasburg or not; and therefore he refused it. The king of France sent a gentleman to the pope with a letter written in his own hand, desiring him to accept of that resignation, and promising him upon it all reasonable satisfaction; but the pope would not admit the bearer, nor receive the letter. He said, while the French Ambassador lived at Rome like an enemy, that had invaded it, he would receive nothing from that court.

In the bishoprics of Munster and Hildesheim, the deans were promoted, of whom both the States and the princes of the empire were well assured. But a new management was set up at Cologne. The elector of Bavaria had been disgusted at some things in the emperor's court. He complained, that the honour of the success in Hungary was given so entirely to the duke of Lorraine, that he had not the share which belonged to him. The French instruments that were then about him took occasion to alienate him more from the emperor, by representing to him, that, in the management now at Cologne, the emperor shewed more regard to the Palatine family than to himself, after all the service he had done him. The emperor, apprehending the ill consequences of a breach with him, sent and offered him the supreme command of his armies in Hungary for that year, the duke of Lorraine being taken ill of a fever, just as they were upon opening the campaign. He likewise offered him all the voices that the Palatine had made at Cologne, in favour of his brother prince Clement. Upon this they were again reconciled: and the elector of Bavaria commanded the emperor's army in Hungary so successfully, that he took Belgrade by storm after a short siege. Prince Clement was then but seventeen, and was not of the chapter of Cologne; so he was not eligible according to their rules, till he obtained a bull from the pope dispensing with these things. That was easily got. With it the emperor sent one to manage the election in his name, with express instructions to offer the chapter the whole revenue and government of the temporalities for five years, in case they would choose prince Clement, who wanted all that time to be of age. If he could make nine voices sure for him, he was to stick firm to his interest ; but if he could not gain so many, he was to consent to any person that should be set up in opposition to the cardinal. He was ordered to charge him severely before the chapter, as one that had been for many years an enemy and traitor to the empire. This was done with all possible aggravations, and in very injurious words.

The chapter saw that this election was likely to be attended with a war in their country, and other dismal consequences ; for the cardinal was chosen by the chapter vicar, or guardian of the temporalities : and he had put garrisons in all their fortified places, that were paid with French money : and they knew he would put them all in the king of France's hands, if he was not elected. They had promised not to vote in favour of the Bavarian prince ; so they offered to the emperor's agent to consent to any third person. But ten voices were made sure to prince Clement ; so he was fixed to his interests. At the election, the cardinal had fourteen voices, and prince Clement had ten. By this means the cardinal's postulation was defective, since he had not two-thirds. And upon that, prince Clement's election was first judged good by the emperor, as to the temporalities ; but was transmitted by him to Rome, where a congregation of cardinals examined it ; and it was judged in favour of prince Clement. The cardinal succeeded worse at Liege, where the dean was without any difficulty chosen bishop ; and nothing but the cardinal's purple saved him from the violences of the people at Liege. He met with all sorts of injurious usage, being hated there, both on the account of his depending so much on the protection of France, and for the effects they had felt of his violent and cruel ministry under the old elector. I will add one circumstance in honour of some of the canons of Liege. They not only would accept of no presents from those whom the States appointed to assist in managing that election before it was made ; but they refused them after the election was over. This I saw in the letter that the States deputy wrote to the Hague.

I have given a more particular account of this matter, because I was acquainted with all the steps that were made in it. And it had such an immediate relation to the peace and safety of Holland, that, if they had miscarried in it, the expedition designed for England would not have been so safe, nor could it have been proposed easily in the States. By this it appeared, what an influence the papacy, low as it is, may still have in matters of the greatest consequence. The foolish pride of the French court, which had affronted the pope in a point in which, since they allowed him to be the prince of Rome, he certainly could lay down such rules as he thought fit, did now defeat a design that they had been long driving at, and which could not have miscarried by any other means than those that they had found out. Such great events may and do often rise from inconsiderable beginnings. These things furnished the prince with a good blind for covering all his preparations ; since here a war in their neighbourhood was unavoidable, and it was necessary to strengthen both their alliances and their troops. For it was visible to all the world, that, if the French could have fixed themselves in the territory of Cologne, the way was open to enter Holland, or to seize on Flanders, when that king pleased ; and he would have the four electors on the Rhine at mercy. It was necessary to dislodge them, and this could not be done without a war with France. The prince got the States to settle a fund for nine thousand seamen, to be constantly in their service : and orders were given to put the naval preparations in such a case, that they might be ready to put to sea upon orders. Thus things went on in July and August, with so much secrecy and so little suspicion, that neither the court of England nor the court of France seemed to be alarmed at them.

In July, admiral Herbert came over to Holland, and was received with a particular regard to his pride and ill humour : for he was upon every occasion so sullen and peevish, that it was plain he set a high value on himself, and expected the same of all others. He had got his accounts passed, in which he complained that the king had used him not only hardly, but unjustly. He was a man delivered up to pride and luxury ; yet he had a good understanding ; and he had gained so great a reputation by his steady behaviour in England, that the prince understood that it was expected he should use him in the manner he himself should desire ; in which it was not very easy for him to constrain himself so far as that required. The managing him was in a great measure put on me ; and it was no easy thing. It made me often reflect on the providence of God, that makes some men instruments in great things, to which they themselves have no sort of affection or disposition ; for his private quarrel with the lord Dartmouth, who he thought had more of the king's confidence than he himself had, was believed the root of all the sullenness he fell into towards the king, and of all the firmness that grew out of that.

I now return to England, to give an account of a secret management there. The lord Mordaunt was the first of all the English nobility that came over openly, to see the prince of Orange. He asked the king's leave to do it. He was a man of much heat, many notions, and full of discourse ; he was brave and generous, but had not true judgment : his thoughts were crude and indigested, and his secrets were soon known. He was with the prince in the year 1686 ; and then he pressed him to undertake the business of England : and he represented the matter as so easy, that this appeared too romantic to the prince to build upon it. He only promised in general, that he should have an eye on the affairs of England ; and should endeavour to put the affairs of Holland in so good a posture as to be ready to act when it should be necessary : and he assured him, that, if the king should go about either to change the established religion, or to wrong the princess in her right, or to raise forged plots to destroy his friends, that he would try what he could possibly do. Next year a man of a far different temper came over to him *.

The earl of Shrewsbury : he had been bred a papist, but had forsaken that religion, upon a very critical and anxious enquiry into matters of controversy. Some thought, that, though he had forsaken popery, he was too sceptical, and too little fixed in the points of religion. He seemed to be a man of great probity, and to have a high sense of honour. He had no ordinary measure of learning, a correct judgment, with a sweetness of temper that charmed all who knew him. He had at that time just notions of government, and so great a command of himself, that, during all the time that he continued in the ministry, I never heard any one complaint of him, but for his silent and reserved answers, with which his friends were not always well pleased. His modest deportment gave him such an interest in the prince, that he never seemed so fond of any of his ministers, as he was of him. He

* Noble gives the following spirited sketch of this distinguished peer. Charles Mordaunt, third earl of Peterborough, and first of Monmouth, was one of the strangest compounds that nature, in her most sportive moments, ever produced. Of great ancestry, a peer by creation, as well as, afterwards, by descent ; yet, in his youth, he seemed to disregard decency, and the greatest of all moral obligations. Justice, indeed, ought to have claimed him, as a shedder of human blood. Graceful and elegant in his manners and person, and a favourite with the Muses, he seemed emulous to mix only with the rough, and then untutored, brave tars of the ocean. Leaving the naval service, he charmed the senate with his oratory. Disgusted with James the Second's government, he obtained a command of part of the Dutch fleet ; but William the Third brought him back to England, where he became a military officer, yet a councillor to his majesty. Under Anne he was a conqueror ; and Spain would have been transferred from the Bourbon to the Austrian family, if Charles had attended as much to fighting as to bull-feasting. Never was a braver or more skilful general. An adept in the illusions of perspective, he imposed upon the enemy as to the numbers under his command ; even his gallantries aided his plans. He astonished the proud Spaniards ; the patient Germans ; even the sprightly French saw themselves excelled in courage, celerity, and stratagem. The parliament thanked him, but, imitating his fickleness, withdrew their favour. Even at home, his pen vindicated his sword ; and at the change of the queen's ministry, he blazed forth a knight of the garter, and as negotiator in all the Italian courts. Restless and alert, on the continent, or in England, he was ever on the wing : " he saw more kings and postillions than any man in Europe." This quarter of the globe seemed too confined for his pastimes. He asked for a commission as captain-general of our forces in North America ; but Marlborough, his enemy and rival, thwarted him. Under the two first Georges he became a conspicuous Whig ; was continued by them lord-lieutenant of Northamptonshire, and made general of our marine forces. In these reigns he employed his time more as a wit than as a politician ; caprice dictated, and inclination followed. He was insufferably haughty, and loved popularity. A correspondent of Pope and Swift, and gifted in all that learning and genius could bestow ; yet he delighted to declaim in coffee-houses, where the stupid stare of astonishment was all his reward. Living on the borders of parsimony, yet he was always in debt. They who blamed could not but admire him : even the cynic Swift, after remarking that at sixty he was more spirited than the young, adds, " I love the lang-dog dearly." An avowed atheist, he gained the admiration of revealed religion's friends. He was like no other human being, yet all human beings admired his sense, his wit, and his courage : this was so marked that he was said to be without fear ; but he replied—" No, I am not ; only I never saw occasion to fear." He died at Lisbon, aged seventy-seven, in the year 1735. His first wife was a daughter of sir Alexander Frazer ; whilst a widower the earl became deeply enamoured with the accomplished Anastasia Robinson, the daughter of an artist. She was an opera singer, and a teacher of music and Italian, to support an aged parent ; yet she rejected all the earl's advances towards an illicit connection. He married her privately, and concealed his union until 1735, and then proclaimed it like no other husband. He went one evening to the rooms at Bath, where a servant was ordered distinctly and audibly to announce " Lady Peterborough's carriage waits." Every lady of rank and fashion rose and congratulated the declared countess.—Continuation of Granger.

But Russel † coming over in May brought the matter nearer a point. He was a cousin german to lord Russel. He had been bred at sea, and was bedchamber-man to the king, when he was duke of York ; but, upon the lord Russel's death, he retired from the court. He was a man of much honour, and great courage. He had good principles, and was firm to them. The prince spoke more positively to him than he had ever done before. He said, he must satisfy both his honour and conscience, before he could enter upon so great a design, which, if it miscarried, must bring ruin both on England and Holland : he protested, that no private ambition, nor resentment, of his own could ever prevail so far with him, as to make him break with so near a relation, or engage in a war, of which the consequences must be of the last importance, both to the interests of Europe, and of the protestant religion ; therefore he expected formal and direct invitations. Russel laid before him the danger of trusting such a secret to great numbers. The prince said, if a considerable number of men, that might be supposed to understand the sense of the nation best, should do it, he would acquiesce in it.

Russel told me, that, upon his return to England, he communicated the matter, first to the earl of Shrewsbury, and then to the lord Lumley, who was a late convert from popery, and had stood out very firmly all this reign. He was a man who laid his interest much to heart : and he resolved to embark deeply in this design.

But the man in whose hands the conduct of the whole design was chiefly deposited by the prince's own order, was Mr. Sidney, brother to the earl of Leicester and to Algernon Sidney. He was a graceful man, and had lived long in the court, where he had some adventures that became very public. He was a man of a sweet and caressing temper, had no malice in his heart, but too great a love of pleasure. He had been sent envoy to Holland in the year 1679, where he entered into such particular confidences with the prince, that he had the highest measure of his trust and favour, that any Englishman ever had. This was well known over England ; so that all who desired to recommend themselves to the prince did it through his hands. He was so apprehensive of the dangers this might cast him in, that he travelled almost a year round Italy. But now matters ripened faster ; so all centred in him. But, because he was lazy, and the business required an active man, who could both run about, and write over long and full accounts of all matters, I recommended a kinsman of my own, Johnston, whom I had formed, and knew to be both faithful and diligent, and very fit for the employment he was now trusted with ‡.

Sidney tried the marquis of Halifax, if he would advise the prince's coming over ; but, as this matter was opened to him at a great distance, he did not encourage a further freedom. He looked on the thing as impracticable ; it depended on so many accidents, that he thought it was a rash and desperate project, that ventured all upon such a dangerous issue, as might turn on seas and winds. It was next opened to the earl of Danby : and he not only went in heartily to it himself, but drew in the bishop of London (Dr. Compton) to join in it. By their advice it was proposed to the earl of Nottingham, who had great credit with the whole church party ; for he was a man possessed with their notions, and was grave and virtuous in the course of his life. He had some knowledge of the law, and of the records of parliament, and was a copious speaker, but too florid and tedious. He was much admired by many. He had stood at a great distance from the court all this reign; for, though his name was still among the privy councillors, yet he never went to the board. He upon the first proposition entertained it, and agreed to it; but at their next meeting he said, he had considered better of that matter: his conscience was so restrained in those points, that he could not go further with them in it: he said, he had talked with some divines, and named Tillotson and Stillingfleet, in general of the thing; and they were not satisfied with it; (though they protested to me afterwards, that they remembered no such thing.) He confessed he should not have suffered them to go so far with him in such a secret, till he had examined it better: they had now, according to Italian notions, a right to murder him; but, though his principles restrained him, so that he could not go on with them, his affections would make him to wish well to them, and be so far a criminal as concealment could make him one. The earl of Devonshire was spoken to; and he went into it with great resolution. It was next proposed to three of the chief officers of the army, Trelawny, Kirk, and the lord Churchill. These went all into it: and Trelawny engaged his brother, the bishop of Bristol, into it.

* Charles Talbot, afterwards duke of Shrewsbury, embraced the protestant religion, with many other distinguished persons, at the time of the popish plot. With his religion he changed his politics, and this godson of Charles the Second then became the opponent of arbitrary power. He lent William the Third 40,000*l.*, who in return made him a privy councillor, a lord justice, principal secretary of state, adding a dukedom and the garter. The king used to describe him as "the only man of whom the Whigs and Tories both spoke well." At the time of queen Anne's death he was lord lieutenant of Ireland, lord high treasurer, and lord chamberlain ; important employments that never were before united in the same possession. George the First continued to employ him in many high offices. He died, aged fifty-eight, in 1718.

His death is said to have been caused by his wife, Adelaide, daughter of the marquis de Palliotti, an Italian, who proved a domestic tyrant, and the plague of his life. Lord Dartmouth says, that if queen Mary had outlived the king (William) she would certainly have married the duke, and that she was always agitated extremely when he came into her presence. A very full memoir of this nobleman, and of the political changes in which he was engaged, will be found in archdeacon Coxe's "Shrewsbury Correspondence."

But, having now named the lord Churchill *, who is likely to be mentioned often by me in the sequel of this work, I will say a little more of him. He was a man of a noble and graceful appearance, bred up in the court with no literature; but he had a solid and clear understanding, with a constant presence of mind. He knew the arts of living in a court beyond any man in it. He caressed all people with a soft and obliging deportment, and was always ready to do good offices. He had no fortune to set up on: this put him on all the methods of acquiring one. And that went so far into him, that he did not shake it off when he was in a much higher elevation: nor was his expense suited enough to his posts; but, when allowances are made for that, it must be acknowledged, that he is one of the greatest men the age has produced. He was in high favour with the king; but his lady † was much more in princess Anne's favour. She had an ascendant over her in every thing. She was a woman of little knowledge, but of a clear apprehension, and a true judgment, a warm and hearty friend, violent and sudden in her resolutions, and impetuous in her way of speaking. She was thought proud and insolent on her favour, though she used none of the common arts of a court to maintain it; for she did not beset the princess, nor flatter her. She stayed much at home, and looked very carefully after the education of her children. Having thus opened both their characters, I will now give an account of this lord's engagements in this matter; for which he has been so severely censured, as guilty both of ingratitude and treachery, to a very kind, and liberal, master. He never discovered any of the king's secrets; nor did he ever push him on to any violent proceedings: so that he was in no contrivance to ruin, or betray, him. On the contrary, whensoever he spoke to the king of his affairs, which he did but seldom, because he could not fall in with the king's notions, he always suggested moderate counsels. The earl of Galway told me, that when he came over with the first compliment upon the king's coming to the crown, he said then to him, that, if the king was ever prevailed on to alter our religion, he would serve him no longer, but withdraw from him; so early was this resolution fixed in him. When he saw how the king was set, he could not be contented to see all ruined by him. He was also very doubtful as to the pretended birth. So he resolved, when the prince should come over, to go in to him; but to betray no post, nor do any thing more than the withdrawing himself, with such officers as he could trust with such a secret. He also undertook, that prince George and the princess Anne would leave the court, and come to the prince, as soon as was possible.

With these invitations, and letters, the earl of Shrewsbury, and Russel, came over in September; and soon after them came Sidney with Johnston. And they brought over a full scheme of advices, together with the heads of a declaration, all which were chiefly penned by lord Danby. He, and the earl of Devonshire, and the lord Lumley, undertook for the north: and they all dispersed themselves into their several countries, and among their friends. The thing was in the hands of many thousands, who yet were so true to one another, that none of them made any discovery, no not by their rashness; though they were so confident, that they did not use so discreet a conduct as was necessary. Matters went on in Holland with great secrecy till September. Then it was known, that many arms were bespoken; and, though those were bargained for in the name of the king of Sweden, and of some of the princes of Germany, yet there was ground enough for suspicion. All those that were trusted proved both faithful, and discreet. And here an eminent difference appeared between the hearty concurrence of those who went into a design upon principles of religion, and honour, and the forced compliance of mercenary soldiers, or corrupt ministers, which is neither cordial nor secret. France took the alarm first, and gave it to the court of England.

D'Avaux, the French ambassador, could no more give the court of France those advertisements that he was wont to send of all that passed in Holland. He had great allowances for entertaining agents, and spies, every where. But Louvois, who hated him, suggested that there was no more need of these; so they were stopped: and the ambassador was not sorry, that the court felt their error so sensibly. The king published the advertisements he had from France a little too rashly; for all people were much animated when they heard it from such a hand. The king soon saw his error; and, to correct it, he said on many occasions, that whatever the designs of the Dutch might be, he was sure they were not against him. It was given out sometimes, that they were against France, and then that they were against Denmark: yet the king shewed he was not without his fears; for he ordered fourteen more ships to be put to sea, with many fire-ships. He recalled Strickland, and gave the command to the lord Dartmouth; who was indeed one of the worthiest men of his court: he loved him, and had been long in his service, and in his confidence; but he was much against all the conduct of his affairs: yet he resolved to stick to him at all hazards. The seamen came in slowly; and a heavy backwardness appeared in every thing.

A new and unlooked-for accident gave the king a very sensible trouble. It was resolved, as was told before, to model the army, and to begin with recruits from Ireland. Upon which the English army would have become insensibly an Irish one. The king made the first trial on the duke of Berwick's regiment, which being already under an illegal colonel, it might be supposed they were ready to submit to every thing. Five Irishmen were ordered to be put into every company of that regiment, which then lay at Portsmouth; but Beaumont, the lieutenant-colonel, and five of the captains, refused to receive them. They said, they had raised their men upon the duke of Monmouth's invasion, by which their zeal for the king's service did evidently appear. If the king would order any recruits, they doubted not, but that they should be able to make them: but they found it would give such an universal discontent, if they should receive the Irish among them, that it would put them out of a capacity of serving the king any more. But as the order was positive, so the duke of Berwick was sent down to see it obeyed. Upon which they desired leave to lay down their commissions. The king was provoked by this to such a degree, that he could not govern his passion. The officers were put in arrest, and brought before a council of war, where they were broken with reproach, and declared incapable to serve the king any more. But upon this occasion, the whole officers of the army declared so great an unwillingness to mix with those of another nation and religion, that, as no more attempts were made of this kind, so it was believed that this fixed the king in a point, that was then under debate.

The king of France, when he gave the king the advertisements of the preparations in Holland, offered him such a force as he should call for. Twelve, or fifteen, thousand were named, or as many more as he should desire. It was proposed, that they should land at Portsmouth, and that they should have that place to keep the communication with France open, and in their hands. All the priests were for this; so were most of the popish lords. The earl of Sunderland was the only man in credit that opposed it. He said, the offer of an army of forty thousand men might be a real strength; but then it would depend on the orders that came from France: they might perhaps master England; but they would become the king's masters at the same time ; so that he must govern under such orders as they should give ; and thus he would quickly become only a viceroy to the king of France : any army less than that would lose the king the affections of his people, and drive his own army to desertion, if not to mutiny.

The king did not think matters were yet so near a crisis ; so he did neither entertain the proposition, nor let it fall quite to the ground. There was a treaty set on foot, and the king was to have an hundred merchant ships, ready for the transportation of such forces as he should desire, which it was promised should be ready when called for. It is certain, that the French ambassador, then at London, who knew the court better than he did the nation, did believe, that the king would have been able to have made a greater division of the nation, than it proved afterwards he was able to do. He believed it would have gone to a civil war ; and that then the king would have been forced to have taken assistance from France on any terms ; and so he encouraged the king of France to go on with his designs that winter, and he believed he might come in good time next year to the king's assistance. These advices proved fatal to the king, and to Barillon himself ; for, when he was sent over to France, he was so ill looked on, that it was believed it had an ill effect on his health ; for he died soon after.

Albeville came over fully persuaded that the Dutch designed the expedition against England, but played the minister so, that he took pains to infuse into all people that they designed no such thing ; which made him to be generally laughed at. He was soon sent back ; and, in a memorial he gave into the States, he asked, what was the design of those great and surprising preparations at such a season. The States, according to their slow forms, let this lie long before them, without giving it an answer.

But the court of France made a greater step. The French ambassador in a memorial told the States, that his master understood their design was against England, and in that case he signified to them, that there was such a strait alliance between him and the king of England, that he would look on every thing done against England, as an invasion of his own crown. This put the king and his ministers much out of countenance : for, upon some surmises of an alliance with France, they had very positively denied there was any such thing. Albeville did continue to deny it at the Hague, even after the memorial was put in. The king did likewise deny it to the Dutch ambassador at London. And the blame of the putting it into the memorial was cast on Skelton, the king's envoy at Paris, who was disowned in it, and upon his coming over was put in the Tower for it. This was a short disgrace ; for he was soon after made lieutenant of the Tower. His rash folly might have procured the order from the court of France, to own this alliance : he thought it would terrify the States, and so he pressed this officiously, which they easily granted. That related only to the owning it in so public a manner. But this did clearly prove, that such an alliance was made ; otherwise no instances, how pressing soever, would have prevailed with the court of France to have owned it in so solemn a manner : for what ambassadors say in their master's name, when they are not immediately disowned, passes for authentic : so that it was a vain cavil that some made afterwards, when they asked, how was this alliance proved ? The memorial was a full proof of it ; and the shew of a disgrace on Skelton did not at all weaken that proof.

But I was more confirmed of this matter by what sir William Trumball, then the English ambassador at Constantinople, told me at his return to England. He was the most eminent of all our civilians, and was by much the best pleader in those courts, and was a learned, a diligent, and a virtuous man. He was sent envoy to Paris upon the lord Preston's being recalled. He was there when the edict that repealed the edict of Nantes was passed, and saw the violence of the persecution, and acted a great and worthy part in harbouring many, in covering their effects, and in conveying over their jewels and plate to England ; which disgusted the court of France, and was not very acceptable to the court of England, though it was not then thought fit to disown or recall him for it *. He had orders to put in memorials, complaining of the invasion of the principality of Orange ; which he did in so high a strain, that the last of them was like a denunciation of war. From thence he was sent to Turkey. And, about this time, he was surprised one morning by a visit that the French ambassador made him, without those ceremonies that pass between ambassadors. He told him, there was no ceremony to be between them any more, for their masters were now one. And he shewed him Monsieur de Croissy's letter, which was written in cipher. The deciphering he read to him, importing, that now an alliance was concluded between the two kings. So, this matter was as evidently proved, as a thing of such a nature could possibly be.

* Sir William Trumball, the friend of Dryden and the early patron of Pope, is another instance that poverty is ever an excitement favourable to the development of excellence. Straitened in his means when commencing life, he laboured with a diligence in his profession as a civilian that insured success. He was sent from the

The conduct of France at that time with relation to the States was very unaccountable, and proved as favourable to the prince of Orange's designs, as if he had directed it. All the manufacture of Holland, both linen and woollen, was prohibited in France. The importation of herrings was also prohibited, except they were cured with French salt. This was contrary to the treaty of commerce. The manufacture began to suffer much ; and this was sensible to those who were concerned in the herring trade. So the States prohibited the importing of French wine, or brandy, till the trade should be set free again on both sides. There was nothing that the prince had more reason to apprehend, than that the French should have given the States some satisfaction in the point of trade, and offered some assurances with relation to the territory of Cologne. Many of the towns of Holland might have been wrought on by some temper in these things ; great bodies being easily deceived, and not easily drawn into wars, which interrupt that trade which they subsist by. But the height the court of France was then in, made them despise all the world. They seemed rather to wish for a war, than to fear it. This disposed the States to an unanimous concurrence in the great resolutions that were now agreed on, of raising ten thousand men more, and of accepting thirteen thousand Germans, for whom the prince had, as was formerly mentioned, agreed with some of the princes of the empire. Amsterdam was at first cold in the matter ; but they consented with the rest. Reports were given out that the French would settle a regulation of commerce, and that they would abandon the cardinal, and leave the affairs of Cologne to be settled by the laws of the empire. Expedients were also spoken of for accommodating the matter, by prince Clement's being admitted coadjutor, and by his having some of the strong places put in his hands. This was only given out to amuse.

But while these things were discoursed of at the Hague, the world was surprised with a manifesto set out, in the king of France's name, against the emperor. In it the emperor's ill designs against France were set forth. It also complained of the elector Palatine's injustice to the duchess of Orleans, in not giving her the succession that fell to her by her brother's death, which consisted in some lands, cannon, furniture, and other moveable goods. It also charged him with the disturbances in Cologne, he having intended first to gain that to one of his own sons, and then engaging the Bavarian prince into it ; whose elder brother having no children, he hoped, by bringing him into an ecclesiastical state, to make the succession of Bavaria fall into his own family. It charged the emperor, likewise, with a design to force the electors to choose his son king of the Romans ; and that the elector Palatine was pressing him to make peace with the Turks, in order to the turning his arms against France. By their means a great alliance was projected among many protestant princes to disturb cardinal Furstemberg in the possession of Cologne, to which he was postulated by the majority of the chapter. And this might turn to the prejudice of the catholic religion in that territory. Upon all these considerations, the king of France, seeing that his enemies could not enter into France by any other way but by that of Philipsburg, resolved to possess himself of it, and then to demolish it. He resolved also to take Kaiserslauter from the Palatine, and to keep it, till the duchess of Orleans had justice done her in her pretensions ; and he also resolved to support the cardinal in his possession of Cologne. But, to balance this, he offered to the house of Bavaria, that prince Clement should be chosen coadjutor. He offered also to raise court of France to that of Turkey in 1687. William the Third continued him in this appointment, and then made him a commissioner of the navy, privy councillor, and secretary of state. He represented Oxford university in parliament during 1695. He retired from public life to East Hamsted, in Berkshire, and, devoting his leisure to literature, continued there until his death, which occurred in 1716, when he was seventy eight. His letters are to be found among those of Pope and others. He also wrote a life of archbishop Dolben. — Gen. Biog. Dictionary ; Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

Fribourg, and to restore Kaiserslauter, as soon as the elector Palatine should pay the duchess of Orleans the just value of her pretensions. He demanded, that the truce between him and the empire should be turned into a peace. He proposed that the king of England and the republic of Venice should be the mediators of this peace. And he concluded all, declaring that he would not bind himself to stand to the conditions now offered by him, unless they were accepted before January.

I have given a full abstract of this manifesto : for upon it did the great war begin, which lasted till the peace of Ryswick. And, upon the grounds laid down in this manifesto, it will evidently appear whether the war was a just one or not. This declaration was much censured, both for the matter and for the style. It had not the air of greatness which became crowned heads. The duchess of Orleans's pretensions to old furniture was a strange rise to a war ; especially when it was not alleged that these had been demanded in the forms of law, and that justice had been denied, which was a course necessarily to be observed in things of that nature. The judging of the secret intentions of the elector palatine with relation to the house of Bavaria was absurd. And the complaints of designs to bring the emperor to a peace with the Turks, that so he might make war on France, and of the emperor's design to force an election of a king of the Romans, was the entering into the secrets of those thoughts which were only known to God. Such conjectures, so remote and uncertain, and that could not be proved, were a strange ground of war. If this was once admitted, all treaties of peace were vain things, and were no more to be reckoned or relied on. The reason given of the intention to take Philipsburg, because it was the most proper place by which France could be invaded, was a throwing off all regards to the common decencies observed by princes. All fortified places on frontiers are intended both for resistance, and for magazines ; and are of both sides conveniences for entering into the neighbouring territory, as there is occasion for it. So here was a pretence set up, of beginning a war, that puts an end to all the securities of peace.

The business of Cologne was judged by the pope, according to the laws of the empire : and his sentence was final : nor could the postulation of the majority of the chapter be valid, unless two-thirds joined in it. The cardinal was commended in the manifesto for his care in preserving the peace of Europe. This was ridiculous to all, who knew that he had been for many years the great incendiary, who had betrayed the empire, chiefly in the year 1672. The charge that the emperor's agent had laid on him before the chapter was also complained of, as an infraction of the amnesty stipulated by the peace of Nimeguen. He was not indeed to be called to an account, in order to be punished for anything done before that peace. But that did not bind up the emperor from endeavouring to exclude him from so great a dignity, which was likely to prove fatal to the empire. These were some of the censures that passed on this manifesto ; which was indeed looked on, by all who had considered the rights of peace and the laws of war, as one of the most avowed and solemn declarations that ever was made of the perfidiousness of that court. And it was thought to be some degrees beyond that in the year 1672, in which that king's glory was pretended as the chief motive of that war. For, in that, particulars were not reckoned up : so it might be supposed he had met with affronts, which he did not think consistent with his greatness to be mentioned. But here all that could be thought on, even the hangings of Heidelberg, were enumerated : and all together amounted to this, that the king of France thought himself tied by no peace ; but that, when he suspected his neighbours were intending to make war upon him, he might upon such a suspicion begin a war on his part.

This manifesto against the emperor was followed by another against the pope, written in the form a letter to cardinal D'Estrées, to be given by him to the pope. In it he reckoned all the partiality that the pope had shown during his whole pontificate, both against France and in favour of the house of Austria. He mentioned the business of the regale ; his refusing the bulls to the bishops nominated by him ; the dispute about the franchises, of which his ambassadors had been long in possession ; the denying audience, not only to his ambassador, but to a gentleman whom he had sent to Rome without a character, and with a letter written in his own hand. In conclusion, he complained of the pope's breaking the canons of the church, in granting bulls in favour of prince Clement, and in denying justice to cardinal Furstemberg. For all these reasons the king was resolved to separate the character of the most holy father from that of a temporal prince: and therefore he intended to seize on Avignon, as likewise on Castro, until the pope should satisfy the pretensions of the duke of Parma. He complained of the pope's not concurring with him in the concerns of the church for the extirpation of heresy: in which the pope's behaviour gave great scandal both to the old catholics, and to the new converts. It also gave the prince of Orange the boldness to go and invade the king of England, under the pretence of supporting the protestant religion, but indeed to destroy the catholic religion, and to overturn the government: upon which his emissaries and the writers in Holland gave out that the birth of the prince of Wales was an imposture.

This was the first public mention that was made of the imposture of that birth: for the author of a book, written to that purpose, was punished for it in Holland. It was strange to see the disputes about the franchises made a pretence for a war: for certainly all sovereign princes can make such regulations as they think fit in those matters. If they cut ambassadors short in any privilege, their ambassadors are to expect the same treatment from other princes: and as long as the sacredness of an ambassador's person, and of his family, was still preserved, which was all that was a part of the law of nations, princes may certainly limit the extent of their other privileges, and may refuse any ambassadors who will not submit to their regulation. The number of an ambassador's retinue is not a thing that can be well defined: but if an ambassador comes with an army about him, instead of a retinue, he may be denied admittance. And if he forces it, as Lavardin had done, it was certainly an act of hostility: and, instead of having a right to the character of an ambassador, he might well be considered and treated as an enemy.

The pope had observed the canons in rejecting cardinal Furstemberg's defective postulation. And, whatever might be brought from ancient canons, the practice of that church for many ages, allowed of the dispensations that the pope granted to prince Clement. It was looked on by all people as a strange reverse of things, to see the king of France, after all his cruelty to the protestants, now go to make war on the pope; and on the other hand, to see the whole protestant body concurring to support the authority of the pope's bulls in the business of Cologne; and to defend the two houses of Austria and Bavaria, by whom they were laid so low but threescore years before this. The French, by the war that they had now begun, had sent their troops towards Germany and the Upper Rhine; and so had rendered their sending an army over to England impracticable: nor could they send such a force into the bishopric of Cologne, as could any ways alarm the States. So that the invasion of Germany made the designs, that the prince of Orange was engaged in, both practicable and safe.

Marshal Schomberg came at this time into the country of Cleves. He was a German by birth: so when the persecution was begun in France, he desired leave to return into his own country. That was denied him. All the favour he could obtain was leave to go to Portugal. And so cruel is the spirit of popery, that, though he had preserved that kingdom from falling under the yoke of Castile, yet now that he came thither for refuge, the inquisition represented that matter of giving harbour to a heretic so odiously to the king, that he was forced to send him away. He came from thence first to England, and then he passed through Holland, where he entered into a particular confidence with the prince of Orange. And being invited by the old elector of Brandenburg, he went to Berlin: where he was made governor of Prussia, and set at the head of all the elector's armies. The son treated him now with the same regard that the father had for him: and sent him to Cleves, to command the troops that were sent from the empire to the defence of Cologne. The cardinal offered a neutrality to the town of Cologne. But they chose rather to accept a garrison that Schomberg sent them: by which not only that town was secured, but a stop was put to any progress the French could make, till they could get that great town into their hands. By these means the States were safe on all hands for this winter: and this gave the prince of Orange great quiet in prosecuting his designs upon England. He had often said, that he would never give occasion to any of his enemies to say that he had carried away the best force of the States, and had left them exposed to any impressions that might be made on them in his absence. He had now reason to conclude that he had no other risk to run in his intended expedition, but that of the seas and the weather. The seas were then very boisterous : and the season of the year was so far spent, that he saw he was to have a campaign in winter. But all other things were now well secured by this unexpected conduct of the French.

There was a fleet now set to sea of about fifty sail. Most of them were third or fourth rates, commanded by Dutch officers. But Herbert, as representing the prince's person, was to command in chief, as lieutenant-general-admiral. This was not very easy to the States, nor indeed to the prince himself ; who thought it an absurd thing to set a stranger at the head of their fleet. Nothing less would content Herbert. And it was said, that nothing would probably make the English fleet come over and join with the prince, so much as the seeing one that had lately commanded them at the head of the Dutch fleet. There was a transport fleet hired for carrying over the army. And this grew to be about five hundred vessels : for, though the horse and dragoons in pay were not four thousand, yet the horses for officers and volunteers, and for artillery and baggage, were above seven thousand. There were arms provided for twenty thousand more. And, as things were thus made ready,

The declaration that the prince was to publish came to be considered. A great many draughts were sent from England by different hands. All these were put in the pensioner Fagel's hands, who upon that made a long and heavy draught, founded on the grounds of the civil law, and of the law of nations. That was brought to me to be put in English. I saw he was fond of his own draught : and the prince left that matter wholly to him : yet I got it to be much shortened, though it was still too long. It set forth at first a long recital of all the violations of the laws of England, both with relation to religion, to the civil government, and to the administration of justice, which have been all opened in the series of the history. It set forth next all remedies that had been tried in a gentler way ; all which had been ineffectual. Petitioning by the greatest persons, and in the most private manner, was made a crime. Endeavours were used to pack a parliament, and to pre-engage both the votes of the electors and the votes of such as upon the election should be returned to sit in parliament. The writs were to be addressed to unlawful officers, who were disabled by law to execute them : so that no legal parliament could now be brought together. In conclusion, the reasons of suspecting the queen's pretended delivery were set forth in general terms. Upon these grounds the prince, seeing how little hope was left of succeeding in any other method, and being sensible of the ruin both of the protestant religion, and of the constitution of England and Ireland, that was imminent, and being earnestly invited by men of all ranks, and in particular by many of the peers, both spiritual and temporal, he resolved, according to the obligation he lay under, both on the princess's account and on his own, to go over into England, and to see for proper and effectual remedies for redressing such growing evils, in a parliament that should be lawfully chosen, and should sit in full freedom, according to the ancient custom and constitution of England, with which he would concur in all things that might tend to the peace and happiness of the nation. And he promised in particular, that he would preserve the church and the established religion, and that he would endeavour to unite all such as divided from the church to it, by the best means that could be thought on, and that he would suffer such as would live peaceably to enjoy all due freedom in their consciences, and that he would refer the enquiry into the queen's delivery to a parliament, and acquiesce in its decision. This the prince signed and sealed on the tenth of October. With this the prince ordered letters to be written in his name, inviting both the soldiers, seamen, and others to come and join with him, in order to the securing their religion, laws, and liberties. Another short paper was drawn by me concerning the measures of obedience, justifying the design, and answering the objections that might be made to it. Of all these, many thousand copies were printed, to be dispersed at our landing.

The prince desired me to go along with him as his chaplain, to which I very readily agreed : for, being fully satisfied in my conscience that the undertaking was lawful, and just, and having had a considerable hand in advising the whole progress of it, I thought it would have been an unbecoming fear in me to have taken care of my own person, when the prince was venturing his, and the whole was now to be put to hazard. It is true I, being a Scotchman by birth, had reason to expect that, if I had fallen into the enemies' hands, I should have been sent to Scotland, and put to the torture there. And, having this in prospect, I took care to know no particulars of any of those who corresponded with the prince. So that knowing nothing against any, even torture itself could not have drawn from me that, by which any person could be hurt. There was another declaration prepared for Scotland. But I had no other share in that, but that I corrected it in several places, chiefly in that which related to the church: for the Scots at the Hague, who were all presbyterians, had drawn it so, that, by many passages in it, the prince by an implication declared in favour of presbytery. He did not see what the consequences of those were till I explained them. So he ordered them to be altered. And by the declaration that matter was still entire.

As Sidney brought over letters from the persons formerly mentioned, both inviting the prince to come over to save and rescue the nation from ruin, and assuring him that they wrote that which was the universal sense of all the wise and good men in the nation: so they also sent over with him a scheme of advices. They advised his having a great fleet, but a small army: they thought it should not exceed six or seven thousand men. They apprehended, that an ill-use might be made of it, if he brought over too great an army of foreigners, to infuse into people a jealousy that he designed a conquest: they advised his landing in the North, either in Burlington Bay, or a little below Hull: Yorkshire abounded in horse: and the gentry were generally well affected, even to zeal, for the design: the country was plentiful, and the roads were good till within fifty miles of London. The earl of Danby was earnest for this, hoping to have had a share in the whole management, by the interest he believed he had in that country. It was confessed, that the western counties were well affected: but it was said, that the miscarriage of Monmouth's invasion, and the executions which followed it, had so dispirited them, that it could not be expected they would be forward to join the prince: above all things they pressed dispatch, and all possible haste: the king had then but eighteen ships riding in the Downs: but a much greater fleet was almost ready to come out: they only wanted seamen, who came in very slowly.

When these things were laid before the prince, he said, he could by no means resolve to come over with so small a force: could not believe what they suggested, concerning the king's army's being disposed to come over to him: nor did he reckon, so much as they did, on the people of the country's coming in to him: he said he could trust to neither of these: he could not undertake so great a design, the miscarriage of which would be the ruin both of England and Holland, without such a force as he had reason to believe would be superior to the king's own, though his whole army should stick to him. Some proposed, that the prince would divide his force, and land himself with the greatest part in the North, and send a detachment to the West, under marshal Schomberg. They pressed the prince very earnestly to bring him over with him, both because of the great reputation he was in, and because they thought it was a security to the prince's person, and to the whole design, to have another general with him, to whom all would submit in case of any dismal accident: for it seemed too much to have all depend on a single life: and they thought that would be the safer, if their enemies saw another person capable of the command, in case they should have a design upon the prince's person. With this the prince complied easily, and obtained the elector's consent to carry him over with him. But he rejected the motion of dividing his fleet and army. He said, such a divided force might be fatal: for if the king should send his chief strength against the detachment, and have the advantage, it might lose the whole business; since a misfortune in any one part might be the ruin of the whole.

When these advices were proposed to Herbert, and the other seamen, they opposed the landing in the north vehemently. They said, no seamen had been consulted in that: the north coast was not fit for a fleet to ride in during an east wind, which it was to be expected in winter might blow so fresh, that it would not be possible to preserve the fleet; and if the fleet was left there, the channel was open for such forces as might be sent from France: the channel was the safer sea for the fleet to ride in, as well as to cut off the assistance from France. Yet the advices for this were so positive, and so often repeated from England, that the prince was resolved to have split the matter, and to have landed in the North, and then to have sent the fleet to lie in the channel.

The prince continued still to cover his design, and to look towards Cologne. He ordered a review of his army, and an encampment for two months at Nimeguen. A train of artillery was also ordered. By these orders the officers saw a necessity of furnishing themselves for so long a time. The main point remained, how money should be found for so chargeable an expedition. The French ambassador had his eye upon this: and reckoned that, whenever anything relating to it should be moved, it would be then easy to raise an opposition, or at least to create a delay. But Fagel's great foresight did prevent this. In the July before, it was represented to the States, that now by reason of the neighbourhood of Cologne, and the war that was likely to arise there, it was necessary to repair their places, both on the Rhine and the Issel, which were in a very bad condition. This was agreed to: and the charge was estimated at four millions of guilders. So the States created a fund for the interest of that money, and ordered it to be taken up by a loan. It was all brought in in four days. About the end of September a message was delivered to the States from the elector of Brandenburg, by which he undertook to send an army into his country of Cleves, and to secure the States from all danger on that side for this winter.

Upon this, it was proposed to lend the prince the four millions. And this passed easily in the States, without any opposition, to the amazement of all that saw it: for it had never been known that so great and so dangerous an expedition in such a season had been so easily agreed to, without so much as one disagreeing vote, either at the Hague, or in any of the towns of Holland. All people went so cordially into it, that it was not necessary to employ much time in satisfying them, both of the lawfulness and of the necessity of the undertaking. Fagel had sent for all the eminent ministers of the chief towns of Holland: and, as he had a vehemence as well as a tenderness in speaking, he convinced them evidently, that both their religion and their country were in such imminent danger, that nothing but this expedition could save them: they saw the persecution in France: and in that they might see what was to be expected from that religion: they saw the violence with which the king of England was driving matters in his country, which, if not stopped, would soon prevail. He sent them thus full of zeal to dispose the people to a hearty approbation and concurrence in this design. The ministers in Holland are so watched over by the States, that they have no more authority when they meet in a body, in a synod, or in a classis, than the States think fit to allow them. But I was never in any place, where I thought the clergy had generally so much credit with the people, as they have there: and they employed it all upon this occasion very diligently, and to good purpose. Those who had no regard to religion, yet saw a war begun in the empire by the French. And the publication of the alliance between France and England, by the French ambassador, made them conclude that England would join with France. They reckoned they could not stand before such an united force, and that therefore it was necessary to take England out of the hands of a prince, who was such a firm ally to France. All the English that lived in Holland, especially the merchants that were settled in Amsterdam, where the opposition was likely to be strongest, had such positive advices of the disposition that the nation, and even the army were in; that, as this undertaking was considered as the only probable means of their preservation, it seemed so well concerted, that little doubt was made of success, except what arose from the season; which was not only far spent, but the winds were both so contrary, and so stormy, for many weeks, that a forcible stop seemed put to it by the hand of Heaven.

Herbert went to sea with the Dutch fleet, and was ordered to stand over to the Downs, and to look on the English fleet, to try if any would come over, of which some hopes were given; or to engage them, while they were then not above eighteen or twenty ships strong. But the contrary winds made this not only impracticable, but gave great reason to fear that a great part of the fleet would be either lost, or disabled. These continued for above a fortnight, and gave us at the Hague a melancholy prospect. Herbert also found that the fleet was neither so strong, nor so well manned, as he had expected.

All the English that were scattered about the provinces, or in Germany, came to the Hague. Among these there was one Wildman, who, from being an agitator in Cromwell's army, had been a constant meddler on all occasions in everything that looked like sedition, and seemed inclined to oppose everything that was uppermost. He brought his usual ill-humour along with him, having a peculiar talent in possessing others by a sort of contagion with jealousy and discontent. To these the prince ordered his declaration to be shown. Wildman took great exceptions to it, with which he possessed many to such a degree, that they began to say they would not engage upon those grounds. Wildman had drawn one, in which he had laid down a scheme of the government of England, and then had set forth many particulars in which it had been violated, carrying these a great way into king Charles's reign; all which he supported by many authorities from law books. He objected to the prince's insisting so much on the dispensing power, and on what had been done to the bishops. He said, there was certainly a dispensing power in the crown, practised for some ages: very few patents passed in which there was not a "non obstante" to one or more acts of parliament: this power had been too far stretched of late: but the stretching of a power that was in the crown, could not be a just ground of war: the king had a right to bring any man to a trial: the bishops had a fair trial, and were acquitted, and discharged upon it: in all which there was nothing done contrary to law. All this seemed mysterious, when a known republican was become an advocate for prerogative. His design in this was deep and spiteful. He saw that, as the declaration was drawn, the church party would come in, and be well received by the prince: so he, who designed to separate the prince and them at the greatest distance from one another, studied to make the prince declare against those grievances, in which many of them were concerned, and which some among them had promoted. The earl of Macclesfield, with the lord Mordaunt, and many others, joined with him in this. But the earl of Shrewsbury, together with Sidney, Russel, and some others, were as positive in their opinion that the prince ought not to look so far back as into king Charles's reign: this would disgust many of the nobility and gentry, and almost all the clergy: so they thought the declaration was to be so conceived, as to draw in the body of the whole nation: they were all alarmed with the dispensing power: and it would seem very strange to see an invasion, in which this was not set out as the main ground of it. every man could distinguish between the dispensing with a special act in a particular case, and a total dispensing with laws to secure the nation and the religion: the ill designs of the court, as well as the affections of the nation, had appeared so evidently in the bishops' trial, that if no notice was taken of it, it would be made use of to possess all people with an opinion of the prince's ill-will to them. Russel said, that any reflections made on king Charles's reign would not carry over all the high church party, but all the army, entirely to the king. Wildman's declaration was much objected to. The prince could not enter into a discussion of the law and government of England: that was to be left to the parliament: the prince could only set forth the present and public grievances as they were transmitted to him by those upon whose invitation he was going over. This was not without some difficulty overcome, by altering some few expressions in the first draught, and leaving out some circumstances. So the declaration was printed over again, with some amendments.

In the beginning of October, the troops marched from Nimeguen were put on board in the Zuyder sea, where they lay above ten days before they could get out of the Texel. Never was so great a design executed in so short a time. A transport fleet of five hundred vessels was hired in three days' time. All things, as soon as they were ordered, were got to be so quickly ready, that we were amazed at the dispatch. It is true, some things were wanting, and some things had been forgotten. But when the greatness of the equipage was considered, together with the secrecy with which it was to be conducted till the whole design was to be avowed, it seemed much more strange that so little was wanting, or that so few things had been forgotten. Bentinck, Dykvelt, Herbert, and Van Hulst, were for two months constantly at the Hague, giving all necessary orders with so little noise that nothing broke out all that while. Even in lesser matters favourable circumstances concurred to cover the design. Bentinck used to be constantly with the prince, being the person that was most entirely trusted and constantly employed by him: so that his absence from him, being so extraordinary a thing, might have given some umbrage. But all the summer his lady was so very ill, that she was looked on every day as one that could not live three days to an end: so that this was a very just excuse for his attendance at the Hague.

I waited on the princess a few days before we left the Hague. She seemed to have a great load on her spirits, but to have no scruple as to the lawfulness of the design. After much other discourse, I said, that if we got safe to England, I made no great doubt of our success in all other things. I only begged her pardon to tell her, that if there should happen to be at any time any disjointing between the prince and her, that would ruin all. She answered me, that I needed fear no such thing: if any person should attempt that, she would treat them so, as to discourage all others from venturing on it for the future. She was very solemn and serious, and prayed God earnestly to bless and direct us.

On the sixteenth of October, O. S., the wind, that had stood so long in the west, came into the east. So orders were sent to all to haste to Helvoet-Sluis. That morning the prince went into the assembly of the States-general, to take leave of them. He said to them, he was extremely sensible of the kindness they had all shown him upon many occasions: he took God to witness, he had served them faithfully ever since they had trusted him with the government, and that he had never any end before his eyes but the good of the country: he had pursued it always: and if at any time he erred in his judgment, yet his heart was ever set on procuring their safety and prosperity. He took God to witness, he went to England with no other intentions, but those he had set out in his declaration: he did not know how God might dispose of him: to his providence he committed himself: whatsoever might become of him, he committed to them the care of their country, and recommended the princess to them in a most particular manner: he assured them, she loved their country perfectly, and equally with her own: he hoped that, whatever might happen to him, they would still protect her, and use her as she well deserved; and so he took leave. It was a sad, but a kind parting. Some of every province offered at an answer to what the prince had said: but they all melted into tears and passion; so that their speeches were much broken, very short, and extremely tender. Only the prince himself continued firm in his usual gravity and phlegm. When he came to Helvoet-Sluis, the transport fleet had consumed so much of their provisions, that three days of the good wind were lost before all were supplied anew.

At last, on the nineteenth of October, the prince went aboard, and the whole fleet sailed out that night. But the next day the wind turned into the north, and settled in the north-west. At night a great storm rose. We wrought against it all that night, and the next day. But it was in vain to struggle any longer. And so vast a fleet run no small hazard, being obliged to keep together, and yet not to come too near one another. On the twenty-first in the afternoon the signal was given to go in again: and on the twenty-second the far greater part got safely into port. Many ships were at first wanting, and were believed to be lost. But after a few days all came in. There was not one ship lost; nor so much as any one man, except one that was blown from the shrouds into the sea. Some ships were so shattered, that as soon as they came in, and all was taken out of them, they immediately sunk down. Only five hundred horses died from want of air. Men are upon such occasions apt to flatter themselves upon the points of Providence. In France and England, as it was believed that our loss was much greater than it proved to be, so they triumphed not a little, as if God had fought against us, and defeated the whole design. We on our part, who found ourselves delivered out of so great a storm and so vast a danger, looked on it as a mark of God's great care of us, who, though he had not changed the course of the winds and seas in our favour, yet had preserved us while we were in such apparent danger, beyond what could have been imagined. The States were not at all discouraged with this hard beginning, but gave the necessary orders for supplying us with every thing that we needed. The princess behaved herself at the Hague suitably to what was expected from her. She ordered prayers four times a day, and assisted at them with great devotion. She spoke to nobody of affairs, but was calm, and silent. The States ordered some of their body to give her an account of all their proceedings. She indeed answered little: but in that little she gave them cause often to admire her judgment.

In England the court saw now, that it was in vain to dissemble, or disguise, their fears any more. Great consultations were held there. The earl of Melfort, and all the papists, proposed the seizing on all suspected persons, and the sending them to Portsmouth. The earl of Sunderland opposed this vehemently. He said, it would not be possible to seize on many at the same time; and the seizing on a few would alarm all the rest: it would drive them into the prince, and furnish them with a pretence for it: he proposed rather, that the king would do such popular things, as might give some content, and lay that fermentation with which the nation was then, as it were, distracted. This was at that time complied with: but all the popish party continued upon this to charge lord Sunderland, as one that was in the king's counsels only to betray them; that had before diverted the offer of assistance from France, and now the securing those who were the most likely to join and assist the prince. By their importunities the king was at last so prevailed on, that he turned him out of all his places; and lord Preston was made secretary of state. The fleet was now put out, and was so strong that, if they had met the Dutch fleet, probably they would have been too hard for them, especially considering the great transport fleet that they were to cover. All the forces that were in Scotland were ordered into England; and that kingdom was left in the hands of their militia. Several regiments came likewise from Ireland. So that the king's army was then about thirty thousand strong. But, in order to lay the heat that was raised in the nation, the king sent for the bishops; and set out the injustice of this unnatural invasion that the prince was designing: he assured them of his affections to the church of England; and protested, he had never intended to carry things further than to an equal liberty of conscience: he desired, they would declare their abhorrence of this invasion, and that they would offer him their advice, what was fit for him to do. They declined the point of abhorrence, and advised the present summoning a parliament; and that in the mean while the ecclesiastical commission might be broken, the proceedings against the bishop of London and Magdalen college might be reversed, and that the law might be again put in its channel. This they delivered with great gravity, and with a courage that recommended them to the whole nation. There was an order sent them from the king afterwards, requiring them to compose an office for the present occasion. The prayers were so well drawn, that even those who wished for the prince might have joined in them. The church party did now show their approbation of the prince's expedition in such terms, that many were surprised at it, both then, and since that time. They spoke openly in favour of it. They expressed their grief to see the wind so cross. They wished for an east wind, which, on that occasion, was called the protestant wind. They spoke with great scorn of all that the court was then doing to regain the hearts of the nation. And indeed the proceedings of the court that way were so cold, and so forced, that few were likely to be deceived by them, but those who had a mind to be deceived. The writs for a parliament were often ordered to be made ready for the seal, and were as often stopped. Some were sealed, and given out: but they were quickly called in again. The old charters were ordered to be restored again. Jeffreys himself carried back the charter of the city of London, and put on the appearances of joy and heartiness when he gave it to them. All men saw through that affectation: for he had raised himself chiefly upon the advising, or promoting, that matter of the surrender, and the forfeiture of the charters. An order was also sent to the bishop of Winchester, to put the president of Magdalen college again in possession. Yet, that order not being executed when the news was brought that the prince and his fleet were blown back, it was countermanded; which plainly showed what it was that drove the court into so much compliance, and how long it was likely to last.

The matter of the greatest concern, and that could not be dropped, but was to be supported, was the birth of the prince of Wales. And therefore the court thought it necessary, now in an after-game, to offer some satisfaction in that point. So a great meeting was called, not only of all the privy councillors and judges, but of all the nobility then in town. To these the king complained of the great injury that was done both him and the queen, by the prince of Orange, who accused them of so black an imposture: he said, he believed there were few princes then alive, who had been born in the presence of more witnesses than were at his son's birth: he had therefore called them together, that they might hear the proof of that matter. It was first proved that the queen was delivered abed, while many were in the room; and that they saw the child soon after he was taken from the queen by the midwife. But in this the midwife was the single witness; for none of the ladies had felt the child in the queen's belly. The countess of Sunderland did indeed depose, that the queen called to her to give her her hand, that she might feel how the child lay; to which she added, "which I did;" but did not say, whether she felt the child, or not: and she told the duchess of Hamilton, from whom I had it, that when she put her hand into the bed, the queen held it, and let it go no lower than her breasts. So that really she felt nothing. And this deposition, brought to make a show, was an evidence against the matter, rather than for it; and was a violent presumption of an imposture, and of an artifice to cover it. Many ladies deposed that they had often seen the marks of milk on the queen's linen, near her breasts. Two or three deposed, that they saw it running out at the nipple. All these deposed, that they saw milk before the pretended delivery. But none of them deposed concerning milk after the delivery; though nature sends it then in greater abundance: and the queen had it always in such a plenty, that some weeks passed after her delivery before she was quite freed from it. The ladies did not name the time in which they saw the milk, except one, who named the month of May. But, if the particulars mentioned before, that happened on Easter Monday, are reflected on, and if it appears probable by these that the queen miscarried at that time; then all that the ladies mentioned of milk in her breasts, particularly she that fixed it to the month of May, might have followed upon that miscarriage, and be no proof concerning the late birth. Mrs. Pierce, the laundress, deposed that she took linen from the queen's body once, which carried the marks of a delivery. But she spoke only to one time. That was a main circumstance; and, if it had been true, it must have been often done, and was capable of a more copious proof, since there is occasion for such things to be often looked on, and well considered. The lady Wentworth was the single witness that deposed that she had felt the child move in the queen's belly. She was a bed-chamber woman, as well as a single witness; and she fixed it on no time. If it was very early, she might have been mistaken: or if it was before Easter Monday, it might be true, and yet have no relation to this birth. This was the substance of this evidence, which was ordered to be enrolled and printed. But when it was published, it had a quite contrary effect to what the court expected from it. The presumption of law before this was all in favour of the birth, since the parents owned the child: so that the proof lay on the other side, and ought to be offered by those who called it in question. But, now that this proof was brought, which was so apparently defective, it did not lessen but increase the jealousy with which the nation was possessed: for all people concluded that, if the thing had been true, it must have been easy to have brought a much more copious proof than was now published to the world. It was much observed, that princess Anne was not present. She indeed excused herself: she thought she was breeding; and all motion was forbidden her. None believed that to be the true reason; for it was thought that the going from one apartment of the court to another could not hurt her. So it was looked on as a colour that showed she did not believe the thing; and that therefore she would not, by her being present, seem to give any credit to it.

This was the state of affairs in England, while we lay at Helvoet-Sluis, where we continued till the first of November. Here Wildman created a new disturbance. He plainly had a show of courage, but was, at least, then a coward. He possessed some of the English with an opinion, that the design was now irrecoverably lost. This was entertained by many, who were willing to hearken to any proposition, that set danger at a distance from themselves. They were still magnifying the English fleet, and undervaluing the Dutch. They went so far in this, that they proposed to the prince, that Herbert should be ordered to go over to the coast of England, and either fight the English fleet, or force them in: and in that case the transport fleet might venture over; which otherwise they thought could not be safely done. This some urged with such earnestness, that nothing but the prince's authority, and Schomberg's credit, could have withstood it. The prince told them, the season was now so far spent, that the losing of more time was the losing the whole design: fleets might lie long in view of one another, before it could be possible for them to come to an engagement, though both sides equally desired it; but much longer, if any one of them avoided it; it was not possible to keep the army, especially the horse, long at sea: and it was no easy matter to take them all out, and to ship them again: after the wind had stood so long in the west, there was reason to hope it would turn to the east: and when that should come, no time was to be lost: for it would sometimes blow so fresh in a few days as to freeze up the river; so that it would not be possible to get out all the winter long. With these things he rather silenced than quieted them. All this while the men-of-war were still riding at sea, it being a continued storm for some weeks. The prince sent out several advice boats with orders to them to come in. But they could not come up to them. On the twenty-seventh of October there was for six hours together a most dreadful storm: so that there were few among us, that did not conclude, that the best part of the fleet, and by consequence that the whole design, was lost. Many that have passed for heroes, yet showed then the agonies of fear in their looks and whole deportment. The prince still retained his usual calmness, and the same tranquillity of spirit, that I had observed in him in his happiest days. On the twenty-eighth it calmed a little, and our fleet came all in, to our great joy. The rudder of one third-rate was broken, and that was all the hurt that the storm had done. At last the much-longed-for east wind came. And so hard a thing it was to set so vast a body in motion, that two days of this wind were lost before all could be quite ready.

On the first of November, O. S., we sailed out with the evening tide, but made little way that night, that so our fleet might come out and move in order. We tried next day till noon if it was possible to sail northward, but the wind was so strong and full in the east, that we could not move that way. About noon the signal was given to steer westward. This wind not only diverted us from that unhappy course, but it kept the English fleet in the river: so that it was not possible for them to come out, though they were come down as far as to the Gunfleet. By this means we had the sea open to us, with a fair wind and a safe navigation. On the third we passed between Dover and Calais, and before night came in sight of the Isle of Wight. The next day, being the day in which the prince was both born and married, he fancied if he could land that day it would look auspicious to the army, and animate the soldiers. But we all who considered that the day following, being Gunpowder-treason day, our landing that day might have a good effect on the minds of the English nation, were better pleased to see that we could land no sooner. Torbay was thought the best place for our great fleet to lie in: and it was resolved to land the army where it could be best done near it; reckoning, that being at such a distance from London, we could provide ourselves with horses, and put everything in order before the king could march his army towards us, and that we should lie some time at Exeter for the refreshing our men. I was in the ship, with the prince's other domestics, that went in the van of the whole fleet. At noon on the fourth, Russel came on board us, with the best of all the English pilots that they had brought over. He gave him the steering of the ship, and ordered him to be sure to sail so that next morning we should be short of Dartmouth: for it was intended that some of the ships should land there, and that the rest should sail into Torbay. The pilot thought he could not be mistaken in measuring our course; and believed that he certainly kept within orders, till the morning shewed us we were past Torbay and Dartmouth. The wind, though it had abated much of its first violence, yet was still full in the east. So now it seemed necessary for us to sail on to Plymouth, which must have engaged us in a long and tedious campaign in winter, through a very ill country. Nor were we sure to be received at Plymouth. The earl of Bath, who was governor, had sent by Russel a promise to the prince to come and join him: yet it was not likely that he would be so forward as to receive us at our first coming. The delays he made afterwards, pretending that he was managing the garrison, whereas he was indeed staying till he saw how the matter was likely to be decided, showed us how fatal it had proved, if we had been forced to sail on to Plymouth. But while Russel was in no small disorder, after he saw the pilot's error, (upon which he bid me go to my prayers, for all was lost,) and as he was ordering the boat to be cleared to go aboard the prince, on a sudden, to all our wonder, it calmed a little. And then the wind turned into the south: and a soft and happy gale of wind carried in the whole fleet in four hours' time into Torbay. Immediately as many landed as conveniently could. As soon as the prince and marshal Schomberg got to shore, they were furnished with such horses as the village of Broxholme could afford; and rode up to view the grounds, which they found as convenient as could be imagined for the foot in that season. It was not a cold night: otherwise the soldiers, who had been kept warm aboard, might have suffered much by it. As soon as I landed, I made what haste I could to the place where the prince was, who took me heartily by the hand, and asked me if I would not now believe predestination. I told him I would never forget that providence of God which had appeared so signally on this occasion. He was more cheerful than ordinary. Yet he returned soon to his usual gravity. The prince sent for all the fishermen of the place, and asked them which was the properest place for landing his horse, which all apprehended would be a tedious business, and might hold some days. But next morning he was shown a place, a quarter of a mile below the village, where the ships could be brought very near the land, against a good shore, and the horses would not be put to swim above twenty yards. This proved to be so happy for our landing, though we came to it by mere accident, that if we had ordered the whole island round to be sounded, we could not have found a more proper place for it. There was a dead calm all that morning: and in three hours' time all our horse were landed, with as much baggage as was necessary till we got to Exeter. The artillery and heavy baggage were left aboard, and ordered to Topsham, the seaport to Exeter. All that belonged to us was so soon and so happily landed, that, by the next day at noon we were in full march, and marched four miles that night. We had from thence twenty miles to Exeter, and we resolved to make haste thither. But, as we were now happily landed and marching, we saw new and unthought-of characters of a favourable providence of God watching over us. We had no sooner got thus disengaged from our fleet, than a new and great storm blew from the west, from which our fleet, being covered by the land, could receive no prejudice; but the king's fleet had got out as the wind calmed, and, in pursuit of us, was come as far as the Isle of Wight, when this contrary wind turned upon them. They tried what they could to pursue us; but they were so shattered by some days of this storm, that they were forced to go into Portsmouth, and were no more fit for service that year. This was a greater happiness than we were then aware of: for the lord Dartmouth assured me some time after, that whatever stories we had heard and believed, either of officers or seamen, he was confident they would all have fought very heartily. But now, by the immediate hand of Heaven, we were masters of the sea without a blow. I never found a disposition to superstition in my temper: I was rather inclined to be philosophical upon all occasions. Yet I must confess that this strange ordering of the winds and seasons, just to change as our affairs required it, could not but make deep impressions on me, as well as on all that observed it. Those famous verses of Claudian seemed to be more applicable to the prince, than to him they were made on:

Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti!*

Heaven's favourite, for whom the skies do fight,
And all the winds conspire to guide thee right!

The prince made haste to Exeter, where he stayed ten days, both for refreshing his troops and for giving the country time to show their affections. Both the clergy and magistrates of Exeter were very fearful and very backward. The bishop and the dean ran away. And the clergy stood off, though they were sent for and very gently spoken to by the prince. The truth was, the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance had been carried so far, and preached so much, that clergymen either could not all on the sudden get out of that entanglement, into which they had by long thinking and speaking all one way involved themselves, or they were ashamed to make so quick a turn. Yet care was taken to protect them and their houses everywhere: so that no sort of violence nor rudeness was offered to any of them. The prince gave me full authority to do this: and I took so particular a care of it, that we heard of no complaints. The army was kept under such an exact discipline, that everything was paid for where it was demanded; though the soldiers were contented with such moderate entertainment that the people generally asked but little for what they did eat. We stayed a week at Exeter before any of the gentlemen of the country about came in to the prince. Every day some persons of condition came from other parts. The first were the lord Colchester, the eldest son of the earl of Rivers, and the lord Wharton, Mr. Russel, the lord Russel's brother, and the earl of Abington.

The king came down to Salisbury, and sent his troops twenty miles further. Of these, three regiments of horse and dragoons were drawn on by their officers, the lord Cornbury and colonel Langston, on design to come over to the prince. Advice was sent to the prince of this. But because these officers were not sure of their subalterns, the prince ordered a body of his men to advance and assist them in case any resistance was made. They were within twenty miles of Exeter, and within two miles of the body that the prince had sent to join them, when a whisper ran about among them that they were betrayed. Lord Cornbury had not the presence of mind that so critical a thing required*. So they fell in confusion, and many rode back. Yet one regiment came over in a body, and with them about a hundred of the other two. This gave us great courage, and showed us that we had not been deceived in what was told us of the inclinations of the king's army. Yet, on the other hand, those who studied to support the king's spirits by flatteries told him that in this he saw he might trust his army, since those who intended to carry over those regiments were forced to manage it with so much artifice, and durst not discover their design either to officers or soldiers; and that, as soon as they perceived it, the greater part of them had turned back. The king wanted support, for his spirits sunk extremely. His blood was in such fermentation, that he was bleeding much at the nose, which returned often upon him every day†. He sent many spies over to us. They all took his money, and came and joined themselves to the prince, none of them returning to him. So that he had no intelligence brought him of what the prince was doing but what common reports furnished, which magnified our numbers, and made him think we were coming near him, while we were still at Exeter. He heard that the city of London was very unquiet. News was brought him that the earls of Devonshire and Danby, and the lord Lumley, were drawing great bodies together, and that both York and Newcastle had declared for the prince. The lord Delamere had raised a regiment in Cheshire. And the body of the nation did everywhere discover their inclinations for the prince so evidently, that the king saw he had nothing to trust to but his army. And the ill disposition among them was so apparent, that he reckoned he could not depend on them. So that he lost both heart and head at once. But that which gave him the last and most confounding stroke was, that the lord Churchill and the duke of Grafton left him, and came and joined the prince at Axminster, twenty miles on that side of Exeter. After this he could not know on whom he could depend. The duke of Grafton was one of king Charles's sons, by the duchess of Cleveland. He had been some time at sea, and was a gallant but rough man. He had more spirit than any one of the king's sons. He made an answer to the king about this time that was much talked of. The king took notice of somewhat in his behaviour that looked factious; and he said he was sure he could not pretend to act upon principles of conscience; for he had been so ill bred that as he knew little of religion so he regarded it less. But he answered the king, that though he had little conscience, yet he was of a party that had a great deal. Soon after that, prince George, the duke of Ormond, and the lord Drumlanrig, the duke of Queensberry's eldest son, left him, and came over to the prince, and joined him, when he was come as far as the earl of Bristol's house, at Sherburn. When the news came to London, the princess was so struck with the apprehensions of the king's displeasure, and of the ill effects that it might have, that she said to the lady Churchill that she could not bear the thoughts of it, and would leap out at window rather than venture on it. The bishop of London was then lodged very secretly in Suffolk Street. So the lady Churchill, who knew where he was, went to him, and concerted with him the method of the princess's withdrawing from the court. The princess went sooner to bed than ordinary. And about midnight she went down a back-stairs from her closet, attended only by the lady Churchill, in such haste that they carried nothing with them.

* This was the eldest son of the earl of Clarendon. His father's sorrow at this defection is touchingly expressed in his "Diary." He immediately had an audience of James the Second, who received him kindly.—Clarendon Correspondence.

† This is mentioned in the Clarendon Correspondence, ii. 206. He was relieved by the lancet four times the same week.—Sir Patrick Hume's Diary; Rose's Observations in Fox's History of James the Second.

They were waited for by the bishop of London, who carried them to the earl of Dorset's, whose lady furnished them with everything. And so they went northward, as far as Northampton, where that earl attended on them with all respect, and quickly brought a body of horse to serve for a guard to the princess. And in a little while a small army was formed about her, who chose to be commanded by the bishop of London: of which he too easily accepted*.

These things put the king in an inexpressible confusion. He saw himself now forsaken, not only by those whom he had trusted and favoured most, but even by his own children. And the army was in such distraction that there was not any one body that seemed entirely united and firm to him. A foolish ballad was made at that time, treating the papists, and chiefly the Irish, in a very ridiculous manner, which had a burden said to be Irish words, "lero lero lilibulero," that made an impression on the army that cannot be well imagined by those who saw it not. The whole army, and at last all people both in city and country, were singing it perpetually. And perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an effect.

While the prince stayed at Exeter, the rabble of the people came in to him in great numbers. So that he could have raised many regiments of foot if there had been any occasion for them. But what he understood of the temper the king's army was in, made him judge it was not necessary to arm greater numbers. After he had stayed eight days at Exeter, Seymour came in with several other gentlemen of quality and estate. As soon as he had been with the prince, he sent to seek for me. When I came to him, he asked me why we had not an association signed by all that came to us, since, till we had that done, we were as a rope of sand: men might leave us when they pleased, and we had them under no tie: whereas, if they signed an association, they would reckon themselves bound to stick to us. I answered, it was because we had not a man of his authority and credit to offer and support such an advice. I went from him to the prince, who approved of the motion; as did also the earl of Shrewsbury, and all that were with us. So I was ordered to draw it. It was, in few words, an engagement to stick together in pursuing the ends of the prince's declaration; and that, if any attempt should be made on his person, it should be revenged on all by whom, or from whom, any such attempt should be made. This was agreed to by all about the prince. So it was engrossed in parchment, and signed by all those that came in to him. The prince put Devonshire and Exeter under Seymour's government, who was recorder of Exeter. And he advanced with his army, leaving a small garrison there with his heavy artillery under colonel Gibson, whom he made deputy-governor as to the military part.

At Crookhorn, Dr. Finch, son of the earl of Winchelsea, and warden of All-Souls college in Oxford, was sent to the prince from some of the heads of colleges, assuring him that they would declare for him, and inviting him to come thither, telling him that their plate should be at his service, if he needed it. This was a sudden turn from those principles that they

* The princess Anne left the Cockpit, where she then lodged, on the night of November the 25th. The earl of Clarendon says that he heard the rumour next morning, and the report was that some one had carried her away, nobody knew whither. The duchess of Marlborough (then lady Churchill) managed the escape for her; and the narrative she has given coincides closely with that given by Burnet. After stating the preliminary arrangements she made with the bishop of London, she adds, "The princess went to bed at the usual time, to prevent suspicion. I came to her soon after, and, by the back stairs which went down from her closet, her royal highness, lady Fitzharding, and I, with one servant, walked to the coach, where we found the bishop and the earl of Dorset. They conducted us that night to the bishop's house in the City, and the next day to my lord Dorset's, at Copt Hall. From thence we went to the earl of Northampton's, and from thence to Nottingham, where the country gathered round the princess; nor did she think herself safe till she saw that she was surrounded by the prince of Orange's friends."—(Account of the Duchess of Marlborough; Clarendon Correspondence; Colley Cibber's Apology for his Life; Dalrymple's Memoirs.) Prince George, the duke of Ormond, lord Drumlanrig, and Mr. H. Boyle, had deserted James at Andover, on the 24th. They had supped with the king the same evening, and left his quarters as soon as he had retired to bed. Prince George left a letter for James (see this in Kennet's Hist. of England), excusing himself, and blaming this unhappy monarch. When the prince heard of any one's defection from the king, he had been accustomed to exclaim, "Est-il possible?" The only remark James made upon the prince's desertion was, "Is Est-il possible gone too?" In king James's "Memoirs" it is said, "he was more troubled at the unnaturalness of the action than the want of his service; for the loss of a good trooper would have been of more consequence." But on the monarch's return to London, and finding his daughter had also fled, he burst into tears, emphatically saying, "God help me! my own children have forsaken me."—Clarendon Correspondence, ii. 208.

had carried so high a few years before. The prince had designed to have secured Bristol and Gloucester, and so to have gone to Oxford, the whole west being then in his hands, if there had been any appearance of a stand to be made against him by the king and his army; for, the king being so much superior to him in horse, it was not advisable to march through the great plains of Dorsetshire and Wiltshire. But the king's precipitate return to London put an end to this precaution. The earl of Bath had prevailed with the garrison of Plymouth, and they declared for the prince. So now all behind him was safe. When he came to Sherburn, all Dorsetshire came in a body and joined him. He resolved to make all the haste he could to London, where things were in a high fermentation.

A bold man ventured to draw and publish another declaration in the prince's name. It was penned with great spirit: and it had as great an effect. It set forth the desperate designs of the papists, and the extreme danger the nation was in by their means, and required all persons immediately to fall on such papists as were in any employments, and to turn them out, and to secure all strong places, and to do everything else that was in their power in order to execute the laws, and to bring all things again into their proper channels. This set all men at work: for no doubt was made that it was truly the prince's declaration. But he knew nothing of it. And it was never known who was the author of so bold a thing. No person ever claimed the merit of it: for though it had an amazing effect, yet, it seems, he that contrived it apprehended that the prince would not be well pleased with the author of such an imposture in his name. The king was under such a consternation, that he neither knew what to resolve on, nor whom to trust. This pretended declaration put the City in such a flame, that it was carried to the lord mayor, and he was required to execute it. The apprentices got together, and were falling upon all mass-houses, and committing many irregular things. Yet their fury was so well governed, and so little resisted, that no other mischief was done; no blood was shed.

The king now sent for all the lords in town, that were known to be firm protestants. And, upon speaking to some of them in private, they advised him to call a general meeting of all the privy councillors and peers, to ask their advice what was fit to be done. All agreed in one opinion that it was fit to send commissioners to the prince to treat with him. This went much against the king's own inclinations: yet the dejection he was in, and the desperate state of his affairs, forced him to consent to it. So the marquis of Halifax, the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Godolphin, were ordered to go to the prince, and to ask him what it was that he demanded. The earl of Clarendon reflected the most, on the king's former conduct, of any in that assembly, not without some indecent and insolent words, which were generally condemned. He expected, as was said, to be one of the commissioners, and upon his not being named he came and met the prince near Salisbury. Yet he suggested so many peevish and peculiar things when he came, that some suspected all this was but collusion, and that he was sent to raise a faction among those that were about the prince. The lords sent to the prince to know where they should wait on him, and he named Hungerford. When they came thither and had delivered their message, the prince called all the peers and others of chief note about him, and advised with them what answers should be made. A day was taken to consider of an answer. The marquis of Halifax sent for me. But the

* At this meeting (November 27th), the lord chancellor Jeffreys, Godolphin, Falconberg, &c. recommended the calling a parliament. Lord Clarendon, in his "Diary," says, "I spake with great freedom, laying open most of the late miscarriages, and particularly the raising a regiment of Roman catholics at this very time under the command of the earl of Stafford, to be a guard to the king's person; into which all the French tradesmen in town of that religion were received, and none were to be admitted but papists. I pressed this so earnestly, that the king called out and said it was not true; there were no directions for admitting none but papists; but I went on, saying I had been so informed, &c. My motion was for a parliament, and sending commissioners to treat with the prince of Orange." Lords Halifax and Nottingham supported these propositions, but more mildly. In conclusion, the king said, "My lords, I have heard you all: you have spoken with great freedom, and I do not take it ill of any of you. I may tell you I will call a parliament; but for the other things you propose, they are of great importance, and you will not wonder that I take one night's time to consider of them." Lord Godolphin prevented any of the popish peers being present at this council. The king complained much of the defection of his army, yet thought many would adhere to him. He said he considered the bleeding at his nose a great providence; for, if it had not occurred on the day he intended to review the troops at Westminster, he believed, on good reasons, that lord Churchill had intended to deliver him up to the prince of Orange. This is supported by many statements in Macpherson's "Original Papers," i. 280.—Clarendon Correspondence.

prince said, though he would suspect nothing from our meeting, others might. So I did not speak with him in private, but in the hearing of others. Yet he took occasion to ask me, so as nobody observed it, "If we had a mind to have the king in our hands?" I said, "By no means; for we would not hurt his person." He asked next, "What if he had a mind to go away?" I said, "Nothing was so much to be wished for." This I told the prince. And he approved of both my answers. The prince ordered the earls of Oxford, Shrewsbury, and Clarendon, to treat with the lords the king had sent. And they delivered the prince's answer to them on Sunday the eighth of December*.

He desired a parliament might be presently called, that no men should continue in any employment who were not qualified by law, and had not taken the tests; that the Tower of London might be put in the keeping of the City; that the fleet, and all the strong places of the kingdom, might be put in the hands of protestants; that a proportion of the revenue might be set off for the pay of the prince's army; and that during the sitting of the parliament, the armies of both sides might not come within twenty miles of London; but, that the prince might come on to London, and have the same number of his guards about him that the king kept about his person. The lords seemed to be very well satisfied with this answer. They sent it up by an express, and went back next day to London.

But now strange counsels were suggested to the king and queen. The priests, and all the violent papists, saw a treaty was now opened. They knew that they must be the sacrifice. The whole design of popery must be given up, without any hope of being able in an age to think of bringing it on again. Severe laws would be made against them. And all those who intended to stick to the king, and to preserve him, would go into those laws with a particular zeal: so that they, and their hopes, must be now given up and sacrificed for ever. They infused all this into the queen. They said she would certainly be impeached, and witnesses would be set up against her and her son: the king's mother had been impeached in the long parliament: and she was to look for nothing but violence. So the queen took up a sudden resolution of going to France with the child. The midwife, together with all who were assisting at the birth, were also carried over, or so disposed of, that it could never be learned what became of them afterwards. The queen prevailed with the king, not only to consent to this, but to promise to go quickly after her. He was only to stay a day or two after her, in hope that the shadow of authority that was still left in him might keep things so quiet, that she might have an undisturbed passage. So she went to Portsmouth. And from thence, in a man of war, she went over to France: the king resolving to follow her in disguise. Care was also taken to send all the priests away. The king stayed long enough to get the prince's answer†. And when he had read it, he said he did not expect so good terms. He ordered the lord chancellor to come to him next morning. But he had called secretly for the great seal. And the next morning, being the tenth of December, about three in the morning, he went away in disguise with sir Edward Hales, whose servant he seemed to be. They passed the river, and flung the great seal into it; which was some months after found by a fisherman, near Fox Hall‡. The king went down to a miserable fisher-boat that Hales had provided for carrying them over to France.

Thus a great king, who had a good army and a strong fleet, did choose rather to abandon

* The time of this nobleman's going over to the prince of Orange, his interview with the latter, &c. are very interestingly told by him in his "Diary."—Clarendon Correspondence.

† The despatches of the French ambassador, M. Barillon, confirm the statements made by Burnet. He says, that James only consented to send commissioners to the prince, because, by so doing, time would be gained to enable the queen and himself to prepare for their flight.—Mazure's Histoire de la Révolution.

‡ Whether the great seal was found as stated by Burnet, seems very doubtful. Barillon says, that father Peters, who left a day or two before the king, had taken precautions to have the great seal at his command, that he might take it with him. Barillon's words are—"Son intention en cela est d'avoir auprès de lui le grand sceau, pour l'emporter au besoin. Par les loix d'Angleterre on ne peut rien faire sans le grand sceau; et avec le grand sceau, le roi peut empêcher beaucoup de choses que ses ennemis voudroient faire. On croit par ce moyen jeter du trouble et de la division dans le gouvernement qu'il faudra établir."—(Mazure's Hist. de la Révolution, iii. 220.) At all events the chancellor, Jeffreys, did not throw it into the river; for James, in conversation with Barillon, said, "The meeting of a parliament cannot be authorised without writs under the great seal, and they have been issued for fifteen counties only; the others are burned; the great seal is missing; the chancellor had placed it in my hands eight days before I went away. They cannot make another without me."—Ibid.

all, than either to expose himself to any danger with that part of the army that was still firm to him, or to stay and see the issue of a parliament. Some attributed this mean and unaccountable resolution to a want of courage. Others thought it was the effect of an ill conscience, and of some black thing under which he could not now support himself. And they who censured it the most moderately, said that it showed that his priests had more regard to themselves than to him; and that he considered their interest more than his own; and that he chose rather to wander abroad with them, and to try what he could do by a French force to subdue his people, than to stay at home, and be shut up within the bounds of law, and be brought under an incapacity of doing more mischief; which they saw was necessary to quiet those fears and jealousies, for which his bad government had given so much occasion. It seemed very unaccountable, since he was resolved to go, that he did not choose rather to go in one of his yachts, or frigates, than to expose himself in so dangerous and ignominious a manner. It was not possible to put a good construction on any part of the dishonourable scene which he then acted.

With this his reign ended: for this was a plain deserting his people, and the exposing the nation to the pillage of an army, which he had ordered the earl of Feversham to disband. And the doing this without paying them, was the letting so many armed men loose upon the nation: who might have done much mischief, if the execution of those orders that he left behind him had not been stopped. I shall continue the recital of all that passed in this interregnum, till the throne, which he now left empty, was filled.

He was not gone far, when some fishermen of Feversham, who were watching for such priests, and other delinquents, as they fancied were making their escape, came up to him. And they, knowing sir Edward Hales, took both the king and him, and brought them to Feversham. The king told them who he was. And that flying about brought a vast crowd together, to look on that astonishing instance of the uncertainty of all worldly greatness; when he who had ruled three kingdoms, and might have been the arbiter of all Europe, was now in such mean hands, and so low an equipage. The people of the town were extremely disordered with this unlooked-for accident; and, though for a while they kept him as a prisoner, yet they quickly changed that into as much respect as they could possibly pay him. Here was an accident that seemed of no great consequence; yet all the strugglings which that party have made ever since that time to this day, which from him were called afterwards the Jacobites, did rise out of this: for, if he had got clear away, by all that could be judged, he would not have had a party left: all would have agreed, that here was a desertion, and that therefore the nation was free, and at liberty to secure itself. But what followed upon this gave them a colour to say, that he was forced away, and driven out. Till now, he scarce had a party, but among the papists: but from this incident a party grew up, that has been long very active for his interests. As soon as it was known at London that the king was gone, the apprentices and the rabble, who had been a little quieted when they saw a treaty on foot between the king and the prince, now broke out again upon all suspected houses, where they believed there were either priests, or papists. They made great havoc of many places, not sparing the houses of ambassadors: but none were killed, no houses burnt, nor were any robberies committed. Never was so much fury seen under so much management. Jeffreys, finding the king was gone, saw what reason he had to look to himself; and, apprehending that he was now exposed to the rage of the people, whom he had provoked with so particular a brutality, he had disguised himself to make his escape. But he fell into the hands of some who knew him. He was insulted by them with as much scorn, and rudeness as they could invent. And, after many hours' tossing him about, he was carried to the lord mayor, whom they charged to commit him to the Tower, which the lord Lucas had then seized, and in it had declared for the prince. The lord mayor was so struck with the terror of this rude populace, and with the disgrace of a man who had made all people tremble before him, that he fell into fits upon it, of which he died soon after.

To prevent the further growth of such disorders, he called a meeting of the privy councillors and peers, who met at Guildhall. The archbishop of Canterbury was there. They gave a strict charge for keeping the peace, and agreed to send an invitation to the prince, desiring him to come and take the government of the nation into his hands, till a parliament should meet to bring all matters to a just and full settlement. This they all signed, and sent it to the prince by the earl of Pembroke, the viscount Weymouth, the bishop of Ely, and the lord Culpepper. The prince went on from Hungerford to Newbury, and from thence to Abington, resolving to have gone to Oxford to receive the compliments of the University, and to meet the princess Anne who was coming thither. At Abington he was surprised with the news of the strange catastrophe of affairs now at London, the king's desertion, and the disorders which the city and neighbourhood of London were falling into. One came from London, and brought him the news, which he knew not well how to believe, till he had an express sent him from the lords, who had been with him from the king. Upon this the prince saw how necessary it was to make all possible haste to London. So he sent to Oxford, to excuse his not coming thither, and to offer the association to them, which was signed by almost all the heads, and the chief men of the university; even by those, who, being disappointed in the preferments they aspired to, became afterwards his most implacable enemies.

Hitherto the expedition had been prosperous, beyond all that could have been expected. There had been but two small engagements, during this unseasonable campaign; one was at Winkington, in Dorsetshire, where an advanced party of the prince's met one of the king's that was thrice their number: yet they drove them before them into a much greater body, where they were overpowered with numbers. Some were killed on both sides; but there were more prisoners taken of the prince's men: yet, though the loss was of his side, the courage that his men shewed in so great an inequality as to number, made us reckon that we gained more than we lost on that occasion. Another action happened at Reading, where the king had a considerable body, who, as some of the prince's men advanced, fell into a great disorder, and ran away. One of the prince's officers was shot: he was a papist; and the prince in consideration of his religion was willing to leave him behind him in Holland; but he very earnestly begged he might come over with his company; and he was the only officer that was killed in the whole expedition.

Upon the news of the king's desertion, it was proposed that the prince should go on with all possible haste to London; but that was not advisable: for the king's army lay so scattered through the road all the way to London, that it was not fit for him to advance faster, than as his troops marched before him; otherwise, any resolute officer might have seized or killed him. Though, if it had not been for that danger, a great deal of mischief, that followed, would have been prevented by his speedy advance: for now began that turn, to which all the difficulties, that did afterwards disorder our affairs, may be justly imputed. Two gentlemen of Kent came to Windsor the morning after the prince came thither; they were addressed to me. And they told me of the accident at Feversham, and desired to know the prince's pleasure upon it. I was affected with this dismal reverse of the fortune of a great prince, more than I think fit to express. I went immediately to Bentinck, and wakened him, and got him to go in to the prince, and let him know what had happened, that some order might be presently given for the security of the king's person, and for taking him out of the hands of a rude multitude, who said they would obey no orders but such as came from the prince. The prince ordered Zuylestein to go immediately to Feversham, and to see the king safe, and at full liberty to go whithersoever he pleased. But, as soon as the news of the king's being at Feversham came to London, all the indignation that people had formerly conceived against him, was turned to pity and compassion. The privy council met upon it. Some moved, that he should be sent for; others said, he was king, and might send for his guards and coaches, as he pleased; but it became not them to send for him. It was left to his general, the earl of Feversham, to do what he thought best. So he went for him with his coaches and guards. And, as he came back through the city, he was welcomed with expressions of joy by great numbers: so slight and unstable a thing is a multitude, and so soon altered. At his coming to Whitehall, he had a great court about him*. Even the papists crept out of their lurking holes, and appeared at court with much assurance. The king himself began to take heart; and both at Feversham, and now at Whitehall, he talked in his ordinary high strain, justifying all he had done; only he spoke a little doubtfully of the business of Magdalen college. But when he came to reflect on the state of his affairs, he saw it was so broken, that nothing was now left to deliberate upon. So he sent the earl of Feversham to Windsor, without demanding any passport; and ordered him to desire the prince to come to St. James's, to consult with him of the best way for settling the nation.

When the news of what had passed at London came to Windsor, the prince thought the privy council had not used him well, who, after they had sent to him to take the government upon him, had made this step without consulting him. Now the scene was altered, and new counsels were to be taken. The prince heard the opinions, not only of those who had come along with him, but of such of the nobility as were now come to him, among whom the marquis of Halifax was one. All agreed that it was not convenient that the king should stay at Whitehall. Neither the king, nor the prince, nor the city, could have been safe, if they had been both near one another. Tumults would probably have arisen out of it. The guards, and the officious flatterers of the two courts, would have been unquiet neighbours. It was thought necessary to stick to the point of the king's deserting his people, and not to give up that, by entering upon any treaty with him. And since the earl of Feversham, who had commanded the army against the prince, was come without a passport, he was for some days put in arrest.

It was a tender point how to dispose of the king's person*. Some proposed rougher methods: the keeping him a prisoner, at least till the nation was settled, and till Ireland was secured. It was thought, his being kept in custody, would be such a tie on all his party, as would oblige them to submit, and be quiet. Ireland was in great danger; and his restraint might oblige the earl of Tyrconnell to deliver up the government, and to disarm the papists, which would preserve that kingdom, and the protestants in it. But, because it might raise too much compassion, and perhaps some disorder, if the king should be kept in restraint within the kingdom, therefore the sending him to Breda was proposed. The earl of Clarendon pressed this vehemently, on the account of the Irish protestants, as the king himself told me: for those that gave their opinions in this matter did it secretly, and in confidence to the prince. The prince said, he could not deny but that this might be good and wise advice; but it was that to which he could not hearken: he was so far satisfied with the grounds of this expedition, that he could act against the king in a fair and open war; but for his person, now that he had him in his power, he could not put such a hardship on him, as to make him a prisoner; and he knew the princess's temper so well, that he was sure she would never bear it: nor did he know what disputes it might raise, or what effect it might have upon the parliament that was to be called. He was firmly resolved never to suffer any thing to be done against his person: he saw it was necessary to send him out of London; and he would order a guard to attend upon him, who should only defend and protect his person, but not restrain him in any sort.

A resolution was taken of sending the lords Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere, to London, who were first to order the English guards that were about the court to be drawn off, and sent to quarters out of town; and, when that was done, the count of Solms with the Dutch guards was to come and take all the posts about the court. This was obeyed without any resistance, or disorder, but not without much murmuring. It was midnight before all was settled; and then these lords sent to the earl of Middleton, to desire him to let the king know, that they had a message to deliver to him from the prince. He went in to the king, and sent them word from him, that they might come with it immediately. They came, and found him a-bed. They told him, the necessity of affairs required, that the prince should come presently to London; and he thought it would conduce to the safety of the king's person, and the quiet of the town, that he should retire to some house out of town: and they proposed Ham. The king seemed much dejected, and asked, if it must be done immediately.

* Barillon, in one of his letters, relates a conversation with the king, showing that he was perfectly aware how much his stay in England would embarrass his enemies.

From this and a statement in sir John Reresby's "Memoirs," it seems rational to conclude that representations were afterwards made which frightened him into flight.

They told him, he might take his rest first; and they added, that he should be attended by a guard, who should only guard his person, but should give him no sort of disturbance. Having said this, they withdrew. The earl of Middleton came quickly after them, and asked them, if it would not do as well, if the king should go to Rochester; for since the prince was not pleased with his coming up from Kent, it might be perhaps acceptable to him, if he should go thither again. It was very visible, that this was proposed in order to a second escape.

They promised to send word immediately to the prince of Orange, who lay that night at Sion, within eight miles of London. He very readily consented to it. And the king went next day to Rochester, having ordered all that which is called the moving wardrobe to be sent before him, the count of Solms ordering every thing to be done, as the king desired. A guard went with him that left him at full liberty, and paid him rather more respect than his own guards had done of late. Most of that body, as it happened, were papists. So when he went to mass, they went in, and assisted very reverently. And, when they were asked, how they could serve in an expedition that was intended to destroy their own religion, one of them answered, "His soul was God's, but his sword was the prince of Orange's." The king was so much delighted with this answer, that he repeated it to all that came about him *. On the same day the prince came to St. James's. It happened to be a very rainy day; and yet great numbers came to see him. But, after they had stood long in the wet, he disappointed them; for, he who neither loved shews nor shoutings, went through the park. And even this trifle helped to set people's spirits on the fret.

The revolution was thus brought about, with the universal applause of the whole nation; only these last steps began to raise a fermentation. It was said, here was an unnatural thing, to waken the king out of his sleep, in his own palace, and to order him to go out of it, when he was ready to submit to every thing. Some said, he was now a prisoner, and remembered the saying of king Charles the First, that the prisons and the graves of princes lay not far distant from one another: the person of the king was now struck at, as well as his government; and this specious undertaking would now appear to be only a disguised, and designed, usurpation. These things began to work on great numbers. And the posting the Dutch guards, where the English guards had been, gave a general disgust to the whole English army. They indeed hated the Dutch besides, on the account of the good order and strict discipline they were kept under; which made them to be as much beloved by the nation, as they were hated by the soldiery. The nation had never known such an inoffensive march of an army; and the peace and order of the suburbs, and the freedom of markets in and about London, was so carefully maintained, that in no time fewer disorders had been committed than were heard of this winter.

None of the papists or jacobites were insulted in any sort. The prince had ordered me, as we came along, to take care of the papists, and to secure them from all violence. When he came to London, he renewed these orders, which I executed with so much zeal and care, that I saw all the complaints that were brought me fully redressed. When we came to London I procured passports for all that desired to go beyond sea. Two of the popish bishops were put in Newgate. I went thither in the prince's name. I told them, the prince would not take upon him yet to give orders about prisoners; as soon as he did that, they should feel the effects of it. But in the mean while I ordered them to be well used, and to be taken care of, and that their friends might be admitted to come to them. So truly did I pursue the principle of moderation, even towards those from whom nothing of that sort was to be expected †.

* Lord Clarendon, in his "Diary" at the date December 18, says, "I was told the three lords came to Whitehall last night after the king was in bed. The English guards being first removed, and the Dutch in possession of their posts, the lords were quickly admitted to the king; and when they had delivered their message, the king told them, he had rather return to Rochester than to Ham; whereupon the lords went back to Sion, and brought the king word by nine this morning, that his majesty might go to Rochester if he pleased; and about eleven the king took a barge and went down the river; Dutch guards being appointed to attend him. Higgon's says, "the very moment" the king left Whitehall, his daughter entered it: this is a misrepresentation; lord Clarendon says they did not come to London until the next day.

† The French ambassador, Barillon, was zealously active in promoting disunion among the English peers; but William put an end to his activity by having him out of England in twenty-four hours. He asked in vain for a delay, and was sent at the appointed time to Dover under a Dutch escort.—Echard's History of the Revolution, 218.

Now that the prince was come, all the bodies about the town came to welcome him. The bishops came the next day : only the archbishop of Canterbury, though he had once agreed to it, yet would not come. The clergy of London came next. The city, and a great many other bodies, came likewise, and expressed a great deal of joy for the deliverance wrought for them by the prince's means. Old serjeant Maynard came with the men of the law. He was then near ninety, and yet he said the liveliest thing that was heard of on that occasion. The prince took notice of his great age, and said, that he believed he had outlived all the men of the law of his time : he answered, " he should have out-lived the law itself, if his highness had not come over."

The first thing to be done after the compliments were over, was to consider how the nation was to be settled. The lawyers were generally of opinion, that the prince ought to declare himself king, as Henry the Seventh had done. This, they said, would put an end to all disputes, which might otherwise grow very perplexing and tedious : and, they said, he might call a parliament which would be a legal assembly, if summoned by the king in fact, though his title was not yet recognized. This was plainly contrary to his declaration, by which the settlement of the nation was referred to a parliament ; such a step would make all that the prince had hitherto done, pass for an aspiring ambition, only to raise himself ; and it would disgust those who had been hitherto the best affected to his designs ; and make them less concerned in the quarrel, if, instead of staying till the nation should offer him the crown, he would assume it as a conquest. These reasons determined the prince against that proposition. He called all the peers, and the members of the three last parliaments, that were in town, together with some of the citizens of London. When these met, it was told them, that, in the present distraction, the prince desired their advice about the best methods of settling the nation. It was agreed in both these houses, such as they were, to make an address to the prince, desiring him to take the administration of the government into his hands in the interim. The next proposition passed not so unanimously ; for, it being moved, that the prince should be likewise desired to write missive letters to the same effect, and for the same persons to whom writs were issued out for calling a parliament, that so there might be an assembly of men in the form of a parliament, though without writs under the great seal, such as that was that had called home king Charles the Second : the earl of Nottingham objected to this, that such a convention of the States could be no legal assembly, unless summoned by the king's writ. Therefore he moved, that an address might be made to the king, to order the writs to be issued out. Few were of his mind. The matter was carried the other way ; and orders were given for those letters to be sent round the nation.

The king continued a week at Rochester. And both he himself, and every body else, saw that he was at full liberty, and that the guard about him put him under no sort of restraint. Many that were zealous for his interests went to him, and pressed him to stay, and to see the issue of things : a party would appear for him ; good terms would be got for him ; and things would be brought to a reasonable agreement. He was much distracted between his own inclinations, and the importunities of his friends. The queen, hearing what had happened, wrote a most vehement letter to him, pressing his coming over, remembering him of his promise, which she charged on him in a very earnest, if not in an imperious strain. This letter was intercepted. I had an account of it from one that read it. The prince ordered it to be conveyed to the king ; and that determined him. So he gave secret orders to prepare a vessel for him ; and drew a paper, which he left on his table *, reproaching the nation for their forsaking him. He declared, that though he was going to seek for foreign aid, to restore him to his throne, yet he would not make use of it to overthrow either the religion established, or the laws of the land. And so he left Rochester very secretly, on the last day of this memorable year, and got safe over to France.

But, before I enter into the next year, I will give some account of the affairs of Scotland. There was no force left there, but a very small one, scarcely able to defend the castle of Edinburgh, of which the duke of Gordon was governor. He was a papist ; but had neither the spirit, nor the courage, which such a post required at that time. As soon as the news came to Scotland of the king's desertion, the rabble got together there, as they had done in London. They broke into all popish chapels, and into the church of Holy Rood House, which had been adorned at a great charge to be a royal chapel, particularly for the order of St. Andrew and the Thistle, which the king had resolved to set up in Scotland in imitation of the order of the garter in England. They defaced it quite, and seized on some that were thought great delinquents, in particular on the earl of Perth, who had disguised himself, and had got aboard a small vessel: but he was seized on, and put in prison. The whole kingdom, except only the castle of Edinburgh, declared for the prince, and received his declaration for that kingdom with great joy. This was done in the north very unanimously, by the episcopal, as well as by the presbyterian party. But in the western counties, the presbyterians, who had suffered much in a course of many years, thought that the time was now come, not only to procure themselves ease and liberty, but to revenge themselves upon others. They generally broke in upon the episcopal clergy with great insolence and much cruelty. They carried them about the parishes in a mock procession: they tore their gowns, and drove them from their churches and houses. Nor did they treat those of them, who had appeared very zealously against popery, with any distinction. The bishops of that kingdom had written a very indecent letter to the king, upon the news of the prince's being blown back by the storm, full of injurious expressions towards the prince, expressing their abhorrence of his design: and, in conclusion, they wished that the king might have the necks of his enemies. This was sent up as a pattern to the English bishops, and was printed in the Gazette. But they did not think fit to copy after it in England. The episcopal party in Scotland saw themselves under a great cloud; so they resolved all to adhere to the earl of Dundee, who had served some years in Holland, and was both an able officer, and a man of good parts, and of some very valuable virtues; but, as he was proud and ambitious, so he had taken up a most violent hatred of the whole presbyterian party, and had executed all the severest orders against them with great rigour; even to the shooting many on the highway, that refused the oath required of them. The presbyterians looked on him as their most implacable enemy; and the episcopal party trusted most entirely to him. Upon the prince's coming to London, the duke of Hamilton called a meeting of all the men of quality of the Scotch nation then in town; and these made an address to the prince with relation to Scotland, almost in the same terms in which the English address was conceived. And now the administration of the government of the whole isle of Britain was put in the prince's hands.

The prospect from Ireland was more dreadful. Tyrconnell gave out new commissions for levying thirty thousand men. And reports were spread about that island, that a general massacre of the protestants was fixed to be in November. Upon which the protestants began to run together for their common defence, both in Munster and in Ulster. They had no great strength in Munster. They had been disarmed, and had no store of ammunition for the few arms that were left them. So they despaired of being able to defend themselves, and came over to England in great numbers, and full of dismal apprehensions for those they had left behind them. They moved earnestly, that a speedy assistance might be sent to them. In Ulster the protestants had more strength; but they wanted a head. The lords of Grenard and Mountjoy, who were the chief military men among them, in whom they confided most, kept still such measures with Tyrconnell, that they would not take the conduct of them. Two towns, that had both very little defence about them, and a very small store of provisions within them, were by the rashness, or boldness, of some brave young men secured: so that they refused to receive a popish garrison, or to submit to Tyrconnell's orders. These were Londonderry, and Inniskilling. Both of them were advantageously situated. Tyrconnell sent troops into the north to reduce the country. Upon which great numbers fled into those places, and brought in provisions to them. And so they resolved to defend themselves, with a firmness of courage that cannot be enough admired; for when they were abandoned, both by the gentry and the military men, those two small unfurnished and unfortified places, resolved to stand to their own defence, and at all perils to stay till supplies should come to them from England. I will not enlarge more upon the affairs of that kingdom; both because I had no occasion to be well informed of them, and because Dr. King, now archbishop of Dublin, wrote a copious history of the government of Ireland during this reign, which is so well received, and so universally acknowledged to be as truly as it is finely written, that I refer my reader to the account of those matters, which is fully and faithfully given by that learned and zealous prelate *.

And now I enter upon the year 1689: in which the two first things to be considered, before the convention could be brought together, were, the settling the English army, and the affairs of Ireland. As for the army, some of the bodics, those chiefly that were full of papists, and of men ill affected, were to be broken. And, in order to that, a loan was set on foot in the city, for raising the money that was to pay their arrears at their disbanding, and for carrying on the pay of the English and Dutch armies till the convention should meet, and settle the nation. This was the great distinction of those who were well affected to the prince: for, whereas those who were ill affected to him refused to join in the loan, pretending there was no certainty of their being repaid; the others did not doubt but the convention would pay all that was advanced in so great an exigence; and so they subscribed liberally, as the occasion required.

As for the affairs of Ireland, there was a great variety of opinions among them. Some thought that Ireland would certainly follow the fate of England. This was managed by an artifice of Tyrconnell's, who, what by deceiving, what by threatening the most eminent protestants in Dublin, got them to write over to London, and give assurances that he would deliver up Ireland, if he might have good terms for himself, and for the Irish. The earl of Clarendon was much depended on by the protestants of Ireland, who made all their applications to the prince by him. Those, who were employed by Tyrconnell to deceive the prince, made their applications by sir William Temple, who had a long and well-established credit with him. They said, Tyrconnell would never lay down the government of Ireland, unless he was sure that the earl of Clarendon was not to succeed: he knew his peevishness and spite, and that he would take severe revenges for what injuries he thought had been done to himself, if he had them in his power; and therefore he would not treat till he was assured of that. Upon this the prince did avoid the speaking to the earl of Clarendon of those matters. And then he, who had possessed himself in his expectation of that post, seeing the prince thus shut him out of the hopes of it, became a most violent opposer of the new settlement. He reconciled himself to king James; and has been, ever since, one of the hottest promoters of his interest of any in the nation. Temple entered into a management with Tyrconnell's agents, who, it is very probable, if things had not taken a great turn in England, would have come to a composition. Others thought that the leaving Ireland in that dangerous state, might be a mean to bring the convention to a more speedy settlement of England; and that therefore the prince ought not to make too much haste to relieve Ireland. This advice was generally believed to be given by the marquis of Halifax; and it was like him. The prince did not seem to apprehend enough the consequences of the revolt of Ireland; and was much blamed for his slowness in not preventing it in time.

The truth was, he did not know whom to trust. A general discontent, next to mutiny, began to spread itself through the whole English army. The turn that they were now making from him was almost as quick as that which they had made to him. He could not trust them. Probably, if he had sent any of them over, they would have joined with Tyrconnell. Nor could he well send over any of his Dutch troops. It was to them that he chiefly trusted for maintaining the quiet of England. Probably the English army would have become more insolent, if the Dutch force had been considerably diminished; and the king's magazines were so exhausted, that till new stores were provided, there was very little ammunition to spare. The raising new troops was a work of time. There was no ship of war in those seas, to secure the transport. And to send a small company of officers with some ammunition, which was all that could be done on the sudden, seemed to be an exposing them to the enemy. These considerations made him more easy to entertain a proposition that was made to him, as was believed, by the Temples; (for sir William had both a brother and a son that made then a considerable figure;) which was, to send over lieutenant-general Hamilton, one of the officers that belonged to Ireland. He was a papist, but was believed to be a man of honour; and he had certainly great credit with the earl of Tyrconnell. He had served in France with great reputation, and had a great interest in all the Irish, and was now in the prince's hands; and had been together with a body of Irish soldiers, whom the prince kept for some time as prisoners in the Isle of Wight; whom he gave afterwards to the emperor, though, as they passed through Germany, they deserted in great numbers, and got into France. Hamilton was a sort of prisoner of war. So he undertook to go over to Ireland, and to prevail with the earl of Tyrconnell to deliver up the government; and promised, that he would either bring him to it, or that he would come back, and give an account of his negotiation. This step had a very ill effect; for before Hamilton came to Dublin, the earl of Tyrconnell was in such despair, looking on all as lost, that he seemed to be very near a full resolution of entering on a treaty, to get the best terms that he could. But Hamilton's coming changed him quite. He represented to him, that things were turning fast in England in favour of the king; so that, if he stood firm, all would come round again. He saw that he must study to manage this so dextrously, as to gain as much time as he could, that so the prince might not make too much haste before a fleet and supplies might come from France. So several letters were written over by the same management, giving assurances that the earl of Tyrconnell was fully resolved to treat and submit. And, to carry this further, two commissioners were sent from the council-board to France. The one was a zealous protestant, the other was a papist. Their instructions were, to represent to the king the necessity of Ireland's submitting to England. The earl of Tyrconnell pretended, that in honour he could do no less than disengage himself to his master before he laid down the government. Yet he seemed resolved not to stay for an answer, or a consent; but that as soon as this message was delivered, he would submit upon good conditions: and for these, he knew, he would have all that he asked. With this management he gained his point, which was much time. And he now fancied, that the honour of restoring the king would belong chiefly to himself. Thus Hamilton, by breaking his own faith, secured the earl of Tyrconnell to the king; and this gave the beginning to the war of Ireland. Mountjoy, the protestant lord that was sent to France, instead of being heard to deliver his message, was clapped up in the Bastille; which, since he was sent in the name of a kingdom, was thought a very dishonourable thing, and contrary to the law of nations. Those who had advised the sending over Hamilton were now much out of countenance; and the earl of Clarendon was a loud declaimer against it. It was believed, that it had a terrible effect on sir William Temple's son, who had raised in the prince a high opinion of Hamilton's honour. Soon after that, he, who had no other visible cause of melancholy besides this, went in a boat on the Thames, near the bridge, where the river runs most impetuously, and leaped into the river and was drowned*.

The sitting of the convention was now very near. And all men were forming their schemes, and fortifying their party all they could. The elections were managed fairly all England over. The prince did in no sort interpose in any recommendation, directly or indirectly. Three parties were formed about the town: the one was for calling back the king, and treating with him for such securities to our religion and laws, as might put them out of the danger for the future of a dispensing or arbitrary power. These were all of the high church party, who had carried the point of submission and non-resistance so far, that they thought nothing less than this could consist with their duty and their oaths. When it was objected to them, that, according to those notions that they had been possessed with, they ought to be for calling the king back without conditions: when he came, they might indeed offer him their petitions, which he might grant or reject as he pleased; but that the offering him conditions before he was recalled, was contrary to their former doctrine of unconditional allegiance. They were at such a stand upon this objection, that it was plain, they spoke of conditions, either in compliance with the humour of the nation; or that, with relation to their particular interest, nature was so strong in them, that it was too hard for their principle.

* Sir John Reresby says that Mr. Temple was well married, steady, and accomplished. He had lately been appointed secretary of war by king William. When he drowned himself, he left a note in the boat to this effect: "My folly in undertaking what I could not perform, whereby some misfortunes have befallen the king's service, is the cause of my putting myself to this sudden end; I wish him success in all his undertakings, and a better servant."—Reresby's Memoirs and Clarendon Correspondence.

When this notion was tossed and talked of about the town, so few went into it, that the party which supported it went over to the scheme of a second party : which was, that king James had, by his ill administration of the government, brought himself into an incapacity of holding the exercise of the sovereign authority any more in his own hand ; but, as in the case of lunatics, the right still remained in him : only the guardianship, or the exercise, of it was to be lodged with a prince regent : so that the right of sovereignty should be owned to remain still in the king, and that the exercise of it should be vested in the prince of Orange, as prince regent. A third party was for setting king James quite aside, and for setting the prince on the throne.

When the convention was opened on the twenty-fourth of January, the archbishop came not to take his place among them. He resolved neither to act for, nor against, the king's interest ; which, considering his high post, was thought very unbecoming. For if he thought, as by his behaviour afterwards it seems he did, that the nation was running into treason, rebellion, and perjury, it was a strange thing to see one, who was at the head of the church, sit silent all the while that this was in debate, and not once so much as declare his opinion by speaking, voting, or protesting, not to mention the other ecclesiastical methods that certainly became his character. But he was a poor spirited and fearful man, and acted a very mean part in all this great transaction. The bishops' bench was very full, as were also the benches of the temporal lords. The earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rochester, were the men that managed the debates in favour of a regent, in opposition to those who were for setting up another king.

They thought this would save the nation, and yet secure the honour of the church of England and the sacredness of the crown. It was urged that if, upon any pretence whatsoever, the nation might throw off their king, then the crown must become precarious, and the power of judging the king must be in the people. This must end in a commonwealth. A great deal was brought from both the laws and history of England to prove that, not only the person, but the authority, of the king was sacred. The law had indeed provided a remedy of a regency for the infancy of our kings. So, if a king should fall into such errors in his conduct, as showed that he was as little capable of holding the government as an infant was, then the estates of the kingdom might, upon this parity of the case, seek to the remedy provided for an infant, and lodge the power with a regent. But the right was to remain, and to go on in a lineal succession : for, if that was once put ever so little out of its order, the crown would in a little time become elective ; which might rend the nation in pieces by a diversity of elections, and by the different factions that would adhere to the person whom they had elected. They did not deny but that great objections lay against the methods that they proposed. But affairs were brought into so desperate a state by king James's conduct, that it was not possible to propose a remedy that might not be justly excepted to. But they thought their expedient would take in the greatest, as well as the best, part of the nation : whereas all other expedients gratified a republican party, composed of the dissenters, and of men of no religion, who hoped now to see the church ruined, and the government set upon such a bottom, as that we should have only a titular king : who, as he had his power from the people, so should be accountable to them for the exercise of it, and should forfeit it at their pleasure. The much greater part of the house of lords was for this, and stuck long to it ; and so was about a third part of the house of commons. The greatest part of the clergy declared themselves for it.

But of those who agreed in this expedient it was visible there were two different parties. Some intended to bring king James back, and went into this as the most probable way for laying the nation asleep, and for overcoming the present aversion that all people had to him. That being once done, they reckoned it would be no hard thing, with the help of some time, to compass the other. Others seemed to mean more sincerely. They said they could not vote nor argue, but according to their own principles, as long as the matter was yet entire ; but they owned that they had taken up another principle, both from the law and from the history of England : which was, that they would obey and pay allegiance to the king for the time being. They thought a king thus de facto had a right to their obedience, and that they were bound to adhere to him, and to defend him, even in opposition to him with whom they thought the right did still remain. The earl of Nottingham was the person that owned this doctrine the most during these debates. He said to myself, that though he could not argue, nor vote, but according to the scheme and principles he had concerning our laws and constitution, yet he should not be sorry to see his side out-voted ; and that, though he could not agree to the making a king as things stood, yet if he found one made he would be more faithful to him, than those that made him could be, according to their own principles.

The third party was made up of those who thought that there was an original contract between the kings and the people of England : by which the kings were bound to defend their people, and to govern them according to law ; in lieu of which the people were bound to obey and serve the king. The proof of this appeared in the ancient forms of coronations still observed : by which the people were asked if they would have that person before them to be their king ; and, upon their shouts of consent, the coronation was gone about. But, before the king was crowned, he was asked if he would not defend and protect his people, and govern them according to law : and, upon his promising and swearing this, he was crowned ; and then homage was done him. And, though of late the coronation has been considered rather as a solemn instalment, than that which gave the king his authority, so that it was become a maxim in law that the king never died, and that the new king was crowned in the right of his succession, yet these forms, that were still continued, showed what the government was originally. Many things were brought to support this from the British and Saxon times. It was urged that William the Conqueror was received upon his promising to keep the laws of Edward the Confessor, which was plainly the original contract between him and the nation. This was often renewed by his successors. Edward the Second and Richard the Second were deposed for breaking these laws ; and these depositions were still good in law, since they were not reversed, nor was the right of deposing them ever renounced or disowned. Many things were alleged, from what had passed during the barons' wars, for confirming all this. Upon which I will add one particular circumstance, that the original of king John's magna charta, with his great seal to it, was then given to me by a gentleman that found it among his father's papers, but did not know how he came by it : and it is still in my hands. It was said in this argument, what did all the limitations of the regal power signify, if upon a king's breaking through them all the people had not a right to maintain their laws and to preserve their constitution ? It was indeed confessed that this might have ill consequences, and might be carried too far. But the denying this right in any case whatsoever, did plainly destroy all liberty, and establish tyranny. The present alteration proposed would be no precedent but to the like case. And it was fit that a precedent should be made for such occasions, if those of Edward the Second and Richard the Second were not acknowledged to be good ones. It was said that if king James had only broken some laws, and done some illegal acts, it might be justly urged, that it was not reasonable on account of these to carry severities too far. But he had broken through the laws in many public and avowed instances : he had set up an open treaty with Rome : he had shaken the whole settlement of Ireland, and had put that island, and the English and protestants that were there, in the power of the Irish : the dispensing power took away not only those laws to which it was applied, but all other laws whatsoever by the precedent it had set, and by the consequences that followed upon it : by the ecclesiastical commission he had invaded the liberty of the church, and subjected the clergy to mere will and pleasure : and all was concluded by his deserting his people, and flying to a foreign power, rather than stay and submit to the determinations of a free parliament. Upon all which it was inferred, that he had abdicated the government, and had left the throne vacant : which therefore ought now to be filled, that so the nation might be preserved, and the regal government continued in it.

As to the proposition for a prince regent, it was argued that this was as much against monarchy, or rather more, than what they moved for. If a king's ill government did give the people a right in any case to take his power from him, and to lodge it with another, owning that the right to it still remained with him, this might have every whit as bad consequences as the other seemed to have : for recourse might be had to this violent remedy too often and too rashly. By this proposition of a regent, here were to be upon the matter two kings at the same time: one with the title, and another with the power, of a king. This was both more illegal and more unsafe than the method they proposed. The law of England had settled the point of the subject's security in obeying the king in possession, in the statute made by Henry the Seventh. So every man knew he was safe under a king, and so would act with zeal and courage. But all such as should act under a prince regent, created by this convention, were upon a bottom that had not the necessary forms of law for it. All that was done by them would be thought null and void in law: so that no man could be safe that acted under it. If the oaths to king James were thought to be still binding, the subjects were by these not only bound to maintain his title to the crown, but all his prerogatives and powers. And therefore it seemed absurd to continue a government in his name, and to take oaths still to him, when yet all the power was taken out of his hands. This would be an odious thing, both before God and the whole world, and would cast a reproach on us at present, and bring certain ruin for the future on any such mixed and unnatural sort of government. Therefore, if the oaths were still binding, the nation was still bound by them, not by halves, but in their whole extent. It was said that, if the government should be carried on in king James's name, but in other hands, the body of the nation would consider him as the person that was truly their king. And if any should plot, or act, for him, they could not be proceeded against for high treason, as conspiring against the king's person or government; when it would be visible that they were only designing to preserve his person, and to restore him to his government. To proceed against any, or to take their lives for such practices, would be to add murder to perjury. And it was not to be supposed that juries would find such men guilty of treason. In the weakness of infancy, a prince regent was in law the same person with the king, who had not yet a will; and it was to be presumed the prince regent's will was the king's will. But that could not be applied to the present case, where the king and the regent must be presumed to be in a perpetual struggle: the one to recover his power, the other to preserve his authority. These things seemed to be so plainly made out in the debate that it was generally thought that no man could resist such force of argument, but those who intended to bring back king James. And it was believed that those of his party, who were looked on as men of conscience, had secret orders from him to act upon this pretence; since otherwise they offered to act clearly in contradiction to their own oaths and principles.

But those who were for continuing the government, and only for changing the persons, were not at all of a mind. Some among them had very different views and ends from the rest. These intended to take advantage from the present conjuncture, to depress the crown, to render it as much precarious and elective as they could, and to raise the power of the people upon the ruin of monarchy. Among those, some went so far as to say that the whole government was dissolved. But this appeared a bold and dangerous assertion: for that might have been carried so far as to infer from it that all men's properties, honours, rights, and franchises, were dissolved. Therefore it was thought safer to say that king James had dissolved the tie that was between him and the nation. Others avoided going into new speculations, or schemes of government. They thought it was enough to say that in extreme cases all obligations did cease; and that in our present circumstances the extremity of affairs, by reason of the late ill government, and by king James's flying over to the enemy of the nation, rather than submit to reasonable terms, had put the people of England on the necessity of securing themselves upon a legal bottom. It was said, that though the vow of marriage was made for term of life, and without conditions expressed, yet a breach in the tie itself sets the innocent party at liberty. So a king, who had his power both given him and defined by the law, and was bound to govern by law, when he set himself to break all laws, and in conclusion deserted his people, did, by so doing, set them at liberty to put themselves in a legal and safe state. There was no need of fearing ill consequences from this. Houses were pulled down or blown up in a fire, and yet men found themselves safe in their houses. In extreme dangers the common sense of mankind would justify extreme remedies; though there was no special provision that directed to them, or allowed of them. Therefore, they said, a nation's securing itself against a king, who was subverting the government, did not expose monarchy, nor raise a popular authority, as some did tragically represent the matter.

There were also great disputes about the original contract : some denying there was any such thing, and asking where it was kept and how it could be come at. To this others answered that it was implied in a legal government : though in a long tract of time, and in dark ages, there was not such an explicit proof of it to be found. Yet many hints from law-books and histories were brought to show that the nation had always submitted and obeyed in consideration of their laws, which were still stipulated to them.

There were also many debates on the word "abdicate ;" for the commons came soon to a resolution, that king James, by breaking the original contract, and by withdrawing himself, had abdicated the government ; and that the throne was thereby become vacant. They sent this vote to the lords, and prayed their concurrence. Upon which many debates and conferences arose. At last it came to a free conference, in which, according to the sense of the whole nation, the commons had clearly the advantage on their side. The lords had some more colour for opposing the word "abdicate," since that was often taken in a sense that imported the full purpose and consent of him that abdicated, which could not be pretended in this case. But there were good authorities brought, by which it appeared that when a person did a thing upon which his leaving any office ought to follow, he was said to abdicate. But this was a critical dispute, and it scarcely became the greatness of that assembly, or the importance of the matter.

It was a more important debate, whether, supposing king James had abdicated, the throne could be declared vacant. It was urged that, by the law, the king did never die, but that with the last breath of the dying king, the regal authority went to the next heir. So it was said, that supposing king James had abdicated, the throne was (ipso facto) filled in that instant by the next heir. This seemed to be proved by the heirs of the king being sworn to in the oath of allegiance ; which oath was not only made personally to the king, but likewise to his heirs and successors. Those who insisted on the abdication, said, that if the king dissolved the tie between him and his subjects to himself, he dissolved their tie likewise to his posterity. An heir was one that came in the room of a person that was dead ; it being a maxim that no man can be the heir of a living man. If therefore the king had fallen from his own right, as no heir of his could pretend to any inheritance from him as long as he was alive, so they could succeed to nothing, but to that which was vested in him at the time of his death. And, as in the case of attainder, every right that a man was divested of before his death was, as it were, annihilated in him, and by consequence could not pass to his heirs by his death, not being then in himself : so if a king did set his people free from any tie to himself, they must be supposed to be put in a state, in which they might secure themselves ; and therefore could not be bound to receive one who they had reason to believe would study to dissolve and revenge all they had done. If the principle of self preservation did justify a nation in securing itself from a violent invasion, and a total subversion, then it must have its full scope to give a real, and not a seeming and fraudulent, security. They did acknowledge that upon the grounds of natural equity, and for securing the nation in after times, it was fit to go as near the lineal succession as might be : yet they could not yield that point, that they were strictly bound to it.

It was proposed that the birth of the pretended prince might be examined into. Some pressed this, not so much from an opinion that they were bound to assert his right if it should appear that he was born of the queen, as because they thought it would justify the nation, and more particularly the prince and the two princesses, if an imposture in that matter could have been proved. And it would have gone far to satisfy many of the weaker sort, as to all the proceeding against king James. Upon which I was ordered to gather together all the presumptive proofs that were formerly mentioned, which were all ready to have been made out. It is true, these did not amount to a full and legal proof ; yet they seemed to be such violent presumptions, that, when they were all laid together, they were more convincing than plain and downright evidence : for that was liable to the suspicion of subornation ; whereas the other seemed to carry on them very convincing characters of truth and certainty. But when this matter was in private debated, some observed that, as king James, by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and yet doing it so defectively, had really made it more suspicious than it was before ; so, if there was no clear and positive proof made of an imposture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out, beyond the possibility of contradiction, would really give more credit to the thing than it then had, and, instead of weakening it, would strengthen the pretension of his birth.

When this debate was proposed in the house of lords, it was rejected with indignation. He was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and to the established religion : it was impossible for the people of England to know whether he was the same person that had been carried over or not. If he should die, another might be put in his room, in such a manner that the nation could not be assured concerning him. The English nation ought not to send into another country, for witnesses to prove that he was their prince, much less receive one upon the testimony of such as were not only aliens, but ought to be presumed enemies. It was also known that all the persons, who had been the confidants in that matter, were conveyed away ; so it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the truth of that birth could be found out. But while these things were fairly debated by some, there were others who had deeper and darker designs in this matter.

They thought it would be a good security for the nation, to have a dormant title to the crown lie as it were neglected, to oblige our princes to govern well, while they would apprehend the danger of a revolt to a pretender still in their eye. Wildman thought it was a deep piece of policy to let this lie in the dark and undecided. Nor did they think it an ill precedent that they should so neglect the right of succession, as not so much as to enquire into this matter. Upon all these considerations no further enquiry was made into it. It is true, this put a plausible objection in the mouth of all king James's party : here, they said, an infant was condemned, and denied his right, without either proof or enquiry. This still takes with many in the present age. And, that it may not take more in the next, I have used more than ordinary care to gather together all the particulars that were then laid before me as to that matter.

The next thing in debate was who should fill the throne. The marquis of Halifax intended, by his zeal for the prince's interest, to atone for his backwardness in not coming early into it : and, that he might get before lord Danby, who was in great credit with the prince, he moved, that the crown should be given to the prince, and to the two princesses after him. Many of the republican party approved of this ; for by it they gained another point : the people in this case would plainly elect a king, without any critical regard to the order of succession. How far the prince himself entertained this I cannot tell. But I saw it made a great impression on Bentinck. He spoke of it to me, as asking my opinion about it, but so that I plainly saw what was his own, for he gave me all the arguments that were offered for it ; as, that it was most natural that the sovereign power should be only in one person : that a man's wife ought only to be his wife : that it was a suitable return to the prince for what he had done for the nation : that a divided sovereignty was liable to great inconveniences : and, though there was less to be apprehended from the princess of anything of that kind than from any woman alive, yet all mortals were frail, and might at some time or other of their lives be wrought on.

To all this I answered, with some vehemence, that this was a very ill return for the steps the princess had made to the prince three years ago : it would be thought both unjust and ungrateful ; it would meet with great opposition, and give a general ill impression of the prince, as insatiable and jealous in his ambition : there was an ill humour already spreading itself through the nation, and through the clergy ; it was not necessary to increase this, which such a step, as was now proposed, would do out of measure : it would engage the one sex generally against the prince ; and in time they might feel the effects of that very sensibly ; and, for my own part, I should think myself bound to oppose it all I could, considering what had passed in Holland on that head. We talked over the whole thing for many hours, till it was pretty far in the morning. I saw he was well instructed in the argument; and he himself was possessed with it. So next morning I came to him, and desired my congé. I would oppose nothing in which the prince seemed to be concerned, as long as I was his servant: and therefore I desired to be disengaged, that I might be free to oppose this proposition, with all the strength and credit I had. He answered me, that I might desire that, when I saw a step made; but till then he wished me to stay where I was. I heard no more of this, in which the marquis of Halifax was single among the peers; for I did not find there was any one of them of his mind, unless it was the lord Culpepper, who was a vicious and corrupt man, but made a figure in the debates that were now in the house of lords, and died about the end of them. Some moved, that the princess of Orange might be put on the throne; and that it might be left to her to give the prince such a share either of dignity or power as she should propose when she was declared queen. The agents of princess Anne began to go about, and to oppose any proposition for the prince to her prejudice; but she thought fit to disown them. Dr. Doughty, one of her chaplains, spoke to me in her room on the subject; but she said to myself, that she knew nothing of it.

The proposition, in which all that were for the filling the throne agreed at last, was, that both the prince and princess should be made conjunct sovereigns; but, for the preventing of any distractions, that the administration should be singly in the prince. The princess continued all the while in Holland, being shut in there, during the east winds, by the freezing of the rivers, and by contrary winds after the thaw came: so that she came not to England till all the debates were over. The prince's enemies gave it out, that she was kept there by order, on design that she might not come over to England to claim her right. So parties began to be formed, some for the prince, and others for the princess. Upon this the earl of Danby sent one over to the princess, and gave her an account of the present state of that debate; and desired to know her own sense of the matter; for, if she desired it, he did not doubt but he should be able to carry it, for setting her alone on the throne. She made him a very sharp answer: she said, she was the prince's wife, and would never be other, than what she should be in conjunction with him, and under him; and that she would take it extremely unkindly, if any, under a pretence of their care of her, would set up a divided interest between her and the prince. And, not content with this, she sent both lord Danby's letter, and her answer, to the prince. Her sending it thus to him was the most effectual discouragement possible, to any attempt for the future to create a misunderstanding or jealousy between them. The prince bore this with his usual phlegm: for he did not expostulate with the earl of Danby upon it, but continued still to employ, and to trust him; and afterwards he advanced him, first to be a marquis, and then to be a duke.

During all these debates, and the great heat with which they were managed, the prince's own behaviour was very mysterious. He stayed at St. James's: he went little abroad: access to him was not very easy. He heard all that was said to him, but seldom made any answers. He did not affect to be affable, or popular; nor would he take any pains to gain any one person over to his party. He said, he came over, being invited, to save the nation; he had now brought together a free and true representative of the kingdom: he left it therefore to them to do what they thought best for the good of the kingdom; and, when things were once settled, he should be well satisfied to go back to Holland again. Those who did not know him well, and who imagined that a crown had charms, which human nature was not strong enough to resist, looked on all this as an affectation, and as a disguised threatening, which imported, that he would leave the nation to perish, unless his method of settling it was followed. After a reservedness, that had continued so close for several weeks, that nobody could certainly tell what he desired, he called for the marquis of Halifax, and the earls of Shrewsbury and Danby, and some others, to explain himself more distinctly to them.

He told them, he had been till then silent, because he would not say, or do, any thing that might seem in any sort to take from any person the full freedom of deliberating and voting in matters of such importance: he was resolved neither to court nor threaten any one; and therefore he had declined to give out his own thoughts. Some were for putting the government in the hands of a regent; he would say nothing against it, if it was thought the best mean for settling their affairs; only he thought it necessary to tell them, that he would not be the regent; so, if they continued in that design, they must look out for some other person to be put in that post: he himself saw what the consequences of it were likely to prove; so he would not accept of it: others were for putting the princess singly on the throne, and that he should reign by her courtesy: he said, no man could esteem a woman more than he did the princess; but he was so made, that he could not think of holding any thing by apron-strings; nor could he think it reasonable to have any share in the government, unless it was put in his person, and that for term of life: if they did think it fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them in it; but he would go back to Holland, and meddle no more in their affairs. He assured them, that whatsoever others might think of a crown, it was no such thing in his eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleased without it. In the end, he said, that he could not resolve to accept of a dignity, so as to hold it only for the life of another; yet he thought that the issue of princess Anne should be preferred in the succession, to any issue that he might have by any other wife than the princess. All this he delivered to them in so cold and unconcerned a manner, that those who judged of others by the dispositions that they felt in themselves, looked on it all as artifice and contrivance.

This was presently told about, as it was not intended to be kept secret; and it helped not a little to bring the debates at Westminster to a speedy determination. Some were still in doubt with relation to the princess. In some it was conscience; for they thought the equitable right was in her. Others might be moved by interests, since if she should think herself wronged, and ill used in this matter, she, who was likely to outlive the prince, being so much younger and healthier than he was, might have it in her power to take her revenges on all that should concur in such a design. Upon this, I, who knew her sense of the matter very perfectly by what had passed in Holland, as was formerly told, was in a great difficulty. I had promised her never to speak of that matter, but by her order; but I presumed, in such a case I was to take orders from the prince. So I asked him what he would order me to do. He said, he would give me no orders in that matter, but left me to do as I pleased. I looked on this as the allowing me to let the princess's resolution in that be known, by which many, who stood formerly in suspense, were fully satisfied. Those to whom I gave the account of that matter were indeed amazed at it; and concluded, that the princess was either a very good, or a very weak woman. An indifferency for power and rule seemed so extraordinary a thing, that it was thought a certain character of an excess of goodness, or simplicity. At her coming to England, she not only justified me, but approved of my publishing that matter; and spoke particularly of it to her sister princess Anne. There were other differences in the form of the settlement. The republican party were at first for deposing king James by a formal sentence, and for giving the crown to the prince and princess by as formal an election. But that was overruled in the beginning. I have not pursued the relation of the debates, according to the order in which they passed, which will be found in the journal of both houses during the convention; but, having had a great share myself in the private managing of those debates, particularly with many of the clergy, and with the men of the most scrupulous and tender consciences, I have given a very full account of all the reasonings on both sides, as that by which the reader may form and guide his own judgment of the whole affair. Many protests passed in the house of lords, in the progress of the debate. The party for a regency was for some time most prevailing; and then the protests were made by the lords that were for the new settlement. The house was very full; about a hundred and twenty were present; and things were so near an equality, that it was at last carried by a very small majority, of two or three, to agree with the commons in voting the abdication, and the vacancy of the throne; against which a great protest was made; as also against the final vote, by which the prince and princess of Orange were desired to accept of the crown, and declared to be king and queen; which went very hardly*. The poor bishop of Durham, who had absconded for some time, and was waiting for a ship to get beyond sea, fearing public affronts, and had offered to compound by resigning his bishopric, was now prevailed on to come, and by voting the new settlement, to merit at least a pardon

On the 11th of December, 1688, king James the Second was going privately by water from Whitehall to Gravesend, in order to depart beyond sea. The lords spiritual and temporal in and near the city of London, its lord mayor and aldermen, in consequence met the same day at Guildhall, to consult about the means of securing the laws, liberties, and religion of the country, and preserving the peace and tranquillity of the City. They first demanded the governor of the Tower to surrender it, which he did, and they appointed another governor until further orders. They then put forth a declaration, shewing their readiness to concur with his royal highness the prince of Orange, in attaining a free parliament, which will secure the laws, liberties, and property of all, and uphold the protestant religion; and also to desire him to hasten to England, and in the mean time they declare their resolution to preserve the peace of the country as much as possible, and to keep under the popish party. This declaration, by the hands of three temporal and one spiritual peers, was the same day despatched to the prince of Orange. The lords continued to meet daily in the council chamber, at Whitehall, and issued orders to all officers, "being protestants," to do their utmost to preserve the peace. On the 12th, this declaration was published, and on the same day they committed lord Jeffreys to the Tower. On the 13th, they summoned all protestant soldiers to their respective regiments; and the same day, news being brought that the king had been stopped at Faversham, they sent four peers to his majesty, to intreat and persuade him to return to Whitehall, with further directions, that if he refused, to attend his majesty on board any ship he might command, for the transporting his majesty whithersoever he pleased.

On the 21st, the lords assembled in council at St. James's, by desire of the prince of Orange, who came to them, and in a short speech requested them to advise of the best means of obtaining a free parliament, preserving the protestant religion, and restoring and settling the rights and liberties of the kingdom. After mutual compliments, the lords selected the following lawyers to advise with them, viz. sir John Holt, sir Robert Atkins, serjeant Maynard, Mr. Pollexfen, and Mr. Bradbury.

On the 22nd, they chose a chairman and secretary, pro tempore. There being present sixty-two peers, they issued an order for the departure, or confinement, of the papists of the neighbourhood of London.

On the 24th, lords Salisbury and Peterborough were sent by them to the Tower, and sundry popish priests and jesuits to Newgate. They then petitioned the prince of Orange to take upon him the management of affairs, and of the public revenue, until the meeting of the convention on the 22nd of the following January; and that he would issue circular letters, subscribed by himself, for the election of members to serve in that convention; and which, in other words, was to be a regularly elected house of commons, the writs to be directed to such returning officers as were protestant. On the same day, the prince published an order, because the necessity of affairs required speedy advice, summoning all such persons as had served as knights, citizens, or burgesses, in any of the parliaments held in the reign of Charles the Second, to attend on the 26th inst., at St. James's; and that the lord mayor, aldermen, and fifty of the common council of the city of London, to be there at the same time. On the 25th, the lords dissolved themselves, and resolved not to meet again until the convention.

On the 26th, various members of the parliaments in the reign of Charles the Second, and the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city, attended at St. James's, and the prince told them he sought their advice upon the best mode of obtaining a free parliament, &c. They then adjourned to the house of commons at Westminster, and chose a chairman. They then voted an address of thanks to the prince, and of request that he would take upon himself the government of public affairs, and direct an election of members to serve in parliament to be duly made.

On the 27th, the prince gave a favourable reply to these concordant addresses of the peers and commons; and on the 29th, the writs were issued.

The convention parliament met on the 22nd of January, and, upon motion in the house of commons, it was determined, sem. con., that on the following Monday they would take into consideration the condition and state of the nation. Accordingly, on the 28th, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, for the above purpose, and the following resolution agreed upon:

"Resolved—That king James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between the king and people, and, by the advice of the Jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of this kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant."

This resolution was immediately carried up to the house of lords, for their concurrence.

On Sunday, the 2nd of February, the lords informed the commons of their assent to the above resolution, with these amendments, "Instead of the word abdicated, read deserted; and leave out the words, and that the throne is thereby vacant."

On the 4th, the commons met and refused their assent to these amendments, because, said they, "the word deserted doth not fully express the conclusion necessarily inferred from the premises to which your lordships have agreed. For your lordships have agreed that king James the Second has endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, &c.; now the word deserted respects only the withdrawing, but the word abdicated respects the whole. If then," they continued, "king James the Second has abdicated, or even only deserted, the government, the throne is thereby vacant. 2dly. The commons conceive they need not prove to your lordships that as to any other person the throne is also vacant; your lordships, as they conceive, having already admitted it, by your addressing to the prince of Orange, on the 25th of December last, to take upon himself the administration of public affairs, both civil and military, &c. till the meeting of this convention; by your lordships renewing the same address to his highness since you met; and by appointing days of public thanksgiving to be observed throughout the whole kingdom."

Having thus concluded, the commons sought and obtained a conference of the lords upon the subject of the amendments; but the lords persisted in them, because the word abdication is a word unknown to the common law, and of doubtful interpretation—and because it implies a voluntary, express act of renunciation which is not in this case. Moreover, though they applied to the prince of Orange, as stated, yet no other inference can thence be drawn, but only that the exercise of the government by king James the Second is ceased; and though the lords were, and are, willing to secure the nation against his return, yet they do not, neither can, agree that there is for all that he had done ; which, all things considered, was thought very indecent in him, yet not unbecoming the rest of his life and character.

But, before matters were brought to a full conclusion, an enumeration was made of the chief heads of king James's ill government. And in opposition to these, the rights and liberties of the people of England were stated. Some officious people studied to hinder this at that time. They thought they had already lost three weeks in their debates ; and the doing this, with the exactness that was necessary, would take up more time ; or it would be done too much in a hurry, for matters of so nice a nature. And therefore it was moved, that this should be done more at leisure after the settlement. But that was not hearkened such an abdication, or such a vacancy in the throne, as thereby to render the crown elective : for, by the constitution of the government, the monarchy is hereditary and not elective, and no act of the king alone can bar or destroy the right of the heir to the crown ; therefore, if the throne be vacant of king James the Second, allegiance is due to such person as the right of succession belongs to.

It was then moved in the house that the amendments of the lords be agreed to. The first was negatived without a division, and the second was negatived by 282 to 151.

A free conference was then desired by the commons, and was granted by the lords ; the managers of which, on the part of the first, were sir Robert Howard, Mr. Pollexfen, Mr. Paul Foley, sir John Holt, lord Falkland, sir George Treby, Mr. Sommers, Mr. Garroway, Mr. Boscawen, Mr. Thomas Littleton, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Hampden, sir Henry Capel, sir Thomas Lee, Mr. Sacheverel, major Wyldman, colonel Birch, Mr. Eyres, sir Richard Temple, sir Henry Goodrich, Mr. Waller, sir John Guise.

The conference met on the 6th of February.

On the part of the commons it was urged, that though there was no express resignation in word or writing, yet there were overt acts quite as significant ; and though the common law has no notice of such a word as abdication, it was merely because the necessity for it was not contemplated. Again, the word deserted is of as doubtful meaning in our common law as the word abdicated. But the word abdicated is of well understood meaning, it signifies to renounce, throw off, disown, or relinquish anything or person, so as to have no further to do with it. In support of these opinions were quoted Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, b. ii. c. 4, s. 4. " Venit enim hoc non ex jure Civili sed ex jure Naturali, quod quisque potest abdicare et ex naturali presumptione quæ voluisse quis creditur quod sufficienter significavit : " and then he goes on, " recusari hereditas non tantum verbis sed etiam potest et quovis indicio voluntatis."

Calvin, in his Lexicon Juridicum, says, " Generum abdicat qui sponsam repudiat : " he that divorces his wife, abdicates his son-in-law. Brissonius, in his Commentaries, says, " abdicare se magistratum est idem quod abire penitus magistratu."

Again, Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, b. i. c. 4, s. 9, says, abdicare means, " manifeste habere pro redelicto."

On the other hand, " deserted," by all authorities, means merely a leaving, a leave withdrawing, a temporary quitting, a negligence which leaves the party at liberty to return to it again ; which neither the lords nor commons intended to be the case in the present instance.

With respect to the objection to declaring the throne vacant, Mr. Hampden made this question in answer, " If the throne is not vacant, will your lordships inform us who fills it ?"

The whole object of the lords, as intended by their amendments, was, after much discussion, cleared of all ambiguity by this enquiry by the earl of Nottingham : " What is meant by the commons by voting the throne to be vacant ? Do you mean it is so vacant as to null the succession in the hereditary line, and so all the heirs to be cut off ? which, we say, will make the throne elective : " and, as he afterwards added, " Do you, gentlemen of the house of commons, mean by abdication a renouncing for himself, or for himself and heirs ? " To which many able replies were made and rejoindered upon : but none was so conclusive to the point as that of sir Robert Howard. " I would ask, he said, this question of any noble lord that is here : Had there been an heir to whom the crown had quietly descended in the line of succession, and this heir certainly known, would your lordships have assembled without his calling ? Would you have either administered the government yourselves, or have advised the prince of Orange to take it upon him ? I doubt," he continued, " you had been all guilty of high treason by the laws of England, if a known successor was in possession of the throne, as he must be if the throne was not vacant."

" We all know," proceeded the same intelligent man, " the monarchy is hereditary, but how to find out the successor in the line ? You think it will be a difficult thing to go upon the examination who is heir. I confess there are difficulties on all sides ; but, it not being clear, must we remain thus ? Use what words you will, fill it up, or nominate, or elect ; it is the thing we are to take care of, and it is high time it was done. My lords, there is no such consequence to be drawn from this vote as an intention or a likelihood of the altering the course of our government so as to make it elective ; there have been precedents of exclusions of the next heir, yet the throne hath all along descended in an hereditary succession, and the main constitution hath been preserved. My lords, you have already limited the succession, and have cut off some that might have a lineal right, for you have concurred with us in the vote that it is inconsistent with our religion and laws to have a papist to reign over us. Must we not then come to an election if the next heir be a papist ? Nay, suppose there was no protestant heir to be found, would not your lordships then break the line ? " Thomas Lee added, " It is plain your lordships were sensible we were without a government by your desiring the prince to take the administration ; and in calling this convention that power has been exercised which should be in all States, to make provision in all times and upon occasions for extraordinary cases and necessities." Mr. Sergeant Maynard added, " If we look but into the law of nature, which is above all human laws, we have enough to justify us in what we are now about, to provide for ourselves and the public weal in such an exigence as this."

Mr. Paul Foley said, if the whole royal line should fail, who would have the government but the lords and commons ? They being the only remaining apparent parts of the government, are alone fit to supply the defect by providing a successor. Eventually the conference ended without any conclusion ; but, on the following day, the house of lords informed the commons that they agreed to the vote of the latter, sent up on the 28th of January last, without any alteration.

to. It was therefore thought necessary to frame this instrument so, that it should be like a new magna charta. In the stating these grievances and rights, the dispensing power came to be discussed ; and then the power of the crown to grant a non-obstante to some statutes was objected. Upon opening this, the debate was found to be so intricate, that it was let fall at that time only for dispatch ; but afterwards an act passed condemning it singly ; and the power of granting a non-obstante was for the future taken away : yet king James's party took great advantage from this, and said, that though the main clamour of the nation was against the dispensing power, yet when the convention brought things to a settlement that did not appear to be so clear a point as had been pretended : and it was not so much as mentioned in this instrument of government ; so that, by the confession of his enemies, it appeared to be no unlawful power ; nor was it declared contrary to the liberties of the people of England. Whereas, its not being mentioned then, was only upon the opposition that was made, that so more time might not be lost, nor this instrument be clogged with disputable points.

The last debate was, concerning the oaths that should be taken to the king and queen. Many arguments were taken during the debate, from the oaths in the form in which the allegiance was sworn to the crown, to shew that in a new settlement these could not be taken. And to this it was always answered, that care should be taken, when other things were settled, to adjust these oaths, so that they should agree to the new settlement. In the oaths, as they were formerly conceived, a previous title seemed to be asserted, when the king was sworn to, " as rightful and lawful king." It was therefore said, that these words could not be said of a king who had not a precedent right, but was set up by the nation. So it was moved, that the oaths should be reduced to the ancient simplicity, of swearing to bear faith and true allegiance to the king and queen. This was agreed to. And upon this began the notion of a king de facto, but not de jure. It was said, that according to the common law, as well as the statute in king Henry the Seventh's reign, the subjects might securely obey any king that was in possession, whether his title was good, or not. This seemed to be a doctrine necessary for the peace and quiet of mankind, that so the subjects may be safe in every government that bringeth them under a superior force, and that will crush them, if they do not give a security for the protection that they enjoy under it. The lawyers had been always of that opinion, that the people were not bound to examine the titles of their princes, but were to submit to him that was in possession. It was therefore judged just and reasonable, in the beginning of a new government, to make the oaths as general and comprehensive as might be ; for it was thought, that those who once took the oaths to the government, would be after that faithful and true to it. This tenderness, which was shewed at this time, to a sort of people that had shewed very little tenderness to men of weak, or ill informed, consciences, was afterwards much abused by a new explanation, or rather a gross equivocation, as to the signification of the words in which the oath was conceived. The true meaning of the words, and the express sense of the imposers was, that, whether men were satisfied, or not, with the putting the king and queen on the throne, yet, now they were on it, they would be true to them, and defend them. But the sense that many put on them was, that they were only to obey them as usurpers, during their usurpation, and that therefore, as long as they continued in quiet possession, they were bound to bear them, and to submit to them ; but that it was still lawful for them to assist king James, if he should come to recover his crown, and that they might act and talk all they could, or durst, in his favour, as being still their king de jure. This was contrary to the plain meaning of the words ; " faith, and true allegiance ;" and was contrary to the express declaration in the act that enjoined them. Yet it became too visible, that many in the nation, and particularly among the clergy, took the oath in this sense, to the great reproach of their profession. The prevarication of too many in so sacred a matter contributed not a little to fortify the growing atheism of the present age. The truth was, the greatest part of the clergy had entangled themselves so far with those strange conceits of the divine right of monarchy, and the unlawfulness of resistance in any case ; and they had so engaged themselves, by asserting these things so often and so publicly, that they did not know how to disengage themselves in honour, or conscience.

A notion was started, which by its agreement with their other principles had a great effect among them, and brought off the greatest number of those who came in honestly to the new government. This was chiefly managed by Dr. Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, now translated to Worcester. It was laid thus: the prince had a just cause of making war on the king; in that most of them agreed. In a just war, in which an appeal is made to God, success is considered as the decision of Heaven. So the prince's success against king James gave him the right of conquest over him; and by it all his rights were transferred to the prince. His success was indeed no conquest of the nation, which had neither wronged him, nor resisted him. So that, with relation to the people of England, the prince was no conqueror, but a preserver, and a deliverer, well received, and gratefully acknowledged. Yet with relation to king James, and all the right that was before vested in him, he was, as they thought, a conqueror. By this notion they explained those passages of scripture, that speak of God's disposing of kingdoms, and of pulling down one and setting up another; and also our Saviour's arguing from the inscription on the coin, that they ought to render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's; and St. Paul's charging the Romans to obey the powers that then were, who were the emperors that were originally the invaders of public liberty which they had subdued, and had forced the people and senate of Rome by subsequent acts to confirm an authority that was so ill begun. This might have been made use of more justly, if the prince had assumed the kingship to himself, upon king James's withdrawing; but did not seem to belong to the present case. Yet this had the most universal effect on the far greater part of the clergy.

And now I have stated all the most material parts of these debates, with the fulness that I thought became one of the most important transactions that is in our whole history, and by much the most important of our time.

All things were now made ready for filling the throne; and the very night before it was to be done the princess arrived safely. It had been given out, that she was not well pleased with the late transaction, both with relation to her father and to the present settlement. Upon which the prince wrote to her, that it was necessary she should appear at first so cheerful, that nobody might be discouraged by her looks, or be led to apprehend that she was uneasy, by reason of what had been done. This made her put on a great air of gaiety when she came to Whitehall, and, as may be imagined, had great crowds of all sorts coming to wait on her. I confess, I was one of those that censured this in my thoughts. I thought a little more seriousness had done as well, when she came into her father's palace, and was to be set on his throne next day. I had never seen the least indecency in any part of her deportment before; which made this appear to me so extraordinary, that some days after I took the liberty to ask her, how it came that what she saw in so sad a revolution, as to her father's person, made not a greater impression on her. She took this freedom with her usual goodness; and she assured me, she felt the sense of it very lively upon her thoughts. But she told me, that the letters which had been written to her had obliged her to put on a cheerfulness, in which she might perhaps go too far, because she was obeying directions, and acting a part which was not very natural to her*. This was on the 12th of February, being

* It may be reasonably granted that we ought to sacrifice our private wishes to our conviction of the interests of our country, but whilst we submit to the sacrifice, there is no reason why we should conceal that we possess the natural feelings of man, or shew any neglect of that decent deportment which ought to be suggested by our suffering. Neither of the princesses shewed this natural deportment for their father's misfortunes.

Lord Clarendon says, "I asked the princess Anne if she thought her father could justly be deposed? To which she said, those were too great points for her to meddle with; that she was very sorry the king had brought things to the pass they were at; but she was afraid it would not be safe for him ever to return again. I asked her what she meant by that? To which she replied, 'Nothing.' I then told her, I hoped her royal highness would not be offended if I took the liberty to tell her that many good people were extremely troubled to find she seemed no more concerned for her father's misfortune; that people who were with her in her late progress took notice, that when the news came of the king being gone, she seemed not at all moved, but called for cards, and was as merry as she used to be: to which she replied, they did her wrong to make such reflections upon her actions; that it was true she did call for cards, because she used to play, and she never loved to do any thing that looked like an affected restraint. I answered, that I was sorry her royal highness should think, that shewing a trouble for the king, her father's misfortune, should be interpreted by any as an affected constraint; that I was afraid, such her behaviour rendered her much less in the opinion of the world, even with her father's enemies, than she ought to be."—Singer's Clarendon Corr. ii. 249.

Of queen Mary, when she first arrived at the palace from which her father had been compelled to retreat, Evelyn remarks, "She came into Whitehall laughing and jolly as to a wedding, so as to seem quite transported. She rose early the next morning, and in her undress, as it was reported, before her women were up, went about from room to room to see the convenience of the house; lay in the same apartment where the queen lay, and within a night or two, sat down to play at basset, as the queen, her predecessor, used to do. This carriage was censured by many. She seems to be of a good nature, and that she takes nothing to heart; whilst the prince, her husband, has a thoughtful countenance, is wonderful serious and silent, and seems to treat all persons alike gravely, and to be very intent on affairs."—(Evelyn's Diary, ii. 6.) The duchess of Marlborough confirms this statement; she says Mary "wanted bowels," and animadverted upon her behaviour when she first arrived at Whitehall, as being "very strange and unbecoming."—Account of the Duchess of Marlborough's Conduct, p. 13.

Shrove-Tuesday. The thirteenth was the day set for the two houses to come with the offer of the crown. So here ends the Interregnum.

And thus I have given the fullest and most particular account that I could gather of all that passed during this weak, unactive, violent, and superstitious reign; in which all regard to the affairs of Europe seemed to be laid aside, and nothing was thought on but the spiteful humours of a revengeful Italian lady, and the ill laid, and worse managed, projects of some hot meddling priests, whose learning and politics were of a piece, the one exposing them to contempt, and the other to ruin; involving in it a prince, who, if it had not been for his being delivered up to such counsels, might have made a better figure in history. But they managed both themselves and him so ill, that a reign, whose rise was bright and prosperous, was soon set in darkness and disgrace. But I break off here, lest I should seem to aggravate misfortunes, and load the unfortunate too much.

BOOK V.

OF THE REIGN OF KING WILLIAM AND QUEEN MARY.

NOW begin, on the first day of May, 1705, to prosecute this work ; and have before me a reign, that drew upon it an universal expectation of great things to follow, from such auspicious beginnings ; and from so general a joy as was spread over these nations, and all the neighbouring kingdoms and states ; of whom some had apprehended a general depression, if not the total ruin, of the protestant religion ; and all of them saw such a progress made by the French in the design of enslaving the rest of Europe, that the check which the revolution in England seemed to promise, put a new life in those, who before were sunk in despair. It seemed to be a double-bottomed monarchy, where there were two joint sovereigns ; but those who knew the queen's temper and principles, had no apprehensions of divided counsels or of a distracted government.

That which gave the most melancholy prospect, was the ill state of the king's health, whose stay so long at St. James's without exercise, or hunting, which was so much used by him that it was become necessary, had brought him under such a weakness, as was likely to have very ill effects ; and the face he forced himself to set upon it, that it might not appear too much, made an impression on his temper. He was apt to be peevish ; it put him under a necessity of being much in his closet, and of being silent and reserved ; which, agreeing so well with his natural disposition, made him go off from what all his friends had advised, and he had promised them he would set about, of being more visible, open, and communicative. The nation had been so much accustomed to this, in the two former reigns, that many studied to persuade him, it would be necessary for his affairs to change his way, that he might be more accessible, and freer in his discourse. He seemed resolved on it ; but he said, his ill health made it impossible for him to execute it : and so he went on in his former way, or rather he grew more retired, and was not easily come at, nor spoken to. And in a very few days, after he was set on the throne, he went out to Hampton-court ; and from that palace he came into town only on council days : so that the face of a court, and the rendezvous, usual in the public rooms, was now quite broken. This gave an early and general disgust. The gaiety and the diversions of a court disappeared ; and, though the queen set herself to make up what was wanting in the king, by a great vivacity and cheerfulness, yet when it appeared that she meddled not in business, so that few found their account in making their court to her, though she gave a wonderful content to all that came near her, yet few came.

The king found the air of Hampton-court agreed so well with him, that he resolved to live the greatest part of the year there : but that palace was so very old built, and so irregular, that a design was formed of raising new buildings there for the king and the queen's apartments. This shewed a resolution to live at a distance from London ; and the entering so soon on so expensive a building, afforded matter of censure to those who were disposed enough to entertain it. And this spread a universal discontent in the city of London : and these small and almost indiscernible beginnings and seeds of ill humour, have ever since gone on in a very visible increase and progress.

The first thing the king did, was, to choose a ministry, and to settle a council. The earl of Shrewsbury was declared secretary of state, and had the greatest share of the king's confidence. No exception could be made to the choice, except on account of his youth ; but he applied himself to business with great diligence, and maintained his candour and temper with more reservedness than was expected from one of his age. It was for some time under consideration who should be the other secretary; at last the earl of Nottingham was pitched on. He had opposed the settlement with great earnestness, in his copious way of speaking; but he had always said, that, though he would not make a king, yet upon his principles, he could obey him better than those who were so much set on making one*. The high church party did apprehend that the opposition they had given the king's advancement, and the zeal that others had shewed for it, would alienate him from them, and throw him into other hands, from whom no good was to be expected for them: and they looked for severe revenges for the hardships they had put on these in the end of king Charles's reign. This grew daily upon that party, and made them begin to look back toward king James. So, not to provoke so great a body too much, it was thought advisable to employ the earl of Nottingham. The great increase of chancery business had made many apprehend it was too much to be trusted to one person; so it was resolved to put the chancery in commission; and the earl of Nottingham was proposed to be the first in the commission, but he refused it. So Maynard, Keck, and Rawlinson, three eminent lawyers, were made the three commissioners of the great seal. And soon after that, the earl of Nottingham was appointed secretary of state. This gave as much satisfaction to all the high party, as it begot jealousies and distrust in others. The one hoped for protection and favour by his means: they reckoned he would infuse all the prerogative notions into the king, and give him such a jealousy of every step that the others should make in prejudice of these, that from thence the king would see cause to suspect all the shew of kindness that they might put on to him, when at the same time they were undermining some of those prerogatives, for which the earl of Nottingham seemed to be so zealous. This had a great effect on the king, who being ignorant of our constitution, and naturally cautious, saw cause enough to dislike the heat he found among those who expressed much zeal for him, but who seemed, at the same time, to have with it a great mixture of republican principles. They, on the other hand, were much offended at the employing the earl of Nottingham. And he gave them daily cause to be more displeased at it; for he set himself with a most eager partiality against the whole party, and against all the motions made by them; and he studied to possess the king with a very bad opinion of them. And, whereas secretaries of state have a particular allowance for such spies, as they employ to procure intelligence, how exact soever he might be in procuring foreign intelligence, he spared no cost nor pains to have an account of all that passed in the city, and in other angry cabals: and he furnished the king very copiously that way; which made a deep impression on him, and had very bad effects. The earl of Danby was made marquis of Carmarthen, and president of the council; and lord Halifax had the privy seal†. The last of * Daniel Finch, earl of Nottingham, and afterwards of Winchelsea, was one of the most conscientious men that ever assisted in the council of an English monarch. He was born about the year 1647. Very early in life at Christ Church, Oxford, and the Inner Temple, he was proportionately young when introduced to state affairs; distinguished as a parliamentary orator, he soon acquired the notice of James the Second, who made him a privy councillor and first commissioner of the admiralty. Every act of his life was consistent. He signed the order for proclaiming James the Second; but opposed the abrogation of the test act, and maintained the cause of the seven bishops. His opinions relative to the revolution have been already noticed; William the Third appreciated his integrity, and would have made him lord chancellor, an office his father had so ably filled; this he declined, but accepted the office of a state secretary. The impotent pardon issued by James in 1692, excepted the earl from those who were forgiven. When jealousies and intrigues induced him to resign, and his character and conduct were examined, it arose resplendent from the scrutiny; not a charge of peculation could be discovered, but, on the contrary, it was proved that he had rejected a douceur of 10,000*l.* from the East-India company. He opposed, and was affected even to weeping, by the abjuration of the son of James the Second; yet he submitted to queen Anne's government, and was re-appointed to the secretaryship. Both houses of parliament passed votes of approbation upon him at the time. In 1704 we shall find he resigned, but at the accession of George the First, was made a lord-justice, and lord-president of the council. In 1715, his humanity deprived him of his office, for he was dismissed because he pleaded for the peers, who attempted to restore the Stuarts. The earl was a firm supporter of the protestant faith. The university of Oxford, in full convocation, unanimously thanked him for his "Defence of the Christian Faith, contained in his lordship's answer to Mr. Whiston's letter to him, concerning the eternity of the Son of God, and the Holy Ghost." He died on the first day of 1730. According to Noble, he had, by his second wife, thirty children.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger; Birch's Lives; Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Clarendon Correspondence.

† A clear insight into the character of this self-interested nobleman may be found in Sir John Reresby's "Memoirs."

ess had gone into all the steps that had been made for the king, with great zeal, and by that means was hated by the high party, whom for distinction sake I will hereafter call Tories, and the other Whigs; terms that I have spoken much against, and have ever hated: but to avoid making always a longer description, I must use them; they being now become as common as if they had been words of our language. Lord Halifax soon saw that his friendship with the Whigs was not likely to last long; his opposing the exclusion stuck still deeply with them; and the business of the quo warrantos, and the delivering up of charters, was cast on him: the slowness of relieving Ireland was also charged on him; he had for some time great credit with the king, though his mercurial wit was not well suited with the king's phlegm. Lord Carmarthen could not bear the equality, or rather the preference that seemed to be given to lord Halifax; and therefore set on the storm that quickly broke out upon him.

Lord Mordaunt was made earl of Monmouth, and first commissioner of the treasury; and lord Delamere, made earl of Warrington*, was chancellor of the exchequer: lord Godolphin was likewise brought into the treasury, to the great grief of the other two, who soon saw, that the king considered him more than them both. For, as he understood treasury business well, so his calm and cold way suited the king's temper. The earls of Monmouth and Warrington, though both most violent Whigs, became great enemies; the former was generous, and gave the inferior places freely; but sought out the men who were most noted for republican principles, for them all: and the other, they said, sold every thing that was in his power. The privy council was composed chiefly of Whigs.

Nothing gave a more general satisfaction than the naming of the judges; the king ordered every privy councillor to bring a list of twelve: and, out of these, twelve very learned and worthy judges were chosen. This nomination was generally well received over the nation. The first of these was sir John Holt, made lord chief justice of England, then a young man for so high a post, who maintained it all his time with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, courage, and great dispatch. So that, since the lord chief justice Hale's time, that bench has not been so well filled, as it was by him.

The king's chief personal favour lay between Bentinck and Sidney: the former was made earl of Portland and groom of the stole, and continued for ten years to be entirely trusted by the king, and served him with great fidelity and obsequiousness; but he could never bring himself to be acceptable to the English nation†. The other was made first, lord Sidney,

* He was not made earl of Warrington till after his removal from the office of chancellor of the exchequer.

Henry Booth, lord Delamere, was a son of the loyal but unfortunate sir George Booth, who took up arms in favour of Charles the Second, during the protectorate. He was born in 1651, at the family residence in Cheshire, which county he represented zealously in parliament; promoting the exclusion bill, for which, we have seen in previous pages, he was brought into trouble during the reign of James the Second. At the revolution, besides the chancellorship of the exchequer, he was appointed to the lord lieutenancy of Cheshire. At Whittington, in Derbyshire, a farm house is shewn, where he and the earls of Devonshire and Danby are said to have met, and consulted how they might assist the cause of the prince of Orange. One room is still called by the peasantry there "the plotting parlour."—(Dr. Akenaide's Ode addressed to the earl of Huntingdon.) He published several tracts; one, entitled "The late Lord Russell's Case, with observations," throws light upon the history of the period. He died in 1694.—Kippis's Biog. Britannica; Grainger.

† William Bentinck, descended from a noble family in Guelderland, was born about the year 1649. He was liberally educated, and then placed as page of honour to the prince of Orange. Whilst holding this situation, he acted with a devoted heroism for the benefit of the prince, that secured to him his highness's perpetual friendship and favour. The prince was ill of the small pox, and the pustules not freely rising, to promote the eruption a healthy boy was recommended to be placed with him in bed. Young Bentinck immediately volunteered to undergo this dangerous office; the desired effect was produced, but he was infected, and nearly died of the disorder. The esteem thus gained was secured and strengthened in after-life by the ability, integrity, and prudence, exhibited by Bentinck. He came with the prince when he married the princess Mary; he was the ambassador to warn James the Second of Monmouth's invasion. In Holland, he held a superior office in the prince's household, and the command of the 1st regiment of guards. He shewed extreme intelligence in holding communication with the English protestants previous to the revolution, as well as in the arrangements preliminary to this constitutional effort; and when it was completed, he received the offices of groom of the stole, keeper of the privy-purse, and a privy councillor; and, being naturalised, was raised to the peerage as earl of Portland, knight of the garter, and lieutenant-general of the forces. For a long time he continued first favourite, and was employed upon the most delicate embassies, &c. During one of these, at Paris, he was shewn, in the royal palace, Le Brun's series of paintings, illustrative of Louis the Fourteenth's victories, and was asked whether William's were to be seen in his residence. "No," replied Bentinck, "the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his palace." Naturally of a reserved temper, and consequently suspected of pride; ignorant of our customs and language; and viewed with jealousy as a foreigner; he did not want enemies, and

and then earl of Rumney, and was put in several great posts. He was made secretary of state, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and master of the ordnance; but he was so set on pleasure, that he was not able to follow business with a due application. The earls of Devonshire and Dorset had the white staffs: the first was lord steward, and the other was lord chamberlain; and they being both whigs, the household was made up of such, except where there were buyers for places, which were set to sale; and though the king seemed to discourage that, yet he did not encourage propositions that were made for the detecting those practices. Thus was the court, the ministry, and the council composed. The admiralty was put in commission, and Herbert, made earl of Torrington, was first in the commission. He tried to dictate to the board; and when he found that did not pass upon them, he left it, and studied all he could to disparage their conduct, and it was thought he hoped to have been advanced to that high trust alone.

The first thing proposed to be done was to turn the convention into a parliament, according to the precedent set in the year 1660. This was opposed by all the Tories. They said writs were indispensable to the being of a parliament. And though the like was done at the restoration, yet it was said that the convention was then called when there was no king nor great seal in England; and it was called by the consent of the lawful king, and was done upon a true and visible, and not on a pretended, necessity; and they added, that after all, even then the convention was not looked on as a legal parliament: its acts were ratified in a subsequent parliament, and from thence they had their authority. So it was moved that the convention should be dissolved, and a new parliament summoned; for in the joy which accompanied the revolution, men well affected to it were generally chosen; and it was thought that the damp, which was now spread into many parts of the nation, would occasion great changes in a new election. On the other hand, the necessity of affairs was so pressing, that no time was to be lost; a delay of forty days might be the total loss of Ireland, and stop all our preparations at sea; nor was it advisable, in so critical a time, to put the nation into the ferment, which a new election would occasion. And it was reasonable to expect that those who had set the king on the throne would be more zealous to maintain him there than any new set of men could possibly be; and those who submitted to a king, de facto, must likewise submit to a parliament, de facto. So the bill passed; and a day was set for the call of both houses, and for requiring the members to take the oaths.

Eight bishops absented themselves; who were Sancroft of Canterbury, Thomas of Worcester, Lake of Chichester, Turner of Ely, Lloyd of Norwich, Ken of Bath and Wells, Frampton of Gloucester, and White of Peterborough. But, in the meanwhile, that they might recommend themselves by a show of moderation, some of them moved the house of lords, before they withdrew from it, for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehension; and these were drawn and offered by the earl of Nottingham: and, as he said to me, they wore the same that he had prepared for the house of commons in king Charles's time, during the debates of the exclusion; but then things of that kind were looked on as artifices to lay the heat of that time, and to render the church party more popular. After those motions were made, the bishops that were in the house withdrew; Sancroft, Thomas, and Lake, never came; the two last died soon after. Ken was a man of a warm imagination; and, at the time of the king's first landing, he declared heartily for him, and advised all the gentlemen that he saw to go and join with him. But, during the debates in the convention, he went with great heat into the notion of a prince regent. And now, upon the call of the house, he withdrew into his diocese. He changed his mind again, and wrote a paper, persuading the clergy to take the oaths, which he showed to Dr. Whitby, who read it, as the doctor has told me often. His chaplain, Dr. Eyre, did also tell me that he came with him to London, where at first he owned he was resolved to go to the house of lords, and to take these succeeded in supplanting him in the king's favour by Arnold van Keppel, afterwards earl of Albemarle. Bentinck, however, never lost William's highest esteem; on his deathbed he sent for his old supporter; but the power of speech was gone when he arrived, and the prince could only shew his regard by pressing to his breast Bentinck's hand. The earl then withdrew into private life, where he was distinguished for his benevolence and liberality. He died in 1709.—Biog. Britannica; Shrewsbury Correspondence; Noble's continuation of Grainger.

the oaths. But the first day after he came to town, he was prevailed on to change his mind ; and he has continued ever since in a very warm opposition to the government. Sancroft went on in his inactive state, still refusing the oaths, but neither acting nor speaking, except in great confidence, to any against their taking them. These bishops did one thing very inconsistent with their other actions, and that could not be easily reconciled to the rules of good conscience. All presentations are directed to bishops, or to their chancellors ; but, by a general agreement in the year 1660, the bishops resolved to except out of the patents, that they gave their chancellors, the power of giving institution into cures, which before that, the chancellors were empowered to give in the bishop's absence. Now the bishops were bound to see that the clergy, before they gave them institution, took the oaths to the government. In order therefore to decline the doing this, and yet avoid the actions of quare impedit, that they would be liable to, if they did not admit the clerks presented to them, they gave new patents to their chancellors, empowering them to give institution ; which they knew could not be done but by tendering the oaths. So they gave authority to laymen to admit men to benefices, and to do that which they thought unlawful, as was the swearing to an usurper against the lawful king. Thus it appeared, how far the engagement of interest and parties can run men into contradictions.

Upon the bishops refusing the oaths, a bill was brought into the house of commons, requiring all persons to take them by a prefixed day, under several forfeitures and penalties. The clergy that took them not were to fall under suspension for six months, and at the end of those they were to be deprived. This was followed with a particular eagerness by some, who were known enemies to the church : and it was then generally believed, that a great part of the clergy would refuse the oaths. So they hoped to have an advantage against the church by this means. Hambden persuaded the king to add a period to a speech he made, concerning the affairs of Ireland, in which he proposed the admitting all protestants to serve in that war. This was understood to be intended for taking off the sacramental test, which was necessary by the law to qualify men for employments, and was looked on as the chief security the church of England had, as it excluded dissenters from all employments. And it was tried, if a bargain could be made, for excusing the clergy from the oaths, provided the dissenters might be excused from the sacrament. The king put this into his speech, without communicating it to the ministry, and it had a very ill effect. It was not only rejected by a great majority in both houses, but it very much heightened the prejudices against the king, as bearing no great affection to the church of England, when he proposed the opening such a door, which they believed would be fatal to them. The rejecting this made the act imposing the oaths to be driven on with the more zeal. This was in debate when I came into the house of lords ; for Ward, bishop of Salisbury, died this winter : many spoke to the king in my favour, without my knowledge. The king made them no answer ; but a few days after he was set on the throne, he of his own motion named me to that see ; and he did it in terms more obliging than usually fell from him. When I waited on the queen, she said, she hoped I would now put in practice those notions with which I had taken the liberty often to entertain her. All the forms of the cong  -d  lire, and my election, were carried on with dispatch. But a great difficulty was in view. Sancroft would not see me ; and he refused to consecrate me ; so, by law, when the mandate was brought to him, upon not obeying it, he must have been sued in a premunire ; and for some days he seemed determined to venture that ; but, as the danger came near, he prevented it, by granting a commission to all the bishops of his province, or to any three of them, in conjunction with the bishop of London, to exercise his metropolitical authority during pleasure. Thus he did authorise others to consecrate me, while yet he seemed to think it an unlawful act. This was so mean, that he himself was ashamed of it afterwards ; but he took an odd way to overthrow it, for he sent for his original warrant ; and so took it out of the office, and got it into his own hands.

I happened to come into the house of lords, when two great debates were managed with much heat in it. The one was about the toleration and comprehension, and the other was about the imposing the oaths on the clergy. And I was engaged, at my first coming there, to bear a large share in both.

That which was long insisted on, in the house of lords, was, that instead of the clause positively enacting, that the clergy should be obliged to take the oaths, the king might be empowered to tender them, and then the refusal was to be punished according to the clause, as it stood in the act. It was thought such a power would oblige them to their good behaviour, and be an effectual restraint upon them: they would be kept quiet at least by it; whereas, if they came under deprivation, or the apprehensions of it, that would make them desperate, and set them on to undermine the government. It was said, that the clergy, by the offices of the church, did solemnly own their allegiance to God, in the sight of all their people; that no oath could lay deeper engagements on them than those acts of religious worship did; and if they should either pass over those offices, or perform them, otherwise than as the law required, there was a clear method, pursuant to the act of uniformity, to proceed severely against them. It was also said, that in many different changes of government, oaths had not proved so effectual a security as was imagined; distinctions were found out, and senses were put on words, by which they were interpreted so, as to signify but little, when a government came to need strength from them; and it ill became those who had formerly complained of these impositions, to urge this with so much vehemence. On the other hand, it was urged, that no man ought to be trusted by a government, chiefly in so sacred a concern, who would not give security to it; especially, since the oath was brought to such low and general terms. The expedient that was proposed would put a hardship upon the king, which was always to be carefully avoided. The day prefixed was at the distance of some months; so that men had time sufficient given them to study the point: and, if in that time they could not satisfy themselves, as to the lawfulness of acknowledging the government, it was not fit that they should continue in the highest posts of the church. An exception of twelve was proposed, who should be subject to the law, upon refusing the oaths when required to it by the king; but that was rejected; and all the mitigation that was obtained was a power to the king to reserve a third part of the profits of any twelve benefices he should name, to the incumbents who should be deprived by virtue of this act; and so it passed. I was the chief manager of the debate in favour of the clergy, both in the house of lords, and at the conferences with the commons; but, seeing it could not be carried, I acquiesced the more easily; because, though in the beginning of these debates I was assured, that those who seemed resolved not to take the oaths, yet prayed for the king in their chapels; yet I found afterwards this was not true, for they named no king, nor queen, and so it was easy to guess whom they meant by such an indefinite designation. I also heard many things, that made me conclude they were endeavouring to raise all the opposition to the government possible.

The bill of toleration passed easily. It excused dissenters from all penalties for their not coming to church, and for going to their separate meetings. There was an exception of Socinians; but a provision was put in it, in favour of quakers; and, though the rest were required to take the oaths to the government, they were excused upon making in lieu thereof a solemn declaration. They were to take out warrants for the houses they met in; and the justices of peace were required to grant them. Some proposed that the act should only be temporary, as a necessary restraint upon the dissenters, that they might demean themselves so as to merit the continuance of it, when the term of years now offered should end. But this was rejected; there was now an universal inclination to pass the act; but it could not be expected that the nation would be in the same good disposition towards them at another time. I shewed so much zeal for this act, as very much sunk my credit, which had arisen from the approbation I had gained, for opposing that which enacted the taking the oaths. As for the act of comprehension, some progress was made in it; but a proviso was offered, that, in imitation of the acts passed in king Henry the Eighth's and king Edward the Sixth's time, a number of persons, both of the clergy and laity, might be empowered to prepare such a reformation of things, relating to the church, as might be offered to king and parliament, in order to the healing our divisions, and the correcting what might be amiss, or defective, in our constitution. This was pressed with great earnestness by many of the temporal lords. I at that time did imagine, that the clergy would have come into such a design with zeal and unanimity; and I feared this would be looked on by them as taking the matter out of their hands ; and for that reason I argued so warmly against this, that it was carried by a small majority to let it fall. But I was convinced soon after, that I had taken wrong measures, and that the method proposed by these lords was the only one likely to prove effectual ; but this did not so recommend me to the clergy as to balance the censure I came under, for moving, in another proviso of that bill, that the subscription, instead of assent and consent, should only be to submit with a promise of conformity. There was a proviso likewise, in the bill, for dispensing with kneeling at the sacrament, and being baptized with the sign of the cross, to such as, after conference upon those heads, should solemnly protest they were not satisfied as to the lawfulness of them. That concerning kneeling, occasioned a vehement debate ; for the posture being the chief exception that the dissenters had, the giving up this was thought to be the opening a way for them to come into employments : yet it was carried in the house of lords. And I declared myself zealous for it : for, since it was acknowledged that the posture was not essential in itself, and that scruples, how ill grounded soever, were raised upon it, it seemed reasonable to leave the matter as indifferent in its practice as it was in its nature.

Those who had moved for this bill, and afterwards brought it into the house, acted a very disingenuous part ; for, while they studied to recommend themselves by this shew of moderation, they set on their friends to oppose it ; and such as were very sincerely and cordially for it, were represented as the enemies of the church, who intended to subvert it. When the bill was sent down to the house of commons, it was laid on the table ; and, instead of proceeding in it, they made an address to the king, for summoning a convocation of the clergy to attend, according to custom, on the session of parliament. The party that was now beginning to be formed against the government, pretended great zeal for the church, and declared their apprehensions that it was in danger, which was imputed by many to the earl of Nottingham's management. These, as they went heavily into the toleration, so they were much offended with the bill of comprehension, as containing matters relating to the church, in which the representative body of the clergy had not been so much as advised with.

Nor was this bill supported by those who seemed most favourable to the dissenters ; they set it up for a maxim, that it was fit to keep up a strong faction both in church and state ; and they thought it was not agreeable to that, to suffer so great a body as the presbyterians to be made more easy, or more inclinable to unite to the church ; they also thought that the toleration would be best maintained when great numbers should need it, and be concerned to preserve it ; so this good design being zealously opposed, and but faintly promoted, it fell to the ground.

The clergy began now to shew an implacable hatred to the nonconformists, and seemed to wish for an occasion to renew old severities against them ; but wise and good men did very much applaud the quieting the nation by the toleration. It seemed to be suitable, both to the spirit of the Christian religion, and to the interest of the nation. It was thought very unreasonable, that, while we were complaining of the cruelty of the church of Rome, we should fall into such practices among ourselves ; chiefly, while we were engaging in a war, in the progress of which we would need the united strength of the whole nation.

This bill gave the king great content. He in his own opinion always thought, that conscience was God's province, and that it ought not to be imposed on ; and his experience in Holland made him look on toleration as one of the wisest measures of government : he was much troubled to see so much ill humour spreading among the clergy, and by their means over a great part of the nation. He was so true to his principle herein, that he restrained the heat of some who were proposing severe acts against papists. He made them apprehend the advantage which that would give the French, to alienate all the papists of Europe from us ; who from thence might hope to set on foot a new catholic league, and make the war a quarrel of religion ; which might have very bad effects. Nor could he pretend to protect the protestants in many places of Germany, and in Hungary, unless he could cover the papists in England from all severities on the account of their religion. This was so carefully infused into many, and so well understood by them, that the papists have enjoyed the real effects of the toleration, though they were not comprehended within the statute that enacted it.

not likely to pass in the house of lords ; so it was let lie on the table. By this likewise, which was chiefly promoted by the Whigs, the king came to think, that those who had raised him to the throne, intended to depress his prerogative as much as they had exalted his person. He seemed to grow tender and jealous upon these points, the importance of every one of them being much aggravated by the earl of Nottingham, who had furnished him with a scheme of all the points of the prerogative, and of their dependence one upon another ; and he seemed so possessed with this, that many of those who had formerly most of his confidence, found a coldness growing upon him, which increased their disgust, and made them apprehend they should again see a reign full of prerogative maxims. One thing the house of commons granted, which was very acceptable to the king ; they gave the States about 600,000*l.* for the charge they had been at in the fleet and army, which they furnished the king with at the revolution.

They could not be brought to another point, though often and much pressed to it by the king. He thought nothing would settle the minds of the nation so much as an act of indemnity, with proper exceptions of some criminals that should be left to justice. Jeffreys was in the Tower ; Wright, who had been lord chief justice, and some of the judges, were in Newgate ; Graham and Burton, who had been the wicked solicitors in the former reigns, were in prison ; but the hottest of the Whigs would not set this on. They thought it best to keep many under the lash ; they intended severe revenges for the blood that had been shed, and for the many unjust things that had been done in the end of king Charles's reign ; they saw, that the clogging the indemnity, with many comprehensive exceptions, would create king James a great party ; so they did not think it proper to offer at that ; yet they resolved to keep them still in their power till a better opportunity for falling on them should offer itself : therefore they proceeded so slowly in that matter, that the bill could not be brought to a ripeness during this session. It is true the great mildness of the king's temper, and the gentleness of his government, which was indeed rather liable to censure, as being too remiss, set people's minds much at ease ; and, if it gave too much boldness to those who began to set up an open opposition to him, yet it gained upon the greater part of the nation, who saw none of those moving spectacles that had been so common in former reigns ; and all promised themselves happy days under so merciful a prince. But angry men put a wicked construction on the earnestness the king shewed for an act of indemnity : they said, he intended to make use of a set of prerogative men, as soon as legally he could ; and therefore he desired the instruments of king James's illegal government might be once secured, that so he might employ them. The earls of Monmouth and Warrington were infusing jealousies of the king into their party with the same industry that the earl of Nottingham was, at the same time instilling into the king jealousies of them ; and both acted with too much success, which put matters much out of joint ; for though the earls of Shrewsbury and Devonshire did all they could to stop the progress and effects of those suspicions with which the Whigs were possessed, yet they had not credit enough to do it. The earl of Shrewsbury, though he had more of the king's favour, yet he had not strength to resist the earl of Nottingham's pompous and tragical declamations*.

There was a bill of great importance sent up by the commons to the lords, that was not finished this session ; it was a bill, declaring the rights and liberties of England, and the succession to the crown, as had been agreed by both houses of parliament, to the king and queen and their issue ; and after them, to the princess Anne and her issue ; and after these, to the king and his issue. A clause was inserted, disabling all papists from succeeding to the crown ; to which the lords added, " or such as should marry papists." To this I proposed an additional clause, absolving the subjects, in that case, from their allegiance. This was seconded by the earl of Shrewsbury ; and it passed without any opposition, or debate ; which amazed us all, considering the importance of it. But the king ordered me to propose the naming the duchess of Hanover, and her posterity, next in the succession. He signified his pleasure in this also to the ministers ; but he ordered me to begin the motion in the house, because I had already set it on foot. And the duke of Hanover had now other thoughts of the matter, and was separating himself from the interests of France. The lords agreed to the proposition without any opposition; so it was sent down to the commons. There were great debates there upon it. Hambden pressed it vehemently; but Wildman, and all the republican party, opposed it. Their secret reason seemed to be, a design to extinguish monarchy, and therefore to substitute none beyond the three that were named, that so the succession might quickly come to an end. But it not being decent to own this, all that they pretended was, that there being many in the lineal succession, after the three that were named, who were then of the church of Rome, the leaving to them a possibility to succeed, upon their turning protestants, might have a good effect on them, and dispose them to hearken to instruction; all which would be defeated by a declaration in favour of the duchess.

To this it was answered, in a free conference, that for that very reason it was fit to make this declaration; since nothing could bring us into a more certain danger than a pretended conversion of a false convert, who might by such a disguise ascend the throne, and so work our ruin by secret artifices. Both houses adhered, after the free conference: so the bill fell for that time: but it was resolved to take it up at the opening of the next session. And the king thought it was not then convenient to renew the motion of the duchess of Hanover, of which he ordered me to write her a particular account. It was fit once to have the bill passed that enacted the perpetual exclusion of all papists; for that, upon the matter, brought the succession to their door. And if any in the line, before her, should pretend to change, as it was not very likely to happen, so it would not be easily believed. So it was resolved to carry this matter no further at this time. The bill passed without any opposition, in the beginning of the next session, which I mention here, that I might end this matter all at once*. The present session was drawn to a great length, and was not ended till August; and then it broke up with a great deal of ill humour.

One accident happened this summer, of a pretty extraordinary nature, that deserves to be remembered. A fisherman, between Lambeth and Vauxhall, was drawing a net pretty close to the channel, and a great weight was, not without some difficulty, drawn to the shore, which, when taken up, was found to be the great seal of England. King James had called for it from the lord Jeffreys, the night before he went away, as intending to make a secret use of it, for pardons or grants. But it seems, when he went away, he thought either that the bulk or weight of it made it inconvenient to be carried off, or that it was to be hereafter of no more use to him; and therefore, that it might not be made use of against him, he threw it into the Thames. The fisherman was well rewarded when he brought the great seal to the king; and by his order it was broken.

But now I must look over to the affairs of Ireland, and to king James's motions. Upon his coming to the court of France, he was received with great shews of tenderness and respect; the French king assuring him, that, as they had both the same interests, so he would never give over the war, till he had restored him to his throne. The only prospect he now had was to keep up his party in Ireland and Scotland. The message from Tyrconnel, for speedy supplies, was very pressing; and his party in Scotland sent one Lindsay over

* This "immortal bill," as Burke denominates it, is in our code of laws, 1 William and Mary, sess. 2. c. 2. It embodies the declaration of rights presented by both houses of the convention to the prince and princess of Orange, and accepted by them with the crown. It is extraordinary that the clause enacting that the kings and queens of England should take the test oath upon their accession to the crown, and that if any such king or queen embraced the Roman catholic religion, or married a Roman catholic, their subjects should be absolved of their allegiance, passed without any debate. The bill of rights having declared the illegal conduct of James the Second, and his abdication of the throne, enacts, 1. that the king, without the consent of parliament, shall not suspend the operation of any law. 2. That creating new courts of law is illegal. 3. That levying money by the king, unauthorised by parliament, is illegal. 4. That the subject has a right to petition the king. 5. That a standing army, without consent of parliament, cannot be raised or maintained. 6. That protestant subjects may have arms for their defence, suitable to their condition. 7. The election of members of parliament ought to be free. 8. That freedom of speech in parliament cannot be questioned out of parliament. 9. That neither excessive bail, fines, or punishment ought to be inflicted. 10. That jurors should be duly empannelled. 11. That all grants or promises of fines and forfeitures before the party is convicted, are void. 12. That parliaments ought to be held frequently. Concluding with a declaration that the lords and commons "do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises as their undoubted rights and liberties." The declaration of rights is known to have been chiefly drawn up by Mr. Somers, afterwards lord chancellor and known as "the great lord Somers."

to him, to offer him their service, and to ask what assistance they might depend upon. The French ministry was at this time much divided. Louvois had the greatest credit, and was very successful in all his counsels; so that he was most considered; but Seignelay was believed to have more personal favour, and to be more entirely united to madam Maintenon. These two were in a high competition for favour, and hated one another. Seignelay had the marine, as the other had the army, for his province; so, king James having the most dependence on the marine, and looking on the secretary for that post as the most powerful favourite, made his chief application to him; which set Louvois to cross, and retard, every thing that was proposed for his service: so that matters for him went on slowly, and very defectively. There was another circumstance in king James's affairs that did him much hurt. Lauzun, whose adventures will be found in the French history, had come over to king James, and offered him his service, and had attended on the queen when she went over to France. He had obtained a promise of king James, that he should have the command of such forces as the king of France would assist him with. Louvois hated Lauzun; nor did the king of France like to employ him; so Louvois sent to king James, desiring him to ask of the king of France, Souvray, a son of his, whom he was breeding to serve in war, to command the French troops. But king James had so engaged himself to Lauzun, that he thought he could not in honour depart from it. And ever after that, we were told, that Louvois studied, by all the ways he could think of, to disparage him, and all the propositions he made: yet he got about 5,000 Frenchmen to be sent over with him to Ireland, but no great supplies in money. Promises were sent the Scots of great assistance that should be sent them from Ireland: they were encouraged to make all possible opposition in the convention; and, as soon as the season of the year would admit of it, they were ordered to gather together in the Highlands, and to keep themselves in safe places there till further orders should be sent them. With these, and with a small supply in money, of about five or six thousand pounds, for buying ammunition and arms, Lindsay was sent back. I had such a character given me of him, that I entertained good thoughts of him. So, upon his return, he came first to me, and pretended he had gone over on private affairs, being deeply engaged in debt for the earl of Melfort, whose secretary he had been. I understood from him, that king James had left Paris to go for Ireland; so I sent him to the earl of Shrewsbury's office; but there was a secret management with one of the under secretaries there for king James; so he was not only dismissed, but got a pass warrant from Dr. Wynne, to go to Scotland. I had given the earl of Shrewsbury such a character of the man, that he did more easily believe him; but he knew nothing of the pass warrant. So, my easiness to think well of people, was the chief occasion of the mischief that followed, on his not being clapped up, and more narrowly examined. Upon king James's landing in Ireland, he marched his army from Kinsale to Ulster; and, when it was all together, it consisted of 30,000 foot, and 8,000 horse. It is true the Irish were now as insolent as they were undisciplined; and they began to think they must be masters of all the king's counsels. A jealousy arose between them and the French; they were soon on very bad terms, and scarcely ever agreed in their advices: all king James's party, in the isle of Britain, pressed his settling the affairs of Ireland the best he could, and his bringing over the French, and such of the Irish, as he could best govern, and depend on; and advised him to land in the north of England, or in the west of Scotland.

But the first thing that was to be done was to reduce Londonderry. In order to this, two different advices were offered. The one was, to march with a great force, and to take it immediately; for the town was not capable of resisting, if vigorously attacked. The other was, to block it up so, that it should be forced in a little time to surrender; and to turn to other more vigorous designs. But, whereas either of these advices might have been pursued with advantage, a third advice was offered; but I know not by whom, which was the only bad one, that could be proposed; and yet, by a sort of fatality, which hung over that king, it was followed by him; and that was, to press the town by a slow siege, which, as was given out, would bring the Irish into the methods of war, and would accustom them to fatigue and discipline. And this being resolved on, king James sent a small body before it, which was often changed; and by these he continued the siege above two months, in which the poor inhabitants formed themselves into great order, and came to generous resolutions of enduring the last extremities. They made some sallies, in which the Irish always ran away, and left their officers; so that many of their best officers were killed. Those within suffered little, but by hunger, which destroyed nearly two-thirds of their number. One convoy, with two regiments, and provisions, was sent to their relief; but they looked on the service as desperate, being deceived by Lundy, who was the governor of the place, and had undertaken to betray it to king James; but he finding them jealous of him, came to the convoy, and persuaded them that nothing could be done; so they came back, and Lundy with them. Yet the poor inhabitants, though thus forsaken, resolved still to hold out; and sent over such an account of the state they were in, that a second and greater convoy was sent, with about 5,000 men, commanded by Kirk, who, after he came in sight, made not that haste to relieve them that was necessary, considering the misery they were in. They had a river that came up to their town; but the Irish had laid a boom and chains across it, and had planted batteries for defending it: yet a ship sailing up with wind and tide broke through; and so the town was relieved, and the siege raised in great confusion*.

Iniskillen had the same fate: the inhabitants entered into resolutions of suffering any thing, rather than fall into the hands of the Irish; a considerable force was sent against them; but through their courage, and the cowardice of the Irish, they held out.

All this while an army was preparing in England, to be sent over for the reduction of Ireland, commanded by Schomberg, who was made a duke in England, and to whom the parliament gave 100,000 pounds for the services he had done. The levies were carried on in England with great zeal; and the bodies were quickly full. But, though both officers and soldiers shewed much courage and affection to the service, yet they were raw, without experience, and without skill. Schomberg had a quick and happy passage, with about 10,000 men. He landed at Belfast, and brought the forces that lay in Ulster together. His army, when strongest, was not above 14,000 men; and he had not above 2,000 horse. He marched on to Dundalk, and there posted himself. King James came to Ardee, within five or six miles of him, being above thrice his number. Schomberg had not the supplies from England that had been promised him: much treachery, or ravenousness, appeared in many who were employed; and he, finding his numbers so unequal to the Irish, resolved to lie on the defensive. He lay there six weeks in a very rainy season: his men, for want of due care and good management, contracted such diseases, that he lost almost the one-half of his army. Some blamed him for not putting things more to hazard: it was said, that he measured the Irish by their numbers, and not by their want of sense and courage. Such complaints were sent of this to the king, that he wrote twice to him, pressing him to put somewhat to the venture; but he saw the enemy was well posted, and well provided; and he knew they had several good officers among them. If he had pushed matters, and had met with a misfortune, his whole army, and consequently all Ireland, would have been lost; for he could not have made a regular retreat. The sure game was to preserve his army; and that would save Ulster, and keep matters entire for another year. This was censured by some; but better judges thought the managing this campaign as he did, was one of the greatest parts of his life. The Irish made some poor attempts to beat up his quarters; but even where they surprised his men, and were much superior in number, they were so shamefully beat back, that this increased the contempt the English naturally had for them. In the end of October, all went into winter quarters.

* I know not for what reason Burnet omitted to notice the chief instrument in persuading the inhabitants of Londonderry to such a gallant defence, Dr. George Walker. This divine was a native of the county of Tyrone. As soon as he was ordained he obtained the rectory of Donoughmore, where he raised a regiment when James the Second landed. He threw himself and his men into Londonderry as soon as he understood that the ex-king had determined to besiege it. Colonel Lundy, the governor, either a traitor, or a coward, or both, shut himself up in his chamber, and would not interfere in the defence, and was consequently turned out of the town by Mr. Walker; who, in conjunction with Major Baker, was appointed governor. The siege commenced on the 20th of April; the town was miserably fortified, and the besieging army large; yet it was defended for one hundred and five days, and eventually relieved. For his bravery, Walker received the thanks of the house of commons; and the university of Oxford made him a doctor in divinity. He was afterwards nominated to the bishopric of Derry, but accompanying William the Third, was killed at the battle of the Boyne in July 1690. His "True Account of the Siege of Londonderry," is a highly interesting work.—Ware's Works, by Harris; Grey's Parliamentary Debates.

Our operations on the sea were not very prosperous. Herbert was sent with a fleet to cut off the communication between France and Ireland. The French had sent over a fleet with a great transport of stores and ammunition. They had landed their loading, and were returning back. As they came out of Bantry Bay Herbert engaged them. The wind was against him, so that it was not possible for the greatest part of the fleet to come up and enter into action; and so those who were engaged were forced to retire with some disadvantage. But the French did not pursue him. He came back to Portsmouth, in order to refit some of his ships; and went out again, and lay before Brest till the end of summer. But the French fleet did not come out any more all that summer; so that ours lay some months at sea to no purpose. But if we lost few of our seamen in the engagement, we lost a great many by reason of the bad victualling. Some excused this because it was so late in the year before funds were made for it; while others imputed it to base practices, and worse designs. So affairs had everywhere a very melancholy face.

I now turn to give an account of the proceedings in Scotland. A convention of the states was summoned there in the same manner as in England. Duke Hamilton was chosen president. And a letter being offered to them from king James, by Lindsay, they would not receive nor read it; but went on to state the several violations of their constitution and laws made by King James. Upon these it was moved that a judgment should be given, declaring that he had forfeited his right to the crown. Upon this, three parties were formed: one was composed of all the bishops and some of the nobility, who opposed these proceedings against the king, as contrary to their laws and oaths; others thought that their oaths were only to the king as having the executive power to support him in that; but that, if he set himself to invade and assume the legislature, he renounced his former authority by subverting that upon which it was founded. So they were for proceeding to a declaratory judgment: a third party was formed of those who agreed with the former in their conclusion, but not in coming to so speedy a determination. They thought it was the interest of Scotland to be brought under the laws of England, and to be united to the parliament of England; and that this was the properest time for doing that to the best advantage, since England would be obliged by the present state of affairs to receive them upon good terms. They were therefore willing to proceed against king James; but they thought it not reasonable to make too much haste in a new settlement; and were for maintaining the government in an interregnum till the union should be perfected, or at least put in a probable way. This was specious, and many went into it; but, since it tended to the putting a stop to a full settlement, all that favoured king James joined in it; for by this more time was gained. To this project it was objected that the union of the two kingdoms must be a work of time; since many difficulties would arise in any treaty about it; whereas the present circumstances were critical, and required a speedy decision, and quick provision to be made for their security; since, if they continued in such a neutral state, they would have many enemies and no friends: and the zeal that was now working among them for presdytery must raise a greater aversion than ordinary in the body that was for the church of England to any such treaty with them.

While much heat was occasioned by this debate, great numbers came armed from the western counties, on pretence to defend the convention; for the duke of Gordon was still in the castle of Edinburgh, and could have done them much harm, though he lay there in a very inoffensive state. He thought the best thing he could do was to preserve that place long for king James; since to provoke the convention would have drawn a siege and ruin upon him with too much precipitation, while there was not a force in the field ready to come and assist him. So it was said there was no need of such armed companies, and that they were come to over-awe and force the convention.

The earl of Dundee had been at London, and had fixed a correspondence both with England and France; though he had employed me to carry messages from him to the king, to know what security he might expect, if he should go and live in Scotland without owning his government. The king said, if he would live peaceably, and at home, he would protect him. To this he answered, that, unless he were forced to it, he would live quietly. But he went down with other resolutions; and all the party resolved to submit to his command.

Upon his coming to Edinburgh, he pretended he was in danger from those armed multitudes, and so he left the convention; and went up and down the Highlands, and sent his agents about to bring together what force they could gather. This set on the conclusion of the debates of the convention.

They passed the judgment of forfeiture on king James. And on the 11th of April, the day in which the king and queen were crowned with the ordinary solemnities at Westminster, they declared William and Mary king and queen of Scotland. But with this, as they ordered the coronation oath to be tendered to them, so they drew up a claim of rights, which they pretended were the fundamental, and unalterable, laws of the kingdom. By one of these it was declared, that the reformation in Scotland having been begun by a parity among the clergy, all prelacy in that church was a great and insupportable grievance to that kingdom. It was an absurd thing to put this in a claim of rights; for which not only they had no law, but which was contrary to many laws then in being; so that, though they might have offered it as a grievance, there was no colour for pretending it was a national right. But they had a notion among them that every article, that should be put in the claim of rights, became an unalterable law, and a condition upon which the crown was to be held; whereas grievances were such things as were submitted to the king and parliament to be redressed, or not, as they should see cause; but the bishops, and those who adhered to them, having left the convention, the presbyterians had a majority of voices to carry everything as they pleased, how unreasonable soever. And upon this, the abolishing episcopacy in Scotland was made a necessary article of the new settlement.

Soon after the king came to St. James's, the episcopal party there had sent up the dean of Glasgow, whom they ordered to come to me; and I introduced him to the then prince. He was sent to know what his intentions were with relation to them. He answered, he would do all he could to preserve them, granting a full toleration to the presbyterians; but this was in case they concurred in the new settlement of that kingdom; for if they opposed that, and if, by a great majority in parliament, resolutions should be taken against them, the king could not make a war for them; but yet he would do all that was in his power to maintain such of them as should live peaceably in their functions. This he ordered me likewise to write back, in answer to what some bishops and others had written to me upon that subject. But the earl of Dundee, when he went down, possessed them with such an opinion of another speedy revolution, that would be brought about in favour of king James, that they resolved to adhere firmly to his interests. So they declaring in a body with so much zeal, in opposition to the new settlement, it was not possible for the king to preserve that government there; all those who expressed their zeal for him, being equally zealous against that order.

Among those who appeared in this convention none distinguished himself more than sir James Montgomery, a gentleman of good parts, but of a most unbridled heat, and of a restless ambition: he bore the greatest share in the whole debate, and promised himself a great post in the new government. Duke Hamilton presided with great discretion and courage; so that the bringing the settlement so soon to a calm conclusion was chiefly owing to him. A petition of grievances, relating to the lords of the articles, the judges, the coin, and several other matters, was also settled; and three commissioners were sent, one from every state, to the king and queen, with the tender of the crown, with which they were also to tender them the coronation oath and the claim of rights. And when the oath was taken, they were next to offer the petition for the redress of grievances. The three commissioners were, the earl of Argyle for the lords, sir James Montgomery for the knights, or, as they call them, for the barons, and sir John Dalrymple for the boroughs. When the king and queen took the oaths, the king explained one word in the oath, by which he was bound "to repress heresies," that he did not by this bind himself to persecute any for their conscience. And now he was king of Scotland, as well as of England and Ireland.

The first thing to be done was to form a ministry in Scotland, and a council, and to send instructions for turning the convention into a parliament, in which the duke of Hamilton was to represent the king as his commissioner. Before the king had left the Hague, Fagel had so effectually recommended Dalrymple, the father, to him, that he was resolved to rely chiefly on him for advice. And though he had heard great complaints of him, as indeed there was some ground for them, yet, since his son was sent one of the three upon so great a deputation, he concluded from thence that the family was not so much hated as he had been informed: so he continued still to be advised by him. The episcopal party were afraid of Montgomery's being made secretary, from whom they expected nothing but extreme severities; so they set themselves to divert that, and the lord Melvill, who had married the duchess of Monmouth's sister, and had continued from 1600 firm to presbytery, and had been of late forced to leave the kingdom, was looked on as an easy man, who would have credit enough to restrain the fury of that party. So he was made sole secretary of state, which proved a very unhappy step; for, as he was by his principles bigoted to presbytery, and ready to sacrifice every thing to their humours, so he proved to be in all respects a narrow-hearted man, who minded his own interest more than either that of the king or of his country. This choice gave a great distaste, and that was followed by a ministry, in the framing of which he had the chief hand, who were weak and passionate men. All offices were split into commissions, that many might have some share; but it rendered them all contemptible. And though Montgomery had a considerable post offered him, yet his missing that he aimed at stuck deep, and began to work in him an aversion to the king, which broke out afterwards into much fury and plotting against him. Nor did duke Hamilton think that he was considered in the new model of the ministry, as he deserved, and might justly have expected.

The parliament there was opened with much ill humour; and they resolved to carry the redress of grievances very far. Lord Melvill hoped to have gained the presbyterian party, by sending instructions to duke Hamilton to open the session with an act in favour of presbytery; but the majority resolved to begin with their temporal concerns. So the first grievance, to which a redress was desired, was the power of the lords of the articles: that relating so immediately to the parliament itself. The king consented to a proper regulation, as that the number should be enlarged and changed as often as the parliament should desire it, and that the parliament might bring matters before them, though they were rejected by the lords of the articles. This answered all the just complaints that had been made of that part of the constitution; but the king thought it was the interest of the crown to preserve it thus regulated; yet it was pretended that, if the name and shadow of that were still kept up, the parliament would in some time be insensibly brought under all those restraints that were now to be provided against. So they moved to take it quite away. Duke Hamilton wrote long letters both to the king and to the lord Melvill, giving a full account of the progress of an ill humour that was got among them, and of the ill consequence it was likely to have; but he had no answer from the king; and lord Melvill wrote him back dark and doubtful orders: so he took little care how matters went, and was not ill pleased to see them go wrong. The revenue was settled on the king for life; and they raised the money which was necessary for maintaining a small force in that kingdom, though the greatest part of an army of six thousand men was paid by England. But even the presbyterians began to carry their demands high; they proposed to have the king's supremacy and the right of patronage taken away; and they asked so high an authority to their government, that duke Hamilton, though of hims lf indifferent as to those matters, yet would not agree to them. He thought these broke in too much on their temporal concerns, and would establish a tyranny in presbytery that could not be easily borne. He wrote to me very fully on that head, and I took the liberty to speak sometimes to the king on those subjects; my design being chiefly to shelter the episcopal clergy, and to keep the change that was now to be made on such a foot, that a door might still be kept open; but lord Melvill had possessed the king with a notion, that it was necessary for his service that the presbyterians should know that I did not at all meddle in those matters, otherwise they would take up a jealousy of every thing that was done; and that this might make them carry their demands much farther: so I was shut out from all meddling in those matters; and yet I was then and still continued to be much loaded with this prejudice, that I did not study to hinder those changes that were then made in Scotland. And all the king's enemies in England continued still to charge him for the alterations then made in Scotland: though it was not possible, had he been ever so zealous for episcopacy, to have preserved it at that time ; and I could do no more than I did, both for the order itself, and for all those who adhered to it there. A new debate was set on foot in that parliament concerning the judges. By the law there, when the king names a judge, he ought to be examined by other judges, whether he is qualified as the law directs ; but, in the year 1661, because the bench was to be filled with a new set of judges, so that there was none to examine the rest, the nomination the king then made was read in parliament, and, no objection being made to any of them, they did upon that sit and act as judges. It was expected that the same method should be followed at this time. But, instead of that, the king continued such a number of the former judges as was sufficient to examine those who were now to be advanced ; so that was ordered to be done. Upon this, those who opposed every thing pretended that the nomination ought to be made in parliament ; and they had prepared objections against every one that was upon the list ; intending by this to put a public affront on one of the first and most important actions of the king's government. Duke Hamilton had a positive instruction sent him not to suffer this matter to be brought into parliament ; yet he saw the party was so set and so strong that they had a clear majority ; nor did he himself very much approve of the nomination, chiefly that of old Dalrymple, soon after made lord Stair, to be president. So he discontinued the parliament.

But while those animosities were thus fomented, the earl of Dundee had got together a considerable body of gentlemen, with some thousands of Highlanders. He sent several messengers over to Ireland, pressing king James to come either to the north of England, or to Scotland. But at the same time he desired that he would not bring the lord Melfort over with him, or employ him more in Scotch business ; and that he would be contented with the exercise of his own religion. It may be easily supposed that all this went against the grain with king James ; and that the lord Melfort disparaged all the earl of Dundee's undertakings. In this he was much supported by the French near that king, who had it given them in charge (as a main instruction) to keep him up to a high owning of his religion, and of all those who were of it ; and not to suffer him to enter into any treaty, or conditions, with his protestant subjects, by which the papists should in any sort suffer, or be so much as discouraged. The Irish were willing enough to cross the seas to England, but would not consent to the going over to Scotland. So the earl of Dundee was furnished with some small store of arms and ammunition, and had kind promises, encouraging him and all that joined with him.

Mackay, a general officer that had served long in Holland with great reputation, and who was the most pious man that I ever knew in a military way, was sent down to command the army in Scotland. He was one of the best officers of the age, when he had nothing to do but to obey and execute orders ; for he was both diligent, obliging, and brave ; but he was not so fitted for command. His piety made him too apt to mistrust his own sense, and to be too tender, or rather fearful, in anything where there might be a needless effusion of blood. He followed the earl of Dundee's motion, who was less encumbered with cannon and other baggage, and so marched quicker than it was possible for him to follow : his men were for the most part new levied, and without experience ; but he had some old bodies on whom he depended. The heads of the clans among the Highlanders promised to join him ; but most of them went to viscount Dundee. At last, after many marches and motions, they came to an engagement at Killcranky, some few miles above Dunkeld. The ground was narrow, and lord Dundee had the advantage. He broke through Mackay's army, and they ran for it ; and probably, if the earl of Dundee had outlived that day, the victory might have been pursued far ; but a random shot put an end to his life, and to the whole design ; for Mackay rallied his men and made such a stand, that the other side fell into great disorder, and could never be formed again into a considerable body. A fort was soon after built at Innerlochy, which was called Fort William, and served to cut off the communication between the northern and southern Highlanders*.

* Lord Clarendon says that he had it from sir George Mackenzie, that, if James the Second had placed himself at the head of the Scotch Highlanders, while the earl of Dundee was alive, all Scotland would have joined him. But the earl of Melfort's advice and influence ruined his cause.—(Clarendon Correspondence.) John Graham,

During all these public disorders that happened in so many different places, the trade suffered considerably ; for the French, not setting out a fleet any more, sent out so many cruisers and privateers into our seas, that England thereby suffered great losses ; there not being at that time a sufficient number of frigates to convoy and secure the merchantmen. We seemed to be masters at sea, and yet were great losers there.

Affairs went much better on the Rhine. The imperial army, commanded by the Duke of Lorraine, took Mentz, which the French had entered after they took Philipsburg ; the siege was slow and long, but prosperous in its conclusion ; and by this means Franconia, which before lay exposed, was now covered. The elector of Brandenburg came down with an army, and cleared the archbishopric of Cologne, which was before possessed by French garrisons. Keizerwart and Bonn held him some time ; but the rest were soon taken. So now the Rhine was open all up to Mentz. Nothing passed in Flanders, where prince Waldeck commanded : and the campaign ended without any misfortunes on that side.

I now return to the affairs of England during the recess. The clergy generally took the oaths, though with too many reservations and distinctions, which laid them open to severe censures, as if they had taken them against their conscience. The king was suspected by them by reason of the favour shewn to dissenters, but chiefly for his abolishing episcopacy in Scotland, and his consenting to the setting up presbytery there. This gave some credit to the reports that were with great industry infused into many of them of the king's coldness at best, if not his aversion, to the church of England. The leading men in both universities, chiefly Oxford, were possessed with this ; and it began to have very ill effects over all England. Those who did not carry this so far as to think, as some said they did, that the church was to be pulled down, yet said a latitudinarian party was likely to prevail and to engross all preferments. These were thought less bigoted to outward ceremonies ; so now it was generally spread about that men zealous for the church would be neglected, and that those who were more indifferent in such matters would be preferred. Many of the latter had managed the controversies with the church of Rome with so much clearness and with that success, that the papists, to revenge themselves, and to blast those whom they considered as their most formidable enemies, had cast aspersions on them as Socinians, and as men that denied all mysteries. And now some angry men at Oxford, who apprehended that those divines were likely to be most considered in this reign, took up the same method of calumny, and began to treat them as Socinians. The earl of Clarendon and some of the bishops, who had already incurred the suspension for not taking the oaths to the government, took much ill-natured pains to spread these slanders. Six bishoprics happened to fall within this year : Salisbury, Chester, Bangor, Worcester, Chichester, and Bristol ; so that the king named six bishops within six months. And the persons promoted to these sees were generally men of those principles. The proceedings in Scotland cast a great load on the king ; he could not hinder the change of the government of that church without putting all his affairs in great disorder. The episcopal party went almost universally into king James's interests ; so that the presbyterians were the only party that the king had in that kingdom. The king did indeed assure us, and myself in particular, that he would restrain and moderate the violence of the presbyterians. Lord Melvill did also promise the same thing very solemnly ; and at first he seemed much set upon it. But when he saw so great a party formed against himself ; and, since many of the presbyterians inclined to favour them, and to set themselves in an opposition to the court, he thought it was the king's interest, or at least his own, to engage that party entirely ; and he found nothing could do that so effectually as to abandon the ministers of the episcopal persuasion to their fury. He set up the earl of Crawford as the head of his party, who was passionate in his temper, and was out of measure zealous in his principles : he was chosen to be the president of the parliament. He received and encouraged all the complaints that were made of the episcopal ministers ; the convention, when they had passed the votes declaring the king and queen, ordered a proclamation to be viscount Dundee, was a frank, talented, noble-minded, man. After he had received his death wound at Killcranky, he asked how the victory was inclining ? and, being told " All is well "—"Then," he replied, " I am

read the next Sunday in all the churches of Edinburgh, and in all the other churches in the kingdom by a certain prefixed day ; but which was so near at hand that it was scarcely possible to lay proclamations all round the nation within the time ; and it was absolutely impossible for the clergy to meet together, and come to any resolution among themselves. For the most part the proclamations were not brought to the ministers till the morning of the Sunday in which they were ordered to be read ; so this having the face of a great change of principles, many could not on the sudden resolve to submit to it ; some had not the proclamations brought to them till the day was past ; many of these read it the Sunday following. Some of those who did not think fit to read the proclamation, yet obeyed it ; and continued, after that, to pray for the king and queen. Complaints were brought to the council of all those who had not read, nor obeyed, the proclamation ; and they were in a summary way deprived of their benefices. In the executing this, lord Crawford shewed much eagerness and violence. Those who did not read the proclamation on the day appointed had no favour, though they did it afterwards. And upon any word that fell from them, either in their extemporary prayers or sermons, that shewed disaffection to the government, they were also deprived. All these things were published up and down England, and much aggravated ; and raised the aversion that the church had to the presbyterians so high, that they began to repent their having granted a toleration to a party that, where they prevailed, showed so much fury against those of the episcopal persuasion. So that such of us as had laboured to excuse the change that the king was forced to consent to, and had promised in his name great moderation towards our friends in that kingdom, were much out of countenance, when we saw the violence with which matters were carried there. These things concurred to give the clergy such ill impressions of the king that we had little reason to look for success in a design that was then preparing for the convocation, for whom a summons was issued out to meet during the next session of parliament.

It was told in the history of the former reign that the clergy did then express an inclination to come to a temper with relation to the presbyterians, and such other dissenters as could be brought into a comprehension with the church ; the bishops had mentioned it in their petition to king James, for which they were tried ; and his present majesty had promised to endeavour an union between the church and the dissenters, in that declaration that he brought over with him ; but it seemed necessary to prepare and digest that matter carefully, before it should be offered to the convocation. Things of such a nature ought to be judged of by a large number of men, but must be prepared by a smaller number well chosen ; yet it was thought a due respect to the church to leave the matter wholly in the hands of the clergy. So, by a special commission under the great seal, ten bishops and twenty divines were empowered to meet, and prepare such alterations in the Book of Common Prayer and Canons as might be fit to lay before the convocation. This was become necessary, since by the submission which the clergy in convocation made to king Henry the Eighth, which was confirmed in parliament, they bound themselves not to attempt any new canons without obtaining the king's leave first, and that under the pains of a premunire. It was looked on, therefore, as the properest way, to obtain the king's leave to have a scheme of the whole matter put in order by a number of bishops and divines ; great care was taken to name these so impartially, that no exceptions could lie against any of them ; they upon this sat closely to it for several weeks ; they had before them all the exceptions that either the puritans before the war, or the nonconformists since the restoration, had made to any part of the church service ; they had also many propositions and advices that had been offered, at several times, by many of our bishops and divines upon those heads ; matters were well considered and freely and calmly debated ; and all was digested into an entire correction of every thing that seemed liable to any just objection. We had some very rigid, as well as some very learned, men among us ; though the most rigid either never came to our meetings, or they soon withdrew from us, declaring themselves dissatisfied with every thing of that nature : some telling us plainly that they were against all alterations whatsoever. They thought too much was already done for the dissenters in the toleration that was granted them ; but that they would do nothing to make that still easier. They said further that the altering the customs and constitution of our church, to gratify a peevish and obstinate party, was likely to have no other effect on them but to make them more insolent : as if the church, by offering these alterations, seemed to confess that she had been hitherto in the wrong. They thought this attempt would divide us among ourselves, and make our people lose their esteem for the liturgy, if it appeared that it wanted correction. They also excepted to the manner of preparing matters by a special commission, as limiting the convocation, and imposing upon it ; and to load this with a word of an ill sound, they called this a new ecclesiastical commission. But, in answer to all this, it was said, that if by a few corrections or explanations we offered all just satisfaction to the chief objections of the dissenters, we had reason to hope that this would bring over many of them, at least of the people, if not of the teachers among them ; or, if the prejudices of education wrought too strongly upon the present age, yet, if some more sensible objections were put out of the way, we might well hope that it would have a great effect on the next generation. If these condescensions were made so as to own, in the way of offering them, that the non-conformists had been in the right, that might turn to the reproach of the church ; but, such offers being made only in regard to their weakness, the reproach fell on them : as the honour accrued to the church, who showed herself a true mother by her care to preserve her children. It was not offered that the ordinary posture of receiving the sacrament kneeling should be changed : that was still to be the received and favoured posture ; only such as declared they could not overcome their scruples in that matter were to be admitted to it in another posture. Ritual matters were of their own nature indifferent, and had been always declared to be so ; all the necessity of them arose only from the authority in church and state that had enacted them. Therefore it was an unreasonable stiffness to deny any abatement, or yielding in such matters, in order to the healing the wounds of our church. Great alterations had been made in such things in all the ages of the church. Even the church of Rome was still making some alterations in her rituals. And changes had been made among ourselves, often since the reformation, in king Edward's, queen Elizabeth's, king James's, and king Charles the Second's reigns. These were always made upon some great turn : critical times being the most proper for designs of that kind. The toleration now granted seemed to render it more necessary than formerly to make the terms of communion with the church as large as might be, that so we might draw over to us the greater number from those who might now leave us more safely ; and therefore we were to use the more care in order to gaining of them. And, as for the manner of preparing these overtures, the king's supremacy signified little if he could not appoint a select number to consider of such matters as he might think fit to lay before the convocation. This did no way break in upon their full freedom of debate ; it being free to them to reject, as well as to accept of, the propositions that should be offered to them. But while men were arguing this matter on both sides, the party that was now at work for king James took hold of this occasion to inflame men's minds. It was said the church was to be pulled down, and presbytery was to be set up : that all this now in debate was only intended to divide and distract the church, and to render it by that means both weaker and more ridiculous, while it went off from its former grounds in offering such concessions. The universities took fire upon this, and began to declare against it, and against all that promoted it, as men that intended to undermine the church. Severe reflections were cast on the king, as being in an interest contrary to the church ; for the church was as the word, given out by the jacobite party, under which they thought they might more safely shelter themselves. Great canvassings were every where in the elections of convocation men ; a thing not known in former times ; so that it was soon very visible that we were not in a temper cool or calm enough to encourage the further prosecuting such a design.

When the convocation was opened, the king sent them a message by the earl of Nottingham, assuring them of his constant favour and protection, and desiring them to consider such things, as by his order should be laid before them, with due care and an impartial zeal for the peace and good of the church. But the lower house of convocation expressed a resolution not to enter into any debates with relation to alterations ; so that they would take no notice of the second part of the king's message ; and it was not without difficulty carried to make a decent address to the king, thanking him for his promise of protection. But because in the draught which the bishops sent them they acknowledged the protection that the protestant religion in general, and the church of England in particular, had received from him, the lower house thought that this imported their owning some common union with the foreign protestants ; so they would not agree to it. There was at this time but a small number of bishops in the upper house of convocation, and they had not their metropolitans with them ; so they had not strength nor authority to set things forward. Therefore they advised the king to suffer the session to be discontinued. And thus, seeing they were in no disposition to enter upon business, they were kept from doing mischief by prorogations for a course of ten years. This was in reality a favour to them ; for, ever since the year 1662, the convocation had indeed continued to sit, but to do no business ; so that they were kept at no small charge in town to do nothing, but only to meet and read a Latin litany. It was therefore an ease to be freed from such an attendance to no purpose. The ill reception that the clergy gave the king's message raised a great and just outcry against them ; since all the promises made in king James's time were now so entirely forgotten.

But there was a very happy direction of the providence of God observed in this matter. The jacobite clergy, who were then under suspension, were designing to make a schism in the church, whensoever they should be turned out and their places should be filled up by others. They saw it would not be easy to make a separation upon a private and personal account, they therefore wished to be furnished with more specious pretences ; and, if we had made alterations in the Rubric and other parts of the Common Prayer, they would have pretended that they still stuck to the ancient church of England, in opposition to those who were altering it and setting up new models ; and, as I do firmly believe that there is a wise providence that watches upon human affairs and directs them, chiefly those that relate to religion ; so I have with great pleasure observed this in many instances relating to the revolution. And upon this occasion I could not but see that the jacobites among us, who wished and hoped that we should have made those alterations which they reckoned would have been of great advantage for serving their ends, were the instruments of raising such a clamour against them, as prevented their being made. For by all the judgments we could afterwards make, if we had carried a majority in the convocation for alterations, they would have done us more hurt than good.

I now turn to a more important, as well as a more troublesome, scene. In winter a session of parliament met full of jealousy and ill humour. The ill conduct of affairs was imputed chiefly to the lord Halifax ; so the first attack was made on him. The duke of Bolton made a motion in the house of lords for a committee to examine who had the chief hand in the severities and executions in the end of king Charles's reign, and in the quo warrantos, and the delivering up the charters ; the enquiry lasted some weeks, and gave occasion to much heat ; but nothing appeared that could be proved, upon which votes or addresses could have been grounded ; yet the lord Halifax having during that time concurred with the ministry in council, he saw it was necessary for him to withdraw now from the ministers, and quit the court. And soon after he reconciled himself to the Tories and became wholly theirs ; he opposed every thing that looked favourably towards the government, and did upon all occasions serve the jacobites, and protect the whole party. But the Whigs began to lose much of the king's good opinion by the heat that they showed in both houses against their enemies, and by the coldness that appeared in every thing that related to the public, as well as to the king in his own particular. He expressed an earnest desire to have the revenue of the crown settled on him for life. He said he was not a king till that was done, without that the title of a king was only a pageant. And he spoke of this with more than ordinary vehemence ; so that sometimes he said he would not stay and hold an empty name, unless that was done ; he said once to myself he understood the good of a commonwealth, as well as of a kingly government : and it was not easy to determine which was best ; but he was sure the worst of all governments was that of a king without treasure and without power. But a jealousy was now infused into many, that he would grow arbitrary in his government, if he once had the revenue ; and would strain for a high stretch of prerogative as soon as he was out of difficulties and necessities. Those of the Whigs who had lived some years at Amsterdam, had got together a great many stories, that went about the City, of his sullenness and imperious way of dictating ; the Scotch, who were now come up to give an account of the proceedings in parliament, set about many things that heightened their apprehensions. One Simpson, a Scotch presbyterian, was recommended to the earl of Portland as a man whom he might trust, who would bring him good intelligence ; so he was often admitted, and was entertained as a good spy ; but he was in a secret confidence with one Nevill Payne, the most active and dexterous of all king James's agents, who had indeed lost the reputation of an honest man entirely, and yet had such arts of management that even those who knew what he was were willing to employ him. Simpson and he were in a close league together, and he discovered so much of their most secret intelligence to Simpson, that he might carry it to the earl of Portland, as made him pass for the best spy the court had. When he had gained great credit, he made use of it to infuse into the earl of Portland jealousies of the king's best friends ; and as the earl of Portland hearkened too attentively to these, so by other hands it was conveyed to some of them, that the court was now become jealous of them, and was seeking evidence against them.

Sir James Montgomery was easily possessed with these reports, and he and some others, by Payne's management, fell a treating with king James's party in England ; they demanded an assurance for the settlement of presbytery in Scotland, and to have the chief posts of the government shared among them. Princes in exile are apt to grant every thing that is asked of them : for they know that if they are restored they will have everything in their power ; upon this they entered into a close treaty for the way of bringing all this about. At first they only asked money for furnishing themselves with arms and ammunition ; but afterwards they insisted on demanding three thousand men to be sent over from Dunkirk ; because, by duke Schomberg's being posted in Ulster, their communication with Ireland was cut off. In order to the carrying on this design, they reconciled themselves to the duke of Queensbury, and the other lords of the episcopal party ; and on both sides it was given out that this union of those who were formerly such violent enemies, was only to secure and strengthen their interest in parliament, the episcopal party pretending, that since the king was not able to protect them, they, who saw themselves marked out for destruction, were to be excused for joining with those who could secure them. Simpson brought an account of all this to the earl of Portland, and was pressed by him to find out witnesses to prove it against Montgomery : he carried this to them, and told them that the whole business was discovered, and that great rewards were offered to such as would merit them by swearing against them. With this they alarmed many of their party, who did not know what was at bottom, and thought that nothing was designed but an opposition to lord Melvill and lord Stair ; and they were possessed with a fear that a new bloody scene of sham plots and suborned witnesses was to be opened. And when it began to be whispered about that they were in treaty with king James, that appeared to be so little credible, that it began to be said by some discontented men, what could be expected from a government that was so soon contriving the ruin of its best friends ? Some feared that the king himself might too easily receive such reports ; and that the common practices of ministers, who study to make their masters believe that all their own enemies are likewise his, were likely to prevail in this reign as much as they had formerly done. Montgomery came to have great credit with some of the whigs in England, particularly with the earl of Monmouth and the duke of Bolton ; and he employed it all to persuade them not to trust the king, and to animate them against the earl of Portland ; this wrought so much, that many were disposed to think they could have good terms from king James ; and that he was now so convinced of former errors, that they might safely trust him. The earl of Monmouth let this out to myself twice, but in a strain that looked like one who was afraid of it, and who endeavoured to prevent it ; but he set forth the reasons for it with great advantage, and those against it very faintly. Matters were trusted to Montgomery and Payne ; and Ferguson was taken into it, as a man that naturally loved to embroil things. So a design was managed, first to alienate the city of London so entirely from the king, that no loans might be advanced on the money bills ; which, without credit upon them, could not answer the end for which they were given. It was set about that king James would give a full indemnity for all that was past; and that, for the future, he would separate himself entirely from the French interest, and be contented with a secret connivance at those of his own religion. It was said he was weary of the insolence of the French court, and saw his error in trusting to it so much as he had done. This corrupted party had gone so far, that they seemed to fancy that the restoring him would be not only safe but happy to the nation. I confess it was long before I could let myself think that the matter was gone so far; but I was at last convinced of it.

I received a letter from an unknown hand, with a direction how to answer it: the substance of it was, that he could discover a plot deeply laid against the king, if he might be assured not to be made a witness, and to have his friends, who were in it, pardoned. By the king's order, I promised the first; but an indefinite promise of pardon was too much to ask; he might, as to that, trust to the king's mercy. Upon this he came to me, and I found he was Montgomery's brother. He told me a treaty was settled with king James, articles were agreed on, and an invitation was subscribed, by the whole cabal, to king James, to come over, which was to be sent to the court of France; both because the communication was easier and less watched when it went through Flanders than with Ireland, and to let the court see how strong a party he had, and by that means to obtain the supplies and force that was desired. He said he saw the writing and some hands to it; but he knew many more were to sign it; and he undertook to put me in a method to seize on the original paper. The king could not easily believe the matter had gone so far; yet he ordered the earl of Shrewsbury to receive such advices as I should bring him, and immediately to do what was proper; so, a few days after this, Montgomery told me one Williamson was that day gone to Dover with the original invitation; I found the earl of Shrewsbury inclined enough to suspect Williamson. He had for some days solicited a pass for Flanders, and had got some persons, of whom it was not proper to show a suspicion, to answer for him. So one was sent post after him, with orders to seize him in his bed, and to take his clothes and portmanteau from him, which were strictly examined; but nothing was found. Yet upon the news of this the party was grievously affrighted, but soon recovered themselves; the true secret of which was afterwards discovered. Simpson was, it seems, to go over with Williamson; but first to ride to some houses that were in the way to Dover; whereas the other went directly in the stage-coach. It was thought safest for Simpson to carry these papers; for there were many different invitations, as they would not trust their hands to one common paper. Simpson came to the house at Dover, where Williamson was in the messenger's hands; thereupon he went away immediately to Deal, and hired a boat, and got safe to France with his letters. Montgomery finding that nothing was discovered by the way which he had directed me to, upon that fancied he would be despised by us, and perhaps suspected by his own side, and went over soon after and turned papist: but I know not what became of him afterwards. The fear of this discovery soon went off; Simpson came back with large assurances; and 12,000*l.* were sent to the Scotch, who undertook to do great matters. All pretended discoveries were laughed at, and looked on as the fictions of the court; and upon this the city of London was generally possessed with a very ill opinion of the king. The house of commons granted the supplies that were demanded for the reduction of Ireland, and for the quota to which the king was obliged by his alliances; and they continued the gift of the revenue for another year. But one great error was committed by the court in accepting remote funds; whereby the interest of the money then advanced on a fund, payable at the distance of some years, did not only eat up a great deal of the sum, but seemed so doubtful, that great premiums were to be offered to those who advanced money upon a security, which was thought very contingent; since few believed that the government would last so long. So here was a shew of great supplies, which yet brought not in the half of what they were estimated at.

The torics seeing the whigs grow sullen, and that they would make no advances of money, began to treat with the court, and promised great advances, if the parliament might be dissolved and a new one be summoned. Those propositions came to be known; so the house of commons prepared a bill, by which they hoped to have made sure of all future parliaments: in it they declared that corporations could not be forfeited, nor their charters surrendered; and they enacted, that all mayors and recorders who had been concerned in the private delivering up of charters, without the consent of the whole body, and who had done that in a clandestine manner before the judgment that was given against the charter of London, should be turned out of all corporations, and be incapable of bearing office in them for six years. This was opposed in the house of commons by the whole strength of the tory party; for they saw the carrying it was the total ruin of their interest through the whole kingdom. They said a great deal against the declaratory part; but whatsoever might be in that, they said, since the thing had been so universal, it seemed hard to punish it with such severity; it was said that, by this means, the party for the church would be disgraced, and that the corporations would be cast into the hands of dissenters. And now both parties made their court to the king: the whigs promised every thing that he desired, if he would help them to get this bill passed; and the tories were not wanting in their promises, if the bill should be stopped and the parliament dissolved. The bill was carried in the house of commons by a great majority; when it was brought up to the lords, the first point in debate was upon the declaratory part, whether a corporation could be forfeited or surrendered? Holt and two other judges were for the affirmative, but all the rest were for the negative. No precedents for the affirmative were brought higher than the reign of king Henry the Eighth, in which the abbey's were surrendered; which was at that time so great a point of state, that the authority of these precedents seemed not clear enough for regular times. The house was so equally divided, that it went for the bill only by one voice; after which, little doubt was made of the passing the act. But now the applications of the tories were much quickened; they made the king all possible promises: and the promoters of the bill saw themselves exposed to the corporations, which were to feel the effects of this bill so sensibly, that they made as great promises on their part. The matter was now at a critical issue: the passing the bill put the king and the nation in the hands of the whigs; as the rejecting it, and dissolving the parliament upon it, was such a trusting to the tories, and such a breaking with the whigs, that the king was long in suspense what to do.

He was once very near a desperate resolution: he thought he could not trust the tories, and he resolved he would not trust the whigs; so he fancied the tories would be true to the queen, and confide in her, though they would not in him. He therefore resolved to go over to Holland, and leave the government in the queen's hands; so he called the marquis of Carnarthen, with the earl of Shrewsbury and some few more, and told them he had a convoy ready, and was resolved to leave all in the queen's hands; since he did not see how he could extricate himself out of the difficulties into which the animosities of parties had brought him: they pressed him vehemently to lay aside all such desperate resolutions, and to comply with the present necessity. Much passion appeared among them: the debate was so warm, that many tears were shed; in conclusion, the king resolved to change his first design into another better resolution of going over in person to put an end to the war in Ireland. This was told me some time after by the earl of Shrewsbury; but the queen knew nothing of it till she had it from me: so reserved was the king to her, even in a matter that concerned her so nearly. The king's design of going to Ireland came to be seen by the preparations that were ordered; but a great party was formed in both houses to oppose it. Some did really apprehend the air of Ireland would be fatal to so weak a constitution; and the jacobites had no mind that king James should be so much pressed as he would probably be if the king went against him in person. It was by concert proposed in both houses on the same day to prepare an address to the king against this voyage; so the king, to prevent that, came the next day and prorogued the parliament; and that was soon after followed by a dissolution.

This session had not raised all the money that was demanded for the following campaign, so it was necessary to issue out writs immediately for a new parliament. There was a great struggle all England over in elections; but the corporation bill did so highly provoke all those whom it was to have disgraced, that the tories were by far the greater number in the new parliament. One thing was a part of the bargain that the tories had made, that the lieutenancy of London should be changed; for, upon the king's coming to the crown, he had given a commission, out of which they were all excluded; which was such a mortification to them, that they said they could not live in the City with credit, unless some of them were again brought into that commission. The king recommended it to the bishop of London, to prepare a list of those who were known to be churchmen, but of the more moderate, and of such as were liable to no just exception; that so the two parties in the city might be kept in a balance. The bishop brought a list of the most violent tories in the City, who had been engaged in some of the worst things that passed in the end of king Charles's reign. A committee of council was appointed to examine the list; but it was so named that they approved of it. This was done to the great grief of the whigs, who said that the king was now putting himself in his enemies' hands; and that the arms of the City were now put under a set of officers, who, if there was a possibility of doing it without hazard, would certainly use them for king James. This matter was managed by the marquis of Carmarthen and the earl of Nottingham; but opposed by the earl of Shrewsbury, who was much troubled at the ill conduct of the whigs, but much more at this great change in the king's government. The elections of parliament went generally for men who would probably have declared for king James, if they could have known how to manage matters for him. The king made a change in the ministry to give them some satisfaction; the earls of Monmouth and Warrington were both dismissed; other lesser changes were made in inferior places; so that whig and tory were now pretty equally mixed; and both studied to court the king, by making advances upon the money bills.

The first great debate arose in the house of lords, upon a bill that was brought in acknowledging the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful sovereigns, and declaring all the acts of the last parliament to be good and valid. The first part passed with little contradiction, though some excepted to the words rightful and lawful as not at all necessary. But the second article bore a long and warm debate. The tories offered to enact that these should be all good laws for the time to come, but opposed the doing it in the declaratory way. They said it was one of the fundamentals of our constitution that no assembly should be called a parliament, unless it was called and chosen upon the king's writ. On the other hand, it was said, that whatsoever tended to the calling the authority of that parliament in question, tended likewise to the weakening of the present government, and brought the king's title into question. A real necessity upon such extraordinary occasions must supersede forms of law: otherwise the present government was under the same nullity. Forms were only rules for peaceable times; but, in such a juncture, when all that had a right to come, either in person, or by their representatives, were summoned and freely elected; and when, by the king's consent, the convention was turned to a parliament, the essentials, both with relation to king and people, were still maintained in the constitution of that parliament. After a long debate, the act passed in the house of lords, with this temper, declaring and enacting that the acts of that parliament were, and are, good and valid; many lords protesting against it: at the head of whom was the earl of Nottingham, notwithstanding his great office at court. It was expected that great and long debates should have been made in the house of commons upon this act. But, to the wonder of all people, it passed in two days in that house, without any debate or opposition. The truth was, the tories had resolved to commit the bill; and, in order to that, some trifling exceptions were made to some words that might want correction; for bills are not committed unless some amendments are offered; and, when it was committed, it was then resolved to oppose it. But one of them discovered this too early, for he questioned the legality of the convention, since it was not summoned by writ. Somers, then solicitor general, answered this with great spirit: he said, if that was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high treason: the laws repealed by it were still in force, so they must presently return to king James: all the money levied, collected, and paid, by virtue of the acts of that parliament, made every one that was concerned in it highly criminal. This he spoke with much zeal, and such an ascendant of authority, that none was prepared to answer it; so the bill passed without any more opposition. This was a great service, done in a very critical time, and contributed not a little to raise Somers's character.

The speaker of the house of commons, sir John Trevor, was a bold and dexterous man, and knew the most effectual ways of recommending himself to every government. He had been in great favour in king James's time, and was made master of the rolls by him ; and, if lord Jefferies had stuck at anything, he was looked on as the man likeliest to have had the great seal. He now got himself to be chosen speaker, and was made first commissioner of the great seal. Being a tory in principle, he undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money as might purchase some votes ; and by him began the practice of buying off men, in which hitherto the king had kept to stricter rules *. I took the liberty once to complain to the king of this method. He said, he hated it as much as any man could do ; but he saw it was not possible, considering the corruption of the age, to avoid it, unless he would endanger the whole.

The house of commons gave the king the customs for five years, which they said made it a surer fund for borrowing money upon, than if they had given it for life : the one was subject to accidents, but the other was more certain. They also continued the other branches of the revenue for the same number of years. It was much pressed to have it settled for life ; but it was taken up as a general maxim, that a revenue for a certain and short term was the best security that the nation could have for frequent parliaments. The king did not like this. He said to myself, why should they entertain a jealousy of him, who came to save their religion and liberties, when they trusted king James so much, who intended to destroy both ? I answered, they were not jealous of him, but of those who might succeed him ; and if he would accept of the gift for a term of years, and settle the precedent, he would be reckoned the deliverer of succeeding ages, as well as of the present ; and it was certain that king James would never have run into those counsels that ruined him, if he had obtained the revenue only for a short term ; which probably would have been done, if Argyle's and Monmouth's invasions had not so overawed the house, that it would then have looked like being in a conspiracy with them to have opposed the king's demand. I saw the king was not pleased, though he was persuaded to accept of the grant thus made him. The commons granted a poll bill, with some other supplies, which they thought would answer all the occasions of that year ; but as what they gave did not quite come up to what was demanded, so when the supply was raised, it came far short of what they estimated it at. So that there were great deficiencies to be taken care of in every session of parliament, which ran up every year, and made a great noise, as if the nation was through mismanagement running into a great arrear. An act passed in this session, putting the administration in the queen, during the king's absence out of the kingdom, but with this proviso, that the orders which the king sent should always take place. In all this debate the queen seemed to take no notice of the matter, nor of those who had appeared for it, or against it.

* Sir John Trevor was a native of Denbighshire. His mother was aunt to lord chancellor Jeffreys ; and he is suspected to have been more intimate with his cousin's wife than either her husband or morality approved. Like Jeffreys, his career commenced humbly ; he was clerk to a relative, a lawyer in the Temple, and became an adept in "the knavish part of the law," which rendered him of singular service to the gamblers whose society he frequented. The two cousins appear to have been equally able, and equally corrupt. Trevor was knighted by Charles the Second in 1671 ; was made solicitor-general and master of the rolls on the death of sir John Churchill ; and a privy councillor in 1688. Jeffreys, at length, appears to have become jealous of Trevor's distinction ; but the latter not only baffled his efforts to humble him, but would probably have supplanted the chancellor, if James had not abdicated the throne. Even then Trevor remained in favour ; the mastership of the rolls was indeed taken from him for a short time, but he was continued speaker of the house of commons ; and presided as chief commissioner of the great seal until Somers was elevated to the chancellorship. The most painful disgrace that ever fell upon him was for accepting 1000*l.* from the city of London, to patronise a bill to satisfy the orphanage debts. After sitting for six hours, and listening to the vituperation of the members of the house over which he presided, he actually had to put the question against himself, and had to announce the gratifying vote that "Sir John Trevor was guilty of corrupt bribery." He never sat again as speaker ; yet he was never impeached, which enabled some wit to observe of him, as he squinted miserably, that "Justice was blind, but Bribery only squints." Tillotson and he were not friends ; meeting that prelate near the house of lords, he audibly muttered, "I hate a fanatic in lawn sleeves." "I hate a knave in any sleeves," retorted the bishop. Trevor was notoriously penurious, of which the following is an instance. One day, when taking his wine, the footman ushered a relative into the room. "You rascal," said Trevor to the servant, "how dare you bring my cousin Roderic Lloyd, esq., prothonotary of North Wales, marshal to baron Price, and so forth, and so forth, up my back stairs ? Take my cousin, Roderic Lloyd, esq., prothonotary of North Wales, marshal to baron Price, and so forth, and so forth—take him instantly back down my back stairs, and bring him up my front stairs." Remonstrance was vain ; but, whilst the grande entrée was being effected, Trevor removed the wine and glasses. He died at his house in Clement's Lane, during the year 1717.—York's Royal Tribes of Wales ; North's Life of L. K. Guildford ; Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys.

The house of commons, to the great grief of the whigs, made an address to the king, thanking him for the alterations he had made in the lieutenancy of London.

But the greatest debate in this session was concerning an abjuration of king James : some of the tories were at first for it, as were all the whigs ; the clergy were excepted out of it, to soften the opposition that might be made. But still the main body of the tories declared they would never take any such oath ; so they opposed every step that was made in it, with a great copiousness of long and vehement arguing. They insisted much on this, that when the government was settled, oaths were made to be the ties of the subject to it, and that all new impositions were a breach made on that which might be called the original contract of the present settlement : things of that kind ought to be fixed and certain, and not mutable and endless : by the same reason that the abjuration was now proposed, another oath might be prepared every year ; and every party that prevailed in parliament would bring in some discriminating oath, or test, such as could only be taken by those of their own side : and thus the largeness and equality of government would be lost and contracted into a faction. On the other side, it was said, that this was only intended to be a security to the government during the war ; for in such a time it seemed necessary, that all who were employed by the government should give it all possible security : it was apparent that the comprehensive words in the oaths of allegiance had given occasion to much equivocation ; many who had taken them having declared, which some had done in print, that they considered themselves as bound by the oaths, only while the king continued in peaceable possession, but not to assist or support his title if it was attacked or shaken : it was therefore necessary that men in public trusts should be brought under stricter ties. The abjuration was debated in both houses at the same time. I concurred with those that were for it. The whigs pressed the king to set it forward : they said, every one who took it would look on himself as impardonable, and so would serve him with the more zeal and fidelity ; whereas those that thought the right to the crown was still in king James, might perhaps serve faithfully as long as the government stood firm ; but as they kept still measures with the other side, to whom they knew they would be always welcome, so they would never act with that life and zeal which the present state of affairs required. At the same time, the tories were as earnest in pressing the king to stop the further progress of those debates : much time was already lost in them ; and it was evident that much more must be lost, if it was intended to carry it on ; since so many branches of this bill, and incidents that arose upon the subject of it, would give occasion to much heat and wrangling : and it was a doubt, whether it would be carried, after all the time that must be bestowed on it, or not : those who opposed it would grow sullen, and oppose every thing else that was moved for the king's service : and, if it should be carried, it would put the king again into the hands of the whigs, who would immediately return to their old practices against the prerogative ; and it would drive many into king James's party, who might otherwise stick firm to the king, or at least be neutrals. These reasons prevailed with the king to order an intimation to be given in the house of commons, that he desired they would let that debate fall, and go to other matters that were more pressing.

This gave a new disgust to the whigs, but was very acceptable to the tories ; and it quickened the advances of money upon the funds that were given : it had indeed a very ill effect abroad : for both friends and enemies looked on it as a sign of a great decline in the king's interest with his people : and the king's interposing to stop further debates in the matter, was represented as an artifice only to save the affront of its being rejected. The earl of Shrewsbury was at the head of those who pressed the abjuration most ; so, upon this change of counsels, he thought he could not serve the king longer with reputation or success. He saw the whigs, by using the king ill, were driving him into the tories ; and he thought these would serve the king with more zeal, if he left his post. The credit that the marquis of Carmarthen had gained was not easy to him ; so he resolved to deliver up the seals. I was the first person to whom he discovered this ; and he had them in his hands when he told me of it ; yet I prevailed with him not to go that night : he was in some heat. I had no mind that the king should be surprised by a thing of that kind ; and I was afraid that the earl of Shrewsbury might have said such things to him, as should have provoked him too much : so I sent the king word of it. It troubled him more than I thought a thing of that sort could have done : he loved the earl of Shrewsbury, and apprehended that his leaving his service at this time might alienate the whigs more entirely from him : for now they who thought him before of too cold a temper, when they saw how firm he was, came to consider and trust him more than ever. The king sent Tillotson, and all those who had most credit with the earl, to divert him from his resolution ; but all was to no purpose. The agitation of mind that this gave him threw him into a fever, which almost cost him his life. The king pressed him to keep the seals till his return from Ireland, though he should not act as secretary ; but he could not be prevailed on*. The debate for the abjuration lasted longer in the house of lords : it had some variation from that which was proposed in the house of commons ; and was properly an oath of a special fidelity to the king, in opposition to king James : the tories offered, in bar to this, a negative engagement against assisting king James, or any of his instruments, knowing them to be such, with severe penalties on such as should refuse it. In opposition to this, it was said, this was only an expedient to secure all king James's party, whatever should happen ; since it left them the entire merit of being still in his interests, and only restrained them from putting any thing to hazard for him. The house was so near an equality in every division, that what was gained in one day was lost in the next : and by the heat and length of those debates, the session continued till June. A bill projected by the tories passed, relating to the city of London, which was intended to change the hands that then governed it : but through the haste or weakness of those who drew it, the court of aldermen was not comprehended in it : so, by this act, the government of the city was fixed in their hands : and they were generally whigs. Many discoveries were made of the practices from St. Germain's and Ireland ; but few were taken up upon them : and those were too inconsiderable to know more than that many were provided with arms and ammunition, and that a method was projected for bringing men together upon a call. And indeed things seemed to be in a very ill disposition towards a fatal turn.

The king was making all possible haste to open the campaign, as soon as things could be ready for it, in Ireland. The day before he set out he called me into his closet. He seemed to have a great weight upon his spirits, from the state of his affairs, which was then very cloudy. He said, for his own part, he trusted in God, and would either go through with his business, or perish in it : he only pitied the poor queen, repeating that twice with great tenderness, and wished that those who loved him would wait much on her, and assist her : he lamented much the factions and the heats that were among us, and that the bishops and clergy, instead of allaying them, did rather foment and inflame them : but he was pleased to make an exception of myself : he said, the going to a campaign was naturally no unpleasant thing to him : he was sure he understood that better than how to govern England : he added, that though he had no doubt nor mistrust of the cause he went on, yet the going against king James, in person, was hard upon him, since it would be a vast trouble, both to himself and to the queen, if he should be either killed or taken prisoner : he desired my prayers, and dismissed me, very deeply affected with all he had said.

I had a particular occasion to know how tender he was of king James's person, having learned an instance of it from the first hand : a proposition was made to the king, that a third-rate ship, well manned by a faithful crew, and commanded by one who had been well with king James, but was such a one as the king might trust, should sail to Dublin, and declare for king James. The person who told me this, offered to be the man that should carry the message to king James (for he was well known to him), to invite him to come on board ; which he seemed to be sure he would accept of ; and, when he was aboard, they should sail away with him, and land him either in Spain or Italy, as the king should desire ; and should have twenty thousand pounds to give him, when he should be set ashore. The king thought it was a well formed design, and likely enough to succeed, but would not hearken to it. He said he would have no hand in treachery : and king James would cer-

* It would seem that the reason of the earl of Shrewsbury's resignation was the disapproval of the bill for abjuring the Stuarts. No persuasions availing to make tainly carry some of his guards and of his court aboard with him : and probably they would make some opposition : and in the struggle some accident might happen to king James's person ; in which he would have no hand. I acquainted the queen with this : and I saw in her a great tenderness for her father's person : and she was much touched with the answer the king had made.

He had a quick passage to Ireland, where matters had been kept in the state they were in all this winter : Charlemont was reduced, which was the only place in Ulster that was then left in king James's hands. The king had a great army ; there were about thirty-six thousand men, all in good plight, full of heart and zeal. He lost no time, but advanced in six days from Belfast, where he landed, to the river of Boyne, near Drogheda. King James had abandoned the passes between Newry and Dundalk, which are so strait for some miles, that it had been easy to have disputed every inch of ground. King James and his court were so much lifted up with the news of the debates in parliament, and of the distractions of the city of London, that they flattered themselves with false hopes that the king durst not leave England, nor venture over to Ireland. He had been six days come before king James knew anything of it. Upon that, he immediately passed the Boyne, and lay on the south side of it. His army consisted of twenty-six thousand men ; his horse were good ; and he had five thousand French foot, for whom he had sent over in exchange five thousand Irish foot. He held some councils of war to consider what was fit to be done ; whether he should make a stand there, and put all to the decision of a battle ; or, if he should march off and abandon that river, and, by consequence, all the country on to Dublin.

All his officers, both French and Irish, who disagreed almost in all their advices, yet agreed in this, that though they had there a very advantageous post to maintain, yet their army being so much inferior, both in number and in every thing else, they would put too much to hazard, if they should venture on a battle. They therefore proposed the strengthening their garrisons, and marching off to the Shannon with the horse and a small body of foot, till they should see how matters went at sea ; for the French king had sent them assurances that he would not only set out a great fleet, but that as soon as the squadron that lay in the Irish seas, to guard the transport fleet and to secure the king's passage over, should sail into the channel to join our grand fleet, he would then send into the Irish seas a fleet of small frigates and privateers, to destroy the king's transports. This would have been fatal, if it had taken effect : and the executing of it seemed easy and certain. It would have shut up the king within Ireland, till a new transport fleet could have been brought thither, which would have been the work of some months : so that England might have been lost before he could have passed the seas with his army. And the destruction of his transports must have ruined his army ; for his stores, both of bread and ammunition, were still on board ; and they sailed along the coast as he advanced on his march ; nor was there in all that coast a safe port to cover and secure them. The king indeed reckoned that by the time the squadron, which lay in the Irish seas, should be able to join the rest of the fleet, they would have advanced as far as the chops of the channel, where they would guard both England and Ireland : but things went far otherwise.

The queen was now in the administration. It was a new scene to her : she had for above sixteen months made so little figure in business, that those, who imagined that every woman of sense loved to be meddling, concluded that she had a small proportion of it, because she lived so abstracted from all affairs. Her behaviour was indeed very exemplary : she was exactly regular both in her public and private devotions : she was much in her closet, and read a great deal : she was often busy at work, and seemed to employ her time and thoughts in any thing, rather than matters of state : her conversation was lively and obliging : every thing in her was easy and natural : she was singular in great charities to the poor ; of whom, as there are always great numbers about courts, so the crowds of persons of quality that had fled over from Ireland drew from her liberal supplies : all this was nothing to the public. If the king talked with her of affairs, it was in so private a way, that few seemed to believe it. The earl of Shrewsbury told me that the king had upon many occasions said to him, that though he could not hit on the right way of pleasing England, he was confident she would ; and that we should all be very happy under her. The king named a cabinet council of eight persons, on whose advice she was chiefly to rely : four of them were tories and four were whigs ; yet the marquis of Caermarthen and the earl of Nottingham, being of the first sort, who took most upon them and seemed to have the greatest credit, the whigs were not satisfied with the nomination. The queen balanced all things with an extraordinary temper ; and became universally beloved and admired by all about her.

Our concerns at sea were then the chief thing to be looked to : an unhappy compliment of sending a fleet to convoy a queen to Spain proved almost fatal to us. They were so long delayed by contrary winds, that a design of blocking up Toulon was lost by it. The great ships that lay there had got out before our fleet could reach the place. Our squadron returned back, and went into Plymouth to refit there ; and it was joined by that which came from the Irish seas. These two squadrons consisted of above thirty ships of the line. The earl of Torrington, that had the chief command, was a man of pleasure, and did not make the haste that was necessary to go about and join them ; nor did the Dutch fleet come over so soon as was promised ; so that our main fleet lay long at Spithead. The French understood that our fleets lay thus divided, and saw the advantage of getting between them : so they came into the channel with so fair a wind, that they were near the Isle of Wight before our fleet had any advice of their being within the channel. The earl of Torrington had no advice-boats out to bring him news ; and though notice thereof was sent post over-land as soon as the French came within the channel, yet their fleet sailed as fast as the post could ride ; but then the wind turned upon them, otherwise they would in all probability have surprised us. But after this first advantage, the winds were always contrary to them and favourable to us. So that the French officers in Ireland had reason to look for that fleet of smaller vessels, which was promised to be sent to destroy the king's transport ships. And for these reasons all king James's officers were against bringing the war to so speedy a decision.

In opposition to all their opinions, king James himself was positive that they must stay and defend the Boyne : if they marched off and abandoned Dublin, they would so lose their reputation, that the people would leave them and capitulate ; it would also dispirit all their friends in England : therefore he resolved to maintain the post he was in, and seemed not a little pleased to think that he should have one fair battle for his crown. He spoke of this with so much seeming pleasure, that many about him apprehended that he was weary of the struggle, and even of life, and longed to see an end of it at any rate : and they were afraid that he would play the hero a little too much. He had all the advantages he could desire : the river was deep, and rose very high with the tide : there was a morass to be passed after the passing the river, and then a rising ground.

On the last of June, the king came to the banks of the river ; and as he was riding along, and making a long stop in one place to observe the grounds, the enemy did not lose their opportunity, but brought down two pieces of cannon, and, with the first firing, a ball passed along the king's shoulder, tore off some of his clothes and about a hand-breadth of the skin, out of which about a spoonful of blood came ; and that was all the harm it did him. It cannot be imagined how much terror this struck into all that were about him ; he himself said it was nothing ; yet he was prevailed on to alight till it was washed and a plaister put upon it ; and immediately he mounted his horse again, and rode about all the posts of his army. It was indeed necessary to show himself everywhere, to take off the apprehensions with which such an unusual accident filled his soldiers. He continued that day nineteen hours on horseback ; but, upon his first alighting from his horse, a deserter had gone over to the enemy with the news, which was carried quickly into France, where it was taken for granted that he could not outlive such a wound ; so it ran over that kingdom that he was dead. And upon it there were more public rejoicings than had been usual upon their greatest victories ; which gave that court afterwards a vast confusion, when they knew that he was still alive ; and saw that they had raised in their own people a high opinion of him by this inhuman joy, when they believed him dead.

But to return to the action of the Boyne. The king sent a great body of cavalry to pass the river higher, while he resolved to pass it in the face of the enemy ; and the duke of Schomberg was to pass it in a third place, a little below him. I will not enter into the particulars of that day's action, but leave that to military men*.

It was a complete victory; and those who were the least disposed to flattery, said, it was almost wholly due to the king's courage and conduct; and, though he was a little stiff by reason of his wound, yet he was forced to quit his horse in the morass, and to go through it on foot: but he came up in time to ride almost into every body of his army: he charged in many different places, and nothing stood before him. The Irish horse made some resistance, but the foot threw down their arms, and ran away. The most amazing circumstance was, that king James stayed all the while with his guards, at a safe distance, and never came into the places of danger or of action; and, when he saw his army was every where giving ground, was the first that ran for it, and reached Dublin before the action was quite over; for it was dark before the king forsook the pursuit of the Irish. His horse and dragoons were so weary, with the fatigue of a long action in a hot day, that they could not pursue far; nor was their camp furnished with necessary refreshments till next morning; for the king had marched faster than the waggons could possibly follow. The army of the Irish were so entirely forsaken by their officers, that the king thought they would have dispersed themselves, and submitted; and that the following them would have been a mere butchery, which was a thing he had always abhorred. The only allay to this victory was the loss of the duke of Schomberg; he passed the river in his station, and was driving the Irish before him, when a party of desperate men set upon him, as he was riding very carelessly, with a small number about him. They charged, and in the disorder of that action he was shot; but it could not be known by whom; for most of all the party was cut off. Thus that great man, like another Epaminondas, fell on the day in which his side triumphed†.

King James came to Dublin, under a very indecent consternation: he said all was lost; he had an army in England that could have fought, but would not; and now he had an army that would have fought, but could not. This was not very gratefully, nor decently spoken by him, who was among the first that fled. Next morning he left Dublin: he said, too much blood had been already shed; it seemed God was with their enemies; the prince of Orange was a merciful man; so he ordered those he left behind him to set the prisoners at liberty, and to submit to the prince: he rode that day from Dublin to Duncannon Fort; but, though the place was considerably strong, he would not trust to that, but lay aboard a French ship that anchored there, and had been provided, by his own special directions to sir Patrick Trant. His courage sunk with his affairs to a degree that amazed those who had known the former parts of his life. The Irish army was forsaken by their officers for two days; if there had been a hot pursuit, it would have put an end to the war of Ireland; but the king thought his first care ought to be to secure Dublin; and king James's officers, as they abandoned it, went back to the army, only in hopes of a good capitulation. Dublin was thus forsaken, and no harm done, which was much apprehended; but the fear the Irish were in was such, that they durst not venture on any thing which must have drawn severe revenges after it. So the protestants there, being now the masters, they declared for the king. Drogheda did also capitulate.

But, to balance this great success, the king had, the very day after the battle at the Boyne, the news of a battle fought in Flanders, between prince Waldeck and the marshal Luxembourg, in which the former was defeated. The cavalry did at the first charge run, but the foot made an amazing stand. The French had the honour of a victory, and took many prisoners, with the artillery; yet the stand the infantry made was such, that they lost more than they got by the day; nor were they able to draw any advantage from it. This was the battle of Fleurus, that, in the consequence of it, proved the means of preserving England.

* The battle of the Boyne was fought on the 1st of July.

† Frederic Schomberg, duke of Schomberg, marquis of Harwich, earl of Brentford, &c., was born in 1608. His father was count Schomberg; his mother a daughter of lord Dudley. A German and a calvinist, he sought employment as a military adventurer in Holland, under William the Second. Becoming unpopular with the Dutch, on the death of this prince, he entered into the service of Lewis the Fourteenth, in whose army he served with entire devotion. At this period he is first mentioned in this work, and the most prominent features of his life have been noticed. — Birch's Lives.

On the day before the battle of the Boyne, the two fleets came to a great engagement at sea. The squadron that lay at Plymouth could not come up to join the great fleet, the wind being contrary ; so it was under debate, what was fittest to be done : the earl of Torrington thought he was not strong enough, and advised his coming in, till some more ships, that were fitting out, should be ready ; some began to call his courage in question, and imputed this to fear ; they thought this would too much exalt our enemies, and discourage our allies, if we left the French to triumph at sea, and to be the masters of our coast and trade ; for our merchants' richest ships were coming home ; so that the leaving them in such a superiority would be both very unbecoming, and very mischievous to us. The queen ordered Russel to advise, both with the navy board, and with all that understood sea affairs ; and, upon a view of the strength of both fleets, they were of opinion, that though the French were superior in number, yet our fleet was so equal in strength to them, that it was reasonable to send orders to our admiral to venture on an engagement ; yet the orders were not so positive, but that a great deal was left to a council of war. The two fleets engaged near Beachy, in Sussex ; the Dutch led the van ; and, to shew their courage, they advanced too far out of the line, and fought, in the beginning, with some advantage, the French flying before them ; and our blue squadron engaged bravely ; but the earl of Torrington kept in his line, and continued to fight at a distance : the French, seeing the Dutch came out so far before the line, fell on them furiously, both in front and flank, which the earl of Torrington neglected for some time ; and, when he endeavoured to come a little nearer, the calm was such, that he could not come up. The Dutch suffered much, and their whole fleet had perished, if their admiral, Calembourg, had not ordered them to drop their anchors, while their sails were all up : this was not observed by the French ; so they were carried by the tide, while the others lay still ; and thus in a few minutes the Dutch were out of danger. They lost many men, and sunk some of their ships, which had suffered the most, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands. It was now necessary to order the fleet to come in with all possible haste : both the Dutch and the blue squadron complained much of the earl of Torrington ; and it was a general opinion that if the whole fleet had come up to a close fight, we must have beat the French : and, considering how far they were from Brest, and that our squadron at Plymouth lay between them and home, a victory might have had great consequences. Our fleet was now in a bad condition, and broken into factions ; and if the French had not lost the night's tide, but had followed us close, they might have destroyed many of our ships. Both the admirals were almost equally blamed ; ours for not fighting, and the French for not pursuing his victory.

Our fleet came in safe ; and all possible diligence was used in refitting it ; the earl of Torrington was sent to the Tower, and three of our best sea officers had the joint command of the fleet ; but it was a month before they could set out ; and, in all that time, the French were masters of the sea, and our coasts were open to them. If they had followed the first consternation, and had fallen to the burning our sea towns, they might have done us much mischief, and put our affairs in great disorder ; for we had not above seven thousand men then in England. The militia was raised, and suspected persons were put in prison ; in this melancholy conjuncture, though the harvest drew on, so that it was not convenient for people to be long absent from their labour, yet the nation expressed more zeal and affection to the government than was expected. And the Jacobites, all England over, kept out of the way, and were afraid of being fallen upon by the rabble. We had no great losses at sea ; for most of our merchantmen came safe into Plymouth ; the French stood over, for some time, to their own coast ; and we had many false alarms of their shipping troops, in order to a descent. But they had suffered so much in the battle at Fleurus, and the Dutch used such diligence in putting their army in a condition to take the field again, and the elector of Brandenburg, bringing his troops to act in conjunction with theirs, gave the French so much work, that they were forced, for all their victory, to lie upon the defensive, and were not able to spare so many men as were necessary for an invasion. The Dutch did indeed send positive orders to prince Waldeck, not to hazard another engagement till the fleet should be again at sea : this restrained the elector, who, in conjunction with the Dutch, was much superior to Luxembourg ; and afterwards, when the Dutch superseded those orders, the elector did not think fit to hazard his army. Such is the fate of confederate armies, when they are under a different direction; that, when the one is willing, or at least seems to be so, the other stands off. The French riding so long, so quietly in our seas, was far from what might have been expected, after such an advantage: we understood afterwards, that they were still waiting, when the Jacobites should, according to their promises, have begun a rising in England; but they excused their failing in that, because their leaders were generally clapped up.

That party began to boast, all England over, that it was visible that the French meant no harm to the nation, but only to bring back king James; since now, though our coasts lay open to them, they did us no harm. And this might have made some impression, if the French had not effectually refuted it. Their fleet lay for some days in Torbay; their equipages were weakened; and by a vessel that carried a packet from Tourville to the court of France, which was taken, it appeared that they were then in so bad a condition, that if our fleet (which upon this was hastened out all that was possible) could have overtaken them, we should have got a great victory very cheap. But before they sailed, they made a descent on a miserable village, called Teignmouth, that happened to belong to a papist: they burnt it, and a few fisher-boats that belonged to it; but the inhabitants got away; and, as a body of militia was marching thither, the French made great haste back to their ships. The French published this in their gazettes, with much pomp, as if it had been a great trading town, that had many ships, with some men of war in port. This both rendered them ridiculous, and served to raise the hatred of the nation against them; for every town on the coast saw what they must expect if the French should prevail.

In all this time of fear and disorder, the queen shewed an extraordinary firmness; for though she was full of dismal thoughts, yet she put on her ordinary cheerfulness when she appeared in public, and shewed no indecent concern; I saw her all that while once a week, for I stayed that summer at Windsor: her behaviour was, in all respects, heroical; she apprehended the greatness of our danger; but she committed herself to God, and was resolved to expose herself, if occasion should require it: for she told me, she would give me leave to wait on her if she was forced to make a campaign in England, while the king was in Ireland.

Whilst the misfortunes in Flanders, and at sea, were putting us in no small agitation, the news first of the king's preservation from the cannon ball, and then of the victory, gained the day after, put another face on our affairs: the earl of Nottingham told me, that when he carried the news to the queen, and acquainted her in a few words that the king was well, that he had gained an entire victory, and that the late king had escaped; he observed her looks, and found that the last article made her joy complete, which seemed in some suspense, till she understood that. The queen and council upon this sent to the king, pressing him to come over with all possible haste; since, as England was of more importance, so the state of affairs required his presence here: for it was hoped the reduction of Ireland would be now easily brought about. The king, as he received the news of the battle of Fleurus, the day after the victory at the Boyne; so on the day in which he entered Dublin, he had the news of the misfortune at sea, to temper the joy, that his own successes might give him: he had taken all the earl of Tyrconnel's papers in the camp; and he found all king James's papers left behind him in Dublin; by these he understood the design the French had of burning his transport fleet, which was therefore first to be taken care of; and since the French were now masters at sea, he saw nothing that could hinder the execution of that design.

Among the earl of Tyrconnel's papers there was one letter written to queen Mary at St. Germain's, the night before the battle; but it was not sent. In it, he said, he looked on all as lost, and ended it thus: "I have now no hope in any thing but in Jones's business." The marquis of Caermarthen told me that some weeks before the king went to Ireland, he had received an advertisement, that one named Jones, an Irishman, who had served so long in France and Holland, that he spoke both languages well, was to be sent over to murder the king. And sir Robert Southwell told me, that he, as secretary of state for Ireland, had looked into all Tyrconnel's papers, and the copies of the letters he wrote to queen Mary, which he had still in his possession ; and he gave me the copies of two of them. In one of these he writes, that Jones was come ; that his proposition was more probable, and likelier to succeed than any yet made : his demands were high, but he added, “ if any thing can be high for such a service.” In another he writes, that Jones had been with the king, who did not like the thing at first ; but he added, we have now to satisfy him both in conscience and honour, that every thing is done that Jones desires. Southwell further told me, that Deagle, the attorney-general, had furnished him with money, and a poniard of a particular composition ; and that they sought long for a bible, bound without a common prayer book, which he was to carry in his pocket, that so he might pass, if seized on, for a dissenter. Some persons of great quality waited on him to the boat that was to carry him over ; he was for some time delayed in Dublin ; and the king had passed over to Ireland before he could reach him : we could never hear of him more ; so it is likely he went away with his money. A paper was drawn of all this matter, and designed to be published ; but, upon second thoughts, the king and queen had that tenderness for king James, that they stopped the publishing to the world so shameful a practice. The king said, upon this, to myself, that God had preserved him out of many dangers, and he trusted he would still preserve him ; he was sure he was not capable of retaliating in that way. The escape of a cannon-ball, that touched him, was so signal, that it swallowed up lesser ones : yet, in the battle at the Boyne, a musket-ball struck the heel of his boot, and recoiling, killed a horse near him ; and one of his own men, mistaking him for an enemy, came up to shoot him ; but he gently put by his pistol, and only said, “ Do not you know your friends ?”

At Dublin he published a proclamation of grace, offering to all the inferior sort of the Irish, their lives and personal estates, reserving the consideration of the real estates of the better sort to a parliament, and indemnifying them only for their lives ; it was hoped that the fulness of the pardon of the commons might have separated them from the gentry ; and that by this means, they would be so forsaken, that they would accept of such terms as should be offered them. The king had intended to have made the pardon more comprehensive ; hoping, by that, to bring the war soon to an end : but the English in Ireland opposed this. They thought the present opportunity was not to be let go, of breaking the great Irish families, upon whom the inferior sort would always depend. And, in compliance with them, the indemnity, now offered, was so limited, that it had no effect ; for the priests, who governed the Irish with a very blind and absolute authority, prevailed with them to try their fortunes still. The news of the victory the French had at sea was so magnified among them, that they made the people believe that they would make such a descent upon England, as must oblige the king to abandon Ireland. The king was pressed to pursue the Irish, who had retired to Athlone and Limerick, and were now joined by their officers, and so brought again into some order : but the main concern was, to put the transport fleet in a safe station. And that could not be had till the king was master of Waterford and Duncannon Fort, which commanded the entrance into the river ; both these places capitulated, and the transports were brought thither. But they were not now so much in danger, as the king had reason to apprehend ; for king James, when he sailed away from Duncannon, was forced by contrary winds to go into the road of Kinsale, where he found some French frigates that were already come to burn our fleet : he told them it was now too late, all was lost in Ireland. So he carried them back to convoy him over to France, where he had but a cold reception ; for the miscarriage of affairs in Ireland was imputed both to his ill conduct and his want of courage. He fell under much contempt of the people of France ; only that king continued still to behave himself decently towards him.

The king sent his army towards the Shannon ; and he himself came to Dublin, intending, as he was advised, to go over to England ; but he found there letters of another strain : things were in so good a posture, and so quiet in England, that they were no more in any apprehension of a descent ; so the king went back to his army, and marched towards Limerick. Upon this Lauzun, who commanded the French, left the town, and sent his equipage to France, which perished in the Shannon. It was hoped that Limerick, seeing itself thus abandoned, would have followed the example of other towns, and have capitulated. Upon that confidence the king marched towards it, though his army was now much diminished : he had left many garrisons in several places, and had sent some of his best bodies over to England ; so that he had not now above 20,000 men together. Limerick lies on both sides of the Shannon, and on an island, that the river makes there : the Irish were yet in great numbers in Connaught ; so that, unless they had been shut up on that side, it was easy to send in a constant supply both of men and provisions : nor did it seem advisable to undertake the siege of a place so situated with so small an army, especially in that season, in which it used to rain long ; and by that means, both the Shannon would swell, and the ground, which was the best soil of Ireland, would be apt to become deep, and scarce practicable for carriages. Yet the cowardice of the Irish, the consternation they were in, and their being abandoned by the French, made the king resolve to sit down before it. Their out-works might have been defended for some time ; but they abandoned these in so much disorder, that it was from hence believed they would not hold out long. They also abandoned the posts which they had on the other side of the Shannon : upon which the king passed the river, which was then very low, and viewed those posts ; but he had not men to maintain them ; so he continued to press the town on the Munster side.

He sent for some more ammunition, and some great guns ; they had only a guard of two troops of horse to convoy them, who despised the Irish so much, and thought they were at such distance, that they set their horses to grass, and went to bed. Sarsfield, one of the best officers of the Irish, heard that the king rode about very carelessly, and upon that, had got a small body of resolute men together, on design to seize his person ; but now, hearing of this convoy, he resolved to cut it off : the king had advertisement of this brought him in time, and ordered some more troops to be sent to secure the convoy ; they, either through treachery or carelessness, did not march till it was night, though their orders were for the morning ; but they came a few hours too late. Sarsfield surprised the party, destroyed the ammunition, broke the carriages, and burst one of the guns, and so marched off. Lanier, whom the king had sent with the party, might have overtaken him ; but the general observation made of him (and of most of those officers who had served king James, and were now on the king's side) was, that they had a greater mind to make themselves rich by the continuance of the war of Ireland, than their master great, and safe, by the speedy conclusion of it.

By this the king lost a week, and his ammunition was low ; for a great supply that was put on ship-board in the river of Thames, before the king left London, still remained there, the French being masters of the channel : yet the king pressed the town so hard, that the trenches were run up to the counterscarp ; and when they came to lodge there, the Irish ran back so fast at a breach that the cannon had made, that a body of the king's men ran in after them ; and if they had been seconded, the town had been immediately taken ; but none came in time, so they retired : and though the king sent another body, yet they were beaten back with loss. As it now began to rain, the king saw that if he stayed longer there, he must leave his great artillery behind him : he went into the trenches every day ; and it was thought he exposed himself too much. His tent was pitched within the reach of their cannon ; they shot often over it, and beat down a tent very near it ; so he was prevailed on to let it be removed to a greater distance : once, upon receiving a packet from England, he sat down in the open field for some hours, reading his letters, while the cannon balls were flying round about him. The Irish fired well, and shewed they had some courage, when they were behind walls, how little soever they had shewn in the field.

The king lay three weeks before Limerick, but at last the rains forced him to raise the siege : they within did not offer to sally out and disorder the retreat : this last action proving unlucky, had much damped the joy that was raised by the first success of this campaign. The king expressed a great equality of temper upon the various accidents that happened at this time. Dr. Hutton, his first physician, who took care to be always near him, told me, he had observed his behaviour very narrowly upon two very different occasions.

The one was, after the return from the victory at the Boyne, when it was almost midnight, after he had been seventeen hours in constant fatigue, with all the stiffness that his wound gave him ; he expressed neither joy nor any sort of vanity ; only he looked cheerful; and when those about him made such compliments, as will be always made to princes, even though they do not deserve them, he put all that by with such an unaffected neglect, that it appeared how much soever he might deserve the acknowledgments that were made him, yet he did not like them. And this was so visible to all about him, that they soon saw that the way to make their court was, neither to talk of his wound, nor of his behaviour on that day. As soon as he saw his physician, he ordered him to see that care should be taken of the wounded men, and he named the prisoners, as well as his own soldiers. And though he had great reason to be offended with Hamilton, who had been employed to treat with the earl of Tyrconnel, and was taken prisoner in his sight, and was preserved by his order; yet since he saw he was wounded, he gave particular directions to look after him. Upon the whole matter the king was as grave and silent as he used to be; and the joy of a day, that had been both so happy and so glorious to him, did not seem to alter his temper or deportment in any way.

He told me he was also near him when it was resolved to raise the siege of Limerick; and saw the same calm, without the least depression, disorder, or peevishness: from this he concluded, that either his mind was so happily balanced, that no accident could put it out of that situation; or that, if he had commotions within, he had a very extraordinary command over his temper, in restraining or concealing them.

While he lay before Limerick, he had news from England that our fleet was now out, and that the French were gone to Brest: so, since we were masters of the sea, the earl of Marlborough proposed that five thousand men who had lain idle all this summer in England, should be sent to Ireland; and with the assistance of such men as the king should order to join them, they should try to take Cork and Kinsale. The king approved of this and ordered the earl to come over with them: and he left orders for about five thousand more, who were to join him. And so he broke up this campaign and came over to Bristol, and from thence to London. The contrary winds stopped the earl of Marlborough so, that it was October before he got to Ireland*. He soon took Cork by storm; and four thousand men, that lay there in garrison, were made prisoners of war. In this action the duke of Grafton received a shot, of which he died in a few days: he was the more lamented, as being the person of all king Charles's children, of whom there was the greatest hope: he was brave, and probably would have become a great man at sea†. From Cork, the earl of Marlborough marched to Kinsale, where he found the two forts that commanded the port to be so much stronger than the plans had represented them to be, that he told me, if he had known their true strength, he had never undertaken the expedition in a season so far advanced; yet in a few days the place capitulated. The Irish drew their forces together, but durst not venture on raising the siege; but to divert it, they set the country about, which was the best built of any in Ireland, all in a flame.

Thus those two important places were reduced in a very bad season, and with very little loss; which cut off the quick communication between France and Ireland. Count Lauzun, with the French troops, lay all this while about Galway, without attempting any thing; he sent over to France an account of the desperate state of their affairs, and desired ships might be sent for the transport of their forces: that was done; yet the ships came not till the siege of Limerick was raised: probably, if the court of France had known how much the state of affairs was altered, they would have sent contrary orders; but Lauzun was † Henry Fitzroy was the illegitimate offspring of Barbara Villiers, duchess of Cleveland, by Charles the Second. He was born in 1663. In 1673 he had conferred upon him the dukedom of Grafton. He saw a good deal of naval service under sir Charles Bury, vice-admiral of England; and acted gallantly against the duke of Monmouth. In 1687, the duke of Somerset having, as was noticed in a previous page, declined introducing the pope's nuncio, the archbishop of Amasia, at his public audience, the duke of Grafton performed this unpopular act. He subsequently served James the Second in various capacities; but upon the arrival of the Prince of Orange, he, together with lord Churchill (afterwards duke of Marlborough), were the first to join him; yet he voted for the appointment of a regent. When the parliament had declared William and Mary sovereigns, he adhered to them, and bore the globe during the coronation ceremony. The duke received his death-wound on the 28th of September, 1690, whilst leading on the grenadiers to the breach in the walls of Cork. He is buried at Euston, in Suffolk.—Grainger's Biog. Hist.

weary of the service, and was glad to get out of it; so he sailed away, without staying for new orders, by which he lost the little reputation that he was beginning to recover at the court of France. The earl of Tyrconnel went over with him, and gave full assurances, that though the Irish were likely to suffer great hardships next winter, yet they would stand it out, if they were still supported from France. It had appeared, upon many occasions, that the French and the Irish soldiers did not agree well together; therefore he proposed, that no more soldiers, but only a number of good officers, together with arms, ammunition, and clothes, might be sent over to them. In the mean while, the Irish formed themselves into many bodies, which, by a new name, were called rapparees*. These, knowing all the ways, and the bogs, and other places of retreat in Ireland, and being favoured by the Irish, that had submitted to the king, robbed and burned houses in many places of the country; while the king's army studied their own ease in their quarters more than the protection of the inhabitants: many of them were suspected of robbing in their turn, though the rapparees carried the blame of all: between them, the poor inhabitants had a sad time, and their stock of cattle and corn was almost quite destroyed in many places.

From the affairs of Ireland, I turn next to give an account of what passed in Scotland; matters went very happily, as to the military part: when the remnants of the earl of Dundee's army (to whom many officers, together with ammunition and money, had been sent from Ireland) began to move towards the low country, to receive those who were resolved to join with them, and were between two and three thousand strong; they were fallen upon, and entirely defeated by a Dutch officer, Levingston, that commanded the forces in Scotland; about an hundred officers were taken prisoners; this broke all the measures that had been taken for king James's interests in Scotland. Upon this, those who had engaged in Montgomery's plot, looked upon that design as desperate; yet they resolved to try what strength they could make in parliament.

Lord Melvill carried down powers, first to offer to duke Hamilton, if he would join in common measures heartily with him, to be commissioner in parliament, or if he proved intractable, as indeed he did, to serve in that post himself. He had full instructions for the settlement of presbytery; for he assured the king, that without that, it would be impossible to carry any thing; only the king would not consent to the taking away the rights of patronage, and the supremacy of the crown; yet he found these so much insisted on, that he sent one to the king to Ireland for fuller instructions in those points; they were enlarged, but in such general words, that the king did not understand that his instructions could warrant what lord Melvill did; for he gave them both up. And the king was so offended with him for it, that he lost all the credit he had with him; though the king did not think fit to disown him, or to call him to an account, for going beyond his instructions.

The Jacobites persuaded all their party to go to the parliament, and to take the oaths; for many of the nobility stood off, and would not own the king, nor swear to him: great pains were taken by Paterson, one of their archbishops, to persuade them to take the oaths, but on design to break them; for he thought, by that means, they could have a majority in parliament; though some of the laity were too honest to agree to such advices; but with all these wicked arts they were not able to carry a majority. So, other things failing, they saw a necessity of desiring a force to be sent over from France; this appeared so odious, and so destructive to their country, that some of them refused to concur in it; others were not pleased with the answers king James had sent to the propositions they had made him. He had indeed granted all that they had asked, upon their own particular interests, and had promised to settle presbytery; but he rejected all those demands that imported a diminution of his prerogative, in as firm a manner as if he had been already set on the throne again: they proposed, finding his answer so little to their satisfaction, to send him a second message.

Upon this the earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Breadalbane, withdrew from them; Annandale came up to the Bath, pretending his ill health: both lord Argyle and Breadalbane went to Chester, pretending, as they said afterwards, that they intended to discover the whole matter to the king; but he had passed over to Ireland before they got to Chester. Montgomery upon this looked on the design as broken; and so he went and reconciled himself to Melvill, and discovered the whole negotiation to him. Upon which, the earl of Melvill pressed the king to grant a general indemnity, and gave Montgomery a pass to go to London; and he wrote to the queen in his favour. But the king was resolved to know the bottom of the plot, and particularly how far any of the English were engaged in it: so Montgomery absconded for some time in London, since he saw no hopes of pardon, but upon a full discovery. A warrant was sent to the Bath for the earl of Annandale, of which he had notice given him, and went up privately to London. Montgomery sent Ferguson to him, assuring him that he had discovered nothing, and desiring him to continue firm and secret: but when he had certain notice that Montgomery had discovered all the negotiation among the Scotch, he cast himself on the queen's mercy, asking no other conditions, but that he might not be made an evidence against others. He himself had not treated with any in England, so as to them he was only a second-hand witness; only he informed against Nevil Payne, who had been sent down to Scotland, to manage matters among them: he was taken there, but would confess nothing. Upon the earl of Annandale's information, which he gave upon oath, the earl of Nottingham wrote to the council of Scotland, that he had in his hands a deposition upon oath, containing matter of high treason against Payne; upon which it was pretended, that, according to the law of Scotland, he might be put to the torture; and that was executed with rigour. He resisted a double question, yet was still kept a prisoner; and this was much cried out on, as barbarous and illegal. Montgomery lay hid for some months at London; but when he saw he could not have his pardon but by making a full discovery, he chose rather to go beyond sea: so fatally did ambition and discontent hurry a man to ruin, who seemed capable of greater things. His art in managing such a design, and his firmness in not discovering his accomplices, raised his character as much as it ruined his fortune. He continued in perpetual plots after this, to no purpose: he was once taken, but made his escape; and at last, spleen and vexation put an end to a turbulent life.

The lord Melvill had now a clear majority in parliament by the discovery of the plot; some absented themselves; and others, to redeem themselves, were compliant in all things: the main point by which Melvill designed to fix himself, and his party, was, the abolishing of episcopacy, and the setting up of presbytery. The one was soon done by repealing all the laws in favour of episcopacy, and declaring it contrary to the genius and constitution of that church and nation; for the king would not consent to a plain and simple condemnation of it. But it was not so easy to settle presbytery. If they had followed the pattern, set them in the year 1638, all the clergy, in a parity, were to assume the government of the church; but those being episcopal, they did not think it safe to put the power of the church in such hands; therefore it was pretended, that such of the presbyterian ministers as had been turned out in the year 1662, ought to be considered as the only sound part of the church: and of these there happened to be then threescore alive; so the government of the church was lodged with them; and they were empowered to take to their assistance, and to a share in the church government, such as they should think fit: some furious men who had gone into very frantic principles, and all those who had been secretly ordained in the presbyterian way, were presently taken in; this was likely to prove a fatal error at their first setting out: the old men among them, what by reason of their age, or their experience of former mistakes, were disposed to more moderate counsels; but the taking in such a number of violent men, put it out of their power to pursue them; so these broke out into a most extravagant way of proceeding against such of the episcopal party as had escaped the rage of the former year. Accusations were raised against them; some were charged for their doctrine, as guilty of Arminianism; others were loaded with more scandalous imputations; but these were only thrown out to defame them. And where they looked for proof, it was in a way more becoming inquisitors than judges; so apt are all parties, in their turns of power, to fall into those very excesses, of which they did formerly make such tragical complaints. All other matters were carried, in the parliament of Scotland, as the lord Melvill and the presbyterians desired. In lieu of the king's supremacy, he had chimney-money given him ; and a test was imposed on all in office, or capable of electing, or being elected to serve in parliament, declaring the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful sovereigns, and renouncing any manner of title pretended to be in king James.

As for affairs abroad, the duke of Savoy came into the alliance ; the French suspected he was in a secret treaty with the emperor, and so they forced him to declare it, before matters were ripe for it. They demanded, that he would put Turin and Montmelian in their hands. This was upon the matter to ask all, and to make him a vassal prince : upon his refusal, a French army took possession of Savoy ; and marched into Piedmont, before he was ready to receive them ; for though the imperialists and the Spaniards had made him great promises, in which they are never wanting, when their affairs require it, yet they failed so totally in the performance, that if the king and the Dutch, who had promised him nothing, had not performed every thing effectually, he must have become at once a prey to the French. The emperor was this year unhappy in Hungary, both by losing Belgrade, and by some other advantages, which the Turks gained ; yet he was as little inclined to peace, as he was capable of carrying on the war.

The king at his first coming over from Ireland was so little wearied with that campaign, that he intended to have gone over to his army in Flanders ; but it was too late ; for they were going into winter quarters ; so he held the session of parliament early, about the beginning of October, that so, the funds being settled for the next year, he might have an interview with many of the German princes, who intended to meet him at the Hague, that they might concert measures for the next campaign.

Both houses began with addresses of thanks and congratulation to the king and queen, in which they set forth the sense they had of their pious care of their people, of their courage and good government, in the highest expressions that could be conceived ; with promises of standing by them, and assisting them, with every thing that should be found necessary for the public service : and they were as good as their word ; for the king, having laid before them the charge of the next year's war, the estimate rising to above four millions, the vastest sum that ever a king of England had asked of his people, they agreed to it ; the opposition that was made being very inconsiderable ; and they consented to the funds proposed, which were thought equal to that which was demanded, though these proved afterwards to be defective. The administration was so just and gentle, that there were no grievances to inflame the house, by which the most promising beginnings of some sessions, in former reigns, had often miscarried.

Some indeed began to complain of a mismanagement of the public money ; but the ministry put a stop to that, by moving for a bill, empowering such as the parliament should name, to examine into all accounts, with all particulars relating to them ; giving them authority to bring all persons that they should have occasion for, before them, and to tender them an oath, to discover their knowledge of such things as they should ask of them. This was like the power of a court of inquisition ; and how unusual soever such a commission was, yet it seemed necessary to grant it, for the bearing down and silencing all scandalous reports. When this bill was brought to the lords, it was moved, that since the commons had named none but members of their own house, that the lords should add some of their number : this was done by ballot ; and the earl of Rochester having made the motion, the greatest number of ballots were for him ; but he refused to submit to this, with so much firmness, that the other lords, who were named with him, seemed to think they were in honour bound to do the same ; so, since no peer would suffer himself to be named, the bill passed as it was sent up. Many complaints were made of the illegal commitments of suspected persons for high treason ; though there was nothing sworn against them : but the danger was so apparent, and the public safety was so much concerned in those imprisonments, that the house of commons made a precedent for securing a ministry that should do the like upon the like necessity, and yet maintained the habeas corpus act ; they indemnified the ministry for all that had been done contrary to that act.

Great complaints were brought over from Ireland, where the king's army was almost as heavy on the country as the Rapparees were : there was a great arrear due to them :

for which reason, when the king settled a government in Ireland, of three lords justices, he did not put the army under their civil authority, but kept them in a military subjection to their officers; for, he said, since the army was not regularly paid, it would be impossible to keep them from mutiny, if they were put under strict discipline, and punished accordingly. The under officers, finding that they were only answerable to their superior officers, took great liberties in their quarters; and, instead of protecting the country, they oppressed it. The king had brought over an army of seven thousand Danes, under the command of a very gallant prince, one of the dukes of Wirtemberg; but they were cruel friends, and thought they were masters; nor were the English troops much better. The Dutch were the least complained of: Ginkle, who had the chief command, looked strictly to them; but he did not think it convenient to put those of other nations under the same severe measures*. But the pay, due for some months, being now sent over, the orders were changed; and the army was made subject to the civil government; yet it was understood that instructions were sent to the lords justices to be cautious in the exercise of their authority over them; so the country still suffered much by these forces.

The house of commons passed a vote to raise a million of money out of the forfeitures and confiscations in Ireland; and in order to that, they passed a bill of attainder of all those who had been engaged in the rebellion of Ireland, and appropriated the confiscations to the raising a fund for defraying the expense of the present war; only they left a power to the king to grant away a third part of those confiscated estates, to such as had served in the war; and to give such articles and capitulations to those who were in arms, as he should think fit. Upon this bill many petitions were offered, the creditors of some, and the heirs of others, who had continued faithful to the government, desired provisos for their security. The commons, seeing that there was no end of petitions, for such provisos, rejected them all; imitating in this too much the mock parliament, that king James held in Dublin; in which about 3,000 persons were attainted, without proof or process, only because some of them were gone over to England, and others were absconding, or informed against in Ireland. But when this bill was brought up to the lords, they thought they were in justice bound to hear all petitions: upon this, the bill was likely to be clogged with many provisos; and the matter must have held long: so the king, to stop this, sent a message to the commons; and he spoke to the same purpose, afterwards from the throne, to both houses. He promised he would give no grants of any confiscated estates, but would keep that matter entire, to the consideration of another session of parliament; by which the king intended only to assure them, that he would give none of those estates to his courtiers or officers; but he thought he was still at liberty to pass such acts of grace, or grant such articles to the Irish, as the state of his affairs should require.

There were no important debates in the house of lords. The earl of Torrington's business held them long; the form of his commitment was judged to be illegal; and the martial law, to which, by the statute, all who served in the fleet were subject, being lodged in the lord high admiral, it was doubted whether, the admiralty being now in commission, that power was lodged with the commissioners. The judges were of opinion that it was; yet, since the power of life and death was too sacred a thing to pass only by a construction of law, it was thought the safest course to pass an act, declaring, that the powers of a lord high admiral did vest in the commissioners. The secret enemies of the government, who intended to embroil matters, moved that the earl of Torrington should be impeached in parliament; proceedings in that way being always slow, incidents were also apt to fall in that might create disputes between the two houses, which did sometimes end in a rupture: but lantry and conquests in Ireland, the house of commons voted him thanks, and even confirmed the grant of land given him by the king. This was the forfeited estate of William Dougan, earl of Limerick; but four years after the parliament voted this grant of more than 26,000 acres too extravagant. Disgusted with this treatment, he left England, entering the service of Holland, where he again greatly distinguished himself. He died in 1703.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

the king was apprehensive of that ; and, though he was much incensed against that lord, and had reason to believe that a council of war would treat him very favourably, yet he chose rather to let it go so than to disorder his affairs. The commissioners of the admiralty named a court to try him, who did it with so gross a partiality, that it reflected much on the justice of the nation ; so that, if it had not been for the great interest the king had in the States, it might have occasioned a breach of the alliance between them and us. He came off safe as to his person and estate, but much loaded in his reputation ; some charging him with want of courage, while others imputed his ill conduct to a haughty sullenness of temper, that made him, since orders were sent him, contrary to the advices he had given, to resolve indeed to obey them, and fight ; but in such a manner as should cast the blame on those who had sent him the orders, and give them cause to repent of it.

Another debate was moved in the house of lords (by those who intended to revive the old impeachment of the marquis of Caermarthen) whether impeachments continued from parliament to parliament, or whether they were not extinguished by an act of grace. Some ancient precedents were brought to favour this, by those who intended to keep them up ; but in all these, there had been an order of one parliament to continue them on to the next : so they did not come home to the present case ; and how doubtful soever it was, whether the king's pardon could be pleaded in bar to an impeachment, yet, since the king had sent an act of grace, which had passed in the first session of this parliament, it seemed very unreasonable to offer an impeachment against an act of parliament. All this discovered a design against that lord, who was believed to have the greatest credit both with the king and queen, and was again falling under an universal hatred. In a house of commons, every motion against a minister is apt to be well entertained ; some envy him, others are angry at him ; many hope to share in the spoils of him, or of his friends, that fall with him : and a love of change, and a wantonness of mind, makes the attacking a minister a diversion to the rest. The thing was well laid, and fourteen leading men had undertaken to manage the matter against him ; in which the earl of Shrewsbury had the chief hand, as he himself told me ; for he had a very bad opinion of the man, and thought his advices would, in conclusion, ruin the king and his affairs. But a discovery was at this time made, that was of great consequence ; and it was managed chiefly by his means, so that put an end to the designs against him for the present.

The session of parliament was drawing to a conclusion ; and the king was making haste over to a great congress of many princes, who were coming to meet him at the Hague. The Jacobites thought this opportunity was not to be lost ; they fancied it would be easy, in the king's absence, to bring a revolution about ; so they got the lord Preston to come up to London, and to undertake the journey to France, and to manage this negotiation. They thought no time was to be lost, and that no great force was to be brought over with king James ; but that a few resolute men, as a guard to his person, would serve the turn, now that there was so small a force left within the kingdom, and the nation was so incensed at a burthen of four millions in taxes. By this means, if he surprised us, and managed his coming over with such secrecy, that he should bring over with himself the first news of it, they believed this revolution would be more easy, and more sudden than the last. The men that laid this design were, the earl of Clarendon, the bishop of Ely (Dr. Turner), the lord Preston, and his brother Mr. Graham, and Penn, the famous quaker. Lord Preston resolved to go over, and to carry letters from those who had joined with him in the design, to king James and his queen. The bishop of Ely's letters were written in a very particular style : he undertook, both for his elder brother and the rest of the family, which was plainly meant of Sancroft, and the other deprived bishops. In his letter to king James's queen, he assured her of his, and all their zeal for the prince of Wales ; and that they would no more part with that, than with their hopes of Heaven. Ashton, a servant of that queen's, hired a vessel to carry them over ; but the owner of the vessel, being a man zealous for the government, discovered all he knew ; which was only, that he was to carry some persons over to France. The notice of this was carried to the marquis of Caermarthen ; and the matter was so ordered, that lord Preston, Ashton, and a young man (Elliot) were got aboard, and falling down the river, when the officer sent to take them came, on pretence to search, and press for scamen; and drew the three passengers out of the hold, in which they were hid. Lord Preston left his letters behind him in the hold, together with king James's signet: Ashton took them up, on design to have thrown them into the sea, but they were taken from him.

Both they and their letters were brought to Whitehall. Lord Preston's mind sunk so visibly, that it was concluded he would not die, if confessing all he knew could save him. Ashton was more firm and sullen: Elliot knew nothing. There was among their papers one that contained the heads of a declaration, with assurances of pardon, and promises to preserve the protestant religion, and the laws: another paper contained short memorials, taken by lord Preston, in which many of the nobility were named. The most important of all was, a relation of a conference between some noblemen and gentlemen, Whigs and Tories; by which it appeared, that, upon a conversation on this subject, they all seemed convinced, that upon this occasion France would not study to conquer, but to oblige England; and that king James would be wholly governed by protestants, and follow the protestant and English interest. The prisoners were quickly brought to their trial; their design of going to France, and the treasonable papers found about them, were fully proved; some of them were written in lord Preston's, and some in Ashton's hand. They made but a poor defence; they said, a similitude of hands was not thought a good proof in Sidney's case; but this was now only a circumstance: in what hand soever the papers were written, the crime was always the same, since they were open, not sealed. So they knew the contents of them, and thus were carrying on a negotiation of high treason with the king's enemies: upon full evidence they were condemned.

Ashton would enter into no treaty with the court; but prepared himself to die. And he suffered with great decency and seriousness. He left a paper behind him, in which he owned his dependence on king James, and his fidelity to him; he also affirmed, that he was sure the prince of Wales was born of the queen: he denied that he knew the contents of the papers that were taken with him. This made some conclude that his paper was penned by some other person, and too hastily copied over by himself, without making due reflections on this part of it; for I compared this paper, which he gave the sheriff, and which was written in his own hand, with those found about him; and it was visible, both were written in the same hand.

Lord Preston went backward and forward; he had no mind to die, and yet was not willing to tell all he knew: he acted a weak part in all respects. When he was heated by the importunities of his friends, who were violently engaged against the government, and after he had dined well, he resolved he would die heroically; but by next morning that heat went off; and when he saw death in full view, his heart failed him. The scheme he carried over was so foolish, so ill concerted, and so few engaged in it, that those who knew the whole secret concluded, that if he had got safe to the court of France, the project would have been so despised, that he must have been suspected, as sent over to draw king James into a snare, and bring him into the king's hands. The earl of Clarendon was seized, and put in the Tower; but the bishop of Ely, Graham, and Penn, absconded. After some months, the king, in regard to the earl of Clarendon's relation to the queen, would proceed to no extremities against him, but gave him leave to live, confined to his house in the country*.

The king had suffered the deprived bishops to continue, now above a year, at their sees; they all the while neglected the concerns of the church, doing nothing, but living privately in their palaces. I had, by the queen's order, moved both the earl of Rochester, and sir John Trevor, who had great credit with them, to try whether, in case an act could be obtained, to excuse them from taking the oaths, they would go on, and do their functions in ordinations, institutions, and confirmations; and assist at the public worship, as formerly: but they would give no answer; only they said, they would live quietly, that is, keep themselves close, till a proper time should encourage them to act more openly. So all the thoughts of this kind were, upon that, laid aside. One of the most considerable men of the party, Dr. Sherlock, upon king James's going out of Ireland, thought that this gave the present government a thorough settlement; and in that case, he thought it lawful to take the oaths; and upon that, not only took them himself, but publicly justified what he had done: upon which he was most severely libelled by those from whom he withdrew*. The discovery of the bishop of Ely's correspondence, and engagement in the name of the rest, gave the king a great advantage in filling those vacant sees; which he resolved to do upon his return from the congress, to which he went over in January.

In his way he ran a very great hazard; when he got within the Macse, so that it was thought two hours' rowing would bring him to land, being weary of the sea, he went into an open boat with some of his lords: but by mists and storms, he was tossed up and down above sixteen hours, before he got safe to land. Yet neither he, nor any of those who were with him, were the worse for all this cold and wet weather. And, when the seamen seemed very apprehensive of their danger, the king said in a very intrepid manner, "What! are you afraid to die in my company?" He soon settled some points at which the States had stuck long; and they created the funds for that year. The electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg, the dukes of Zell and Wolfenbuttel, with the landgrave of Hesse, and a great many other German princes, came to this interview, and entered into consultations concerning the operations of the next campaign. The duke of Savoy's affairs were then very low; but the king took care of him, and furnished, as well as procured him such supplies, that his affairs had quickly a more promising face. Things were concerted among the princes themselves, and were kept so secret, that they did not trust them to their ministers; at least the king did not communicate them to the earl of Nottingham, as he protested solemnly to me, when he came back. The princes shewed to the king all the respects that any of their rank ever paid to any crowned head: and they lived together in such an easy freedom, that points of ceremony occasioned no disputes among them; though those are often, upon less solemn interviews, the subjects of much quarrelling, and interrupt more important debates.

During this congress, pope Alexander the Eighth, Ottoboni, died. He had succeeded pope Innocent, and sat in that chair almost a year and a half; he was a Venetian, and intended to enrich his family as much as he could. The French king renounced his pretensions to the franchises; and he, in return for that, promoted Fourbin and some others, recommended by that court, to be cardinals; which was much resented by the emperor. Yet he would not yield the point of the regale to the court of France; nor would he grant the bulls for those whom the king had named to the vacant bishoprics in France who had signed the formulary, passed in 1682, that declared the pope fallible, and subject to a general council. When pope Alexander felt himself near death, he passed a bull in due form, by which he confirmed all pope Innocent's bulls; and by this he put a new stop to any reconciliation with the court of France. This he did to render his name and family more acceptable to the Italians, and most particularly to his countrymen, who hated the French as much as they feared them. Upon his death, the conclave continued shut up for five months, before they could agree upon an election. The party of the zealots stood long firm to Barbarigo, who had the reputation of a saint, and seemed in all things to set cardinal Borromeo before him as a pattern: they at last were persuaded to consent to the choice of Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, who, while he was archbishop of Naples, had some disputes with the viceroy, * Dr. William Sherlock was a native of Southwark, where he was born about the year 1641. His education was conducted at Eton and Peter House, Cambridge, where he took his doctor's degree in 1680. At the revolution he at first refused to take the new oaths of allegiance, and exerted himself to induce others to be equally refractory. The government gave him time to consider, and his wife during this interval succeeded in persuading him to change his opinions. A bookseller soon after seeing the doctor handing his wife along St. Paul's church-yard, archly observed, "There goes Dr. Sherlock with his reasons for taking the oaths at his finger's ends." He defended his change of sentiments in a pamphlet entitled "The Cure of Resistance to the Supreme Powers." His controversial writings are of small estimation; but some practical works, especially his "Discourse on Providence," are excellent. He died in 1707. His son, afterwards bishop of London, "Sherlock-like," could not be convinced respecting certain tenets, until decided by the battle of Preston, as that of the Boyne had converted his father.

As Sherlock the elder, with jure divino
Did not comply till the battle of Boyne;
So Sherlock the younger still made it a question Which side he would take, till the battle of Preston.

So said the wits of the day; and the benchers of the Temple, in commending a loyal sermon of the junior Sherlock, preached the Sunday succeeding the battle of Preston, said, "it was a pity it had not been delivered at least the Sunday before."—Noble's Continuation of Grainger; Gen. Biog. Dictionary.

concerning the ecclesiastical immunities, which he asserted so highly, that he excommunicated some of the judges, who, as he thought, had invaded them. The Spaniards had seemed displeased at this; which recommended him so to the French, that they also concurred to his elevation. He assumed pope Innocent's name, and seemed resolved to follow his maxims and steps; for he did not seek to raise his family, of which the king told me a considerable instance: one of his nearest kindred was then in the Spanish service, in Flanders, and hastened to Rome upon his promotion; he received him kindly enough, but presently dismissed him, giving him no other present, if he said true, but some snuff. It is true, the Spaniards afterwards promoted him; but the pope took no notice of that.

To return to the Low Countries: the king of France resolved to break off the conferences at the Hague, by giving the alarm of an early campaign; Mons was besieged; and the king came before it in person. It was thereupon given up, as a lost place; for the French ministers had laid that down among their chief maxims, that their king was never to undertake any thing in his own person, but where he was sure of success. The king broke up the congress, and drew a great army very soon together; and, if the town had held out so long, as they might well have done, or if the governor of Flanders had performed what he undertook, of furnishing carriages to the army, the king would either have raised the siege, or forced the French to a battle. But some priests had been gained by the French, who laboured so effectually among the townsmen, who were almost as strong as the garrison, that they at last forced the governor to capitulate. Upon that, both armies went into quarters of refreshment; and the king came over again to England for a few weeks.

He gave all necessary orders for the campaign in Ireland, in which Ginkle had the chief command. Russel had the command of the fleet, which was soon ready, and well manned. The Dutch squadron came over in good time. The proportion of the quota, settled between England and the States, was, that we were to furnish five, and they three ships of equal rates and strength.

Affairs in Scotland were now brought to some temper; many of the lords, who had been concerned in the late plot, came up, and confessed and discovered all, and took out their pardon; they excused themselves, as apprehending that they were exposed to ruin; and that they dreaded the tyranny of presbytery, no less than they did popery; and they promised that, if the king would so balance matters, that the lord Melvill, and his party, should not have it in their power to ruin them and their friends, and in particular, that they should not turn out the ministers of the episcopal persuasion, who were yet in office, nor force presbyterians on them, they would engage in the king's interests faithfully and with zeal: they also undertook to quiet the Highlanders, who stood out still, and were robbing the country in parties; and they undertook to the king, that, if the episcopal clergy could be assured of his protection, they would all acknowledge and serve him. They did not desire that the king should make any step towards the changing the government, that was settled there; they only desired that episcopal ministers might continue to serve in those places that liked them best; and that no man should be brought into trouble for his opinion, as to the government of the church; and that such episcopal men as were willing to mix with the presbyterians in their judicatories, should be admitted, without any severe imposition in point of opinion.

This looked so fair, and agreed so well with the king's own sense of things, that he very easily hearkened to it; and I did believe that it was sincerely meant; so I promoted it with great zeal, though we afterwards came to see that all this was an artifice of the Jacobites to engage the king to disgust the presbyterians; and by losing them, or at least rendering them remiss in his service, they reckoned they would be soon masters of that kingdom. For the party resolved now to come in generally to take the oaths; but in order to that, they sent one to king James, to shew the necessity of it, and the service they intended him in it; and therefore they asked his leave to take them. That king's answer was more honest; he said he could not consent to that which he thought unlawful; but if any of them took the oaths on design to serve him, and continued to advance his interests, he promised it should never be remembered against them. Young Dalrymple was made conjunct secretary of state, with the lord Melvill; and he undertook to bring in most of the Jacobites to the king's service ; but they entered, at the same time, into a close correspondence with St. Germain: I believed nothing of all this at that time, but went in cordially to serve many, who intended to betray us.

The truth was, the presbyterians, by their violence and other foolish practices, were rendering themselves both odious and contemptible: they had formed a general assembly, in the end of the former year, in which they did very much expose themselves by the weakness and peevishness of their conduct: little learning or prudence appeared among them; poor preaching and wretched haranguing; partialities to one another, and violence and injustice to those who differed from them, shewed themselves in all their meetings. And these did so much sink their reputation, that they were weaning the nation most effectually from all fondness to their government; but the falsehood of many, who, under a pretence of moderating matters, were really undermining the king's government, helped in the sequel to preserve the presbyterians, as much as their own conduct did now alienate the king from them.

The next thing the king did was, to fill the sees vacant by deprivation. He judged right that it was of great consequence, both to his service and to the interests of religion, to have Canterbury well filled; for the rest would turn upon that. By the choice he was to make, all the nation would see, whether he intended to go on with his first design of moderating matters, and healing our breaches, or if he would go into the passions and humours of a high party, that seemed to court him as abjectly as they inwardly hated him. Dr. Tillotson had been now well known to him for two years; his soft and prudent counsels, and his zeal for his service, had begotten, both in the king and queen, a high and just opinion of him. They had both, for above a year, pressed him to come into this post: and he had struggled against it with great earnestness: as he had no ambition, nor aspiring in his temper, so he foresaw what a scene of trouble and slander he must enter on, now in the decline of his age. The prejudices that the Jacobites would possess all people with, for his coming into the room of one, whom they called a confessor*, and who began now to have the public compassion on his side, were well foreseen by him. He also apprehended the continuance of that heat and aversion, that a violent party had always expressed towards him, though he had not only avoided to provoke any of them, but had, upon all occasions, done the chief of them great services, as often as it was in his power. He had large principles, and was free from superstition; his zeal had been chiefly against atheism and popery; but he had never shewed much sharpness against the dissenters. He had lived in a good correspondence with many of them; he had brought several over to the church by the force of reason, and the softness of persuasion and good usage; but was a declared enemy to violence and severities on those heads. Among other prejudices against him, one related to myself: he and I had lived, for many years, in a close and strict friendship; he laid before the king all the ill effects, that, as he thought, the promoting him would have on his own service; but all this had served only to increase the king's esteem of him, and fix him in his purpose.

The bishop of Ely's letters to St. Germain, gave so fair an occasion of filling those sees, at this time, that the king resolved to lay hold on it; and Tillotson, with great uneasiness to himself, submitted to the king's command; and soon after, the see of York falling void, Dr. Sharp was promoted to it: so those two sees were filled with the two best preachers that had sat in them in our time: only Sharp did not know the world so well, and was not so steady as Tillotson was†. Dr. Patrick was advanced to Ely, Dr. Moore was made * Dr. Sancroft.

† Dr. John Sharp was born in 1644, at Bradford, in Yorkshire. His college education was at Christ's, Cambridge. Notwithstanding his talents, it is probable he would not have advanced so rapidly, but from two fortunate connections. He obtained the domestic chaplaincy, and tutorship of the four sons, of sir Heneage Finch, eventually lord chancellor; and his father, a dry-salter, was intimate with Mr. Joshua Tillotson, in the same line of business, uncle to the archbishop. This led to an introduction of the son of the first, to the latter's nephew, and they never after ceased to be intimate friends. Through these interests he obtained, in succession the archdeaconry of Berkshire, a prebend stall of Norwich, the rectory of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and the deanery of Norwich. In a former page has been noticed the displeasure he incurred during the reign of James the Second. At the revolution he was presented to the deanery of Canterbury, and was finally elevated to the see of York, as mentioned in the text above. He died in 1714. Dr. Sharp was devoted to scientific and literary pursuits. At college he was distinguished for his acquirements in chemistry, botany, and mathematics. During his retirement at Norwich, in James's reign, he amused himself with forming a collection of bishop of Norwich, Dr. Cumberland was made bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Fowler was made bishop of Gloucester, Ironside was promoted to Hereford, Grove to Chichester, and Hall to Bristol * ; as Hough, the president of Magdalen's, was the year before this, made bishop of Oxford. So that in two years' time the king had named fifteen bishops ; and they were generally looked on as the most learned, the wisest, and best men, that were in the church. It was visible that in all these nominations, and the filling the inferior dignities, that became void by their promotion, no ambition, nor court favour, had appeared ; men were not scrambling for preferment, nor using arts, or employing friends to set them forward ; on the contrary, men were sought for, and brought out of their retirements ; and most of them very much against their own inclinations : they were men both of moderate principles, and of calm tempers. This great promotion was such a discovery of the king and queen's coins, chiefly British. Shakspeare was his favourite author, and with his writings he was thoroughly acquainted. He used to recommend young divines to read the scriptures, and then that great dramatist, observing that the Bible and Shakspeare made him archbishop of York.—Biog. Britannica. Oxford edition of this work.

* Dr. John Moore was a native of Market Harborough, Leicestershire. He became a fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge, was successively rector of various parishes, chaplain to lord chancellor Nottingham, and to king William and queen Mary. The bishopric of Norwich was given him, as stated above ; and, in 1707, he was translated to Ely. Attending Dr. Bentley's course, he was detained such a lengthened time in the cold hall of Ely-house, that he incurred an illness which eventually killed him, in 1714. Dr. Clarke, his domestic chaplain, has given him a very laudatory character in the preface to his works, which he collected and published. He was a true bibliomaniac, for his love of collecting old books was accompanied by one of its most rabid symptoms,—a proneness to go a step beyond the sin of coveting. The writer remembers to have seen a warning given in a letter to a librarian to be on the look out, " for the bishop of Ely was coming."—"Cave—adamus !" would have been an appropriate motto for him. George the First bought his library, consisting of 28,965 printed volumes, and 1790 MSS., and gave it to the Cambridge university library. Some disturbances happening at the same time in Oxford, a troop of horse was despatched thither by the ministry, which occasioned the following excellent epigram, by Dr. Trapp, or Dr. Warton :—

The king observing, with judicious eyes,
The state of both his universities,
To one he sends a regiment ; For why ?
That learned body wanted loyalty.
To th' other books he gave, as well discerning
How much that loyal body wanted learning.

To this sir William Browne, the physician, wittily replied :—

The king to Oxford sent his troop of horse :
For tories own no argument but force.
With equal care to Cambridge books he sent :
For whigs allow no force, but argument.

Dr. Richard Cumberland, a native of London, and educated at St. Paul's school, and Magdalen College, Cambridge, was quietly pursuing his antiquarian studies, and his duties as a country priest, when he was summoned, without any application on his own part, to fill the see of Peterborough. Never was there a more laudable, more dignified character than his ; for Mr. Noble does not exaggerate when, after describing his published works, his exertions as a clergyman, and his unostentatious, though munificent charities, he adds " languages, divinity, history, physic, mathematics, and indeed every branch of learning and science were understood by him. He might, indeed, be called the patriarch of splendid abilities ; abilities, guarded by religion and integrity, and adorned with the choicest flowers of eloquence." He died in 1718, aged 86, and lies under a tomb he had erected in his own cathedral. Indefatigable in all his duties and pursuits, even at the last period of his life, his friends recommended quiet and relaxation, or that he would wear himself out ; to which he replied, " I had better wear out, than rust out." His memoirs are contained in the preface to one of his works, " Sanchoniatho's Phœnician History," which are ably epitomised in the " Biographia Britannica."

Dr. Edward Fowler, a native of Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, and educated at Oxford, though he graduated at Cambridge, was an exemplary, mild-tempered, tolerant man ; this, which obtained for him a place among those designated Latitudinarians, and his strenuous opposition to papacy, obtained for him the above preferment. He died in 1714, aged eighty-two.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ; Biog. Britan.

Dr. Gilbert Ironside was son of the bishop of Bristol, of the same name. He was born at Winterborne Stepleton, in Dorsetshire, matriculated, and graduated at Wadham college, Oxford, was nominated bishop of Bristol in 1689, and accepted this see under a promise that he should be translated to a better. " Being then about sixty years of age, he took to him a fair widow to be his wife ;" and was, on the death of Dr. Herbert Croft, translated to Hereford, as mentioned above. He seems to have died in 1712, as Dr. Bisse was translated to the see of Hereford in that year.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ; Noble's Cont. of Grainger, ii. 100.

Of Dr. Robert Grove, little is known to the editor. He was a fellow of St. John's, Cambridge ; chaplain to Dr. Henchman ; lecturer and rector of St. Mary Axe. In 1681, he obtained his doctor's degree. In 1688 was rector of St. Mary's Undershaft, and present at the signing the petition to king James by the seven bishops. He probably died in 1724, as in that year Dr. Waddington was consecrated bishop of Chichester.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ; Clarendon Correspondence ; Noble's Cont. of Grainger.

Dr. John, or Joseph (for authorities differ) Hall was the son of a vicar of Bromsgrove, in Worcestershire. He was under the tuition of his uncle, Edmund Hall, at Pembroke college, Oxford. Of this college he became the master in 1664, and retained it forty-five years ; for when consecrated bishop of Bristol, he was allowed to hold his mastership and the rectory of St. Aldgates, adjoining his college, in commendam. He may be said to have spent his whole time in his college, dying there in 1709, and though estimable as a scholar and a divine, yet certainly not sufficiently attentive to his diocese.—Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ; Noble's Cont. of Grainger.

designs, with relation to the church, that it served much to remove the jealousies that some other steps the king had made were beginning to raise in the whigs, and very much softened the ill humour that was spread among them.

As soon as this was over, the king went back to command his army in Flanders. Both armies were now making haste to take the field. But the French were quicker than the confederates had yet learned to be. Prince Waldeck had not got above eighteen thousand men together, when Luxembourg, with an army of forty thousand men, was marching to have surprised Brussels: and at the same time Boufflers, with another army, came up to Liege. Waldeck posted his army so well, that Luxembourg, believing it stronger than indeed it was, did not attempt to break through, in which it was believed he might have succeeded. The king hastened the rest of the troops and came himself to the army in good time, not only to cover Brussels, but to send a detachment to the relief of Liege, which had been bombarded for two days. A body of Germans, as well as that which the king sent to them, came in good time to support those of Liege, who were beginning to think of capitulating. So Boufflers drew off; and the French kept themselves so close in their posts all the rest of the campaign, that though the king made many motions, to try if it was possible to bring them to a battle, yet he could not do it. Signal preservations of his person did again show that he had a watchful Providence still guarding him. Once he had stood under a tree for some time, which the enemy observing, they levelled a cannon so exactly, that the tree was shot down two minutes after the king was gone from the place. There was one that belonged to the train of artillery who was corrupted to set fire to the magazine of powder; and he fired the matches of three bombs: two of these blew up without doing any mischief, though there were twenty-four more bombs in the same waggon on which they lay, together with a barrel of powder: the third bomb was found with the match fired, before it had its effect. If this wicked practice had succeeded, the confusion that was in all reason to be expected upon such an accident, while the enemy was not above a league from them, drawn up and looking for the success of it, must have had terrible effects. It cannot be easily imagined how much mischief might have followed upon it, in the mere destruction of so many as would have perished immediately, if the whole magazine had taken fire, as well as in the panic fear with which the rest would have been struck upon so terrible an accident; by the surprise of it, the French might have had an opportunity to have cut off the whole army. This may well be reckoned one of the miracles of Providence, that so little harm was done, when so much was intended and so near being done. The two armies lay along between the Sambre and the Maese; but no action followed. When the time came of going into quarters, the king left the armies in prince Waldeck's hands, who was observed not to march off with that caution that might have been expected from so old a captain: Luxembourg upon that drew out his horse, with the king's household, designing to cut off his rear; and did, upon the first surprise, put them into some disorder; but they made so good a stand, that, after a very hot action, the French marched off, and lost more men on their side than we did. Auverquerque commanded the body that did this service: and with it the campaign ended in Flanders.

Matters went on at sea with the same caution. Dunkirk was for some time blocked up by a squadron of ours. The great fleet went to find out the French; but they had orders to avoid an engagement: and though for the space of two months Russel did all he could to come up to them, yet they still kept at a distance, and sailed off in the night: so that though he was sometimes in view of them, yet he lost it next day. The trading part of the nation was very apprehensive of the danger the Smyrna fleet might be in, in which the Dutch and English effects together were valued at four millions; for though they had a great convoy, yet the French fleet stood out to intercept them; but they got safe into Kinsale. The season went over without any action; and Russel, at the end of it, came into Plymouth in a storm: which was much censured, for that road is not safe, and two considerable ships were lost upon the occasion. Great factions were among the flag officers; and no other service was done by this great equipment, but that our trade was maintained.

But while we had no success, either in Flanders or at sea, we were more happy in Ireland, even beyond expectation. The campaign was opened with the taking of Baltimore, on which the Irish had wrought much, that Athlone might be covered by it. We took it in one day, and the garrison had only ammunition for a day more. St. Ruth, one of the most violent of all the persecutors of the protestants in France, was sent over with two hundred officers to command the Irish army. This first action reflected much on his conduct, who left a thousand men with so slender a provision of ammunition, that they were all made prisoners of war. From thence Ginkle advanced to Athlone, where St. Ruth was posted on the other side of the Shannon, with an army in number equal to his: the river was deep, but fordable in several places: the castle was soon turned to a ruin by the cannon: but the passing the river in the face of an enemy was no easy thing, the ford being so narrow that they could not pass above twenty in front: parties were sent out to try other fords, which probably made the enemy imagine that they never intended to pass the river just under the town, where the ford was both deep and narrow. Talmash, a general officer, moved, that two battalions might have guineas apiece to encourage them; and he offered to march over at the head of them: which was presently executed by Mackay with so much resolution, that many ancient officers said it was the most gallant action they had ever seen. They passed the river, and went through the breaches into the town, with the loss only of fifty men, having killed above a thousand of the enemy; and yet they spared all that asked quarter. St. Ruth did not upon this occasion act suitably to the reputation he had formerly acquired; he retired to Aghrim, where he posted himself to great advantage, and was much superior to Ginkle in number; for he had abandoned many small garrisons to increase his army, which was now twenty-eight thousand strong; whereas Ginkle had not above twenty thousand; so that the attacking him was no advisable thing, if the courage of the English, and the cowardice of the Irish, had not made a difference so considerable, as neither numbers nor posts could balance.

St. Ruth had indeed taken the most effectual way possible to infuse courage into the Irish: he had sent their priests about among them, to animate them by all the methods they could think of; and, as the most powerful of all others, they made them swear on the sacrament that they would never forsake their colours. This had a great effect on them; for as when Ginkle fell on them they had a great bog before them, and the grounds on both sides were very favourable to them: with those advantages they maintained their ground much longer than they had been accustomed to do. They disputed the matter so obstinately, that for about two hours the action was very hot, and every battalion and squadron on both sides had a share in it. But nature will be always too strong for art; the Irish in conclusion trusted more to their heels than to their hands; the foot threw down their arms and ran away. St. Ruth and many more officers were killed, and about eight thousand soldiers and all their cannon and baggage was taken. So that it was a total defeat; only the night favoured a body of horse that got off. From thence Ginkle advanced to Galway, which capitulated; so that now Limerick was the only place that stood out. A squadron of ships was sent to shut up the river. In the meanwhile, the lords justices issued out a new proclamation, with an offer of life and estate to such as within a fortnight should come under the king's protection.

Ginkle pursued his advantages; and, having reduced all Connaught, he came and sat down before Limerick, and bombarded it; but that had no great effect; and though most of the houses were beat down, yet as long as the Connaught side was open, fresh men and provisions were still brought into the place. When the men of war were come up near the town, Ginkle sent over a part of his army to the Connaught side, who fell upon some bodies of the Irish that lay there and broke them, and pursued them so close as they retired to Limerick, that the French governor, D'Usson, fearing that the English would have come in with them, drew up the bridge, so that many of them were killed and drowned. This contributed very much towards heightening the prejudices that the Irish had against the French. The latter were so inconsiderable, that if Sarsfield and some of the Irish had not joined with them, they could not have made their party good. The earl of Tyrconnel had, with a particular view, studied to divert the French from sending over soldiers into Ireland; for he designed, in case of new misfortunes, to treat with the king, and to preserve himself and his friends; and now he began to dispose the Irish to think of treating, since they saw that otherwise their ruin was inevitable. But as soon as this was suspected, all the military men, who resolved to give themselves up entirely to the French interest, combined against him, and blasted him as a feeble and false man who was not to be trusted. This was carried so far that, to avoid affronts, he was advised to leave the army; and he stayed all this summer at Limerick, where he died of grief, as was believed; but, before he died, he advised all that came to him not to let things go to extremities, but to accept of such terms as could be got: and his words seemed to weigh more after his death than in his lifetime; for the Irish began generally to say, that they must take care of themselves, and not be made sacrifices to serve the ends of the French*. This was much heightened by the slaughter of the Irish whom the French governor had shut out and left to perish. They wanted no provisions in Limerick. And a squadron of French ships stood over to that coast, which was much stronger than ours that had sailed up to the town. So it was to be feared that they might come into the river to destroy our ships.

To hinder that, another squadron of English men of war was ordered thither. Yet the French did not think fit to venture their ships within the Shannon, where they had no places of shelter; the misunderstanding that daily grew between the Irish and the French was great; and all appearance of relief from France failing, made them resolve to capitulate. This was very welcome to Ginkle and his army, who began to be in great wants; for that country was quite wasted, having been the seat of war for three years; and all their draught horses were so wearied out, that their camp was often ill supplied.

When they came to capitulate, the Irish insisted on very high demands; which were set on by the French, who hoped they would be rejected: but the king had given Ginkle secret directions that he should grant all the demands they could make, that would put an end to that war: so every thing was granted, to the great disappointment of the French, and the no small grief of some of the English, who hoped this war would have ended in the total ruin of the Irish interest. During the treaty, a saying of Sarsfield's deserves to be remembered, for it was much talked of all Europe over. He asked some of the English officers if they had not come to a better opinion of the Irish, by their behaviour during this war; and whereas they said it was much the same that it had always been, Sarsfield answered, as low as we now are, change but kings with us, and we will fight it over again with you. Those of Limerick treated not only for themselves, but for all the rest of their countrymen that were yet in arms. They were all indemnified and restored to all that they had enjoyed in king Charles's time. They were also admitted to all the privileges of subjects, upon their taking the oaths of allegiance to their majesties, without being bound to take the oath of supremacy. Not only the French, but as many of the Irish as had a mind to go over to France, had free liberty and a safe transportation. And upon that about twelve thousand of them went over.

And thus ended the war of Ireland: and with that our civil war came to a final end. The articles of capitulation were punctually executed; and some doubts that arose out of some ambiguous words, were explained in favour of the Irish. So earnestly desirous was the king to have all matters quieted at home, that he might direct his whole force against the enemy abroad. The English in Ireland, though none could suffer more by the continuance of the war than they did, yet were uneasy when they saw that the Irish had obtained such good conditions; some of the more violent men among them, who were much exasperated with the wrongs that had been done them, began to call in question the legality of some of the articles: but the parliament of England did not think fit to enter upon that discussion; nor made they any motions towards the violating the capitulation. Ginkle came over full of honour after so glorious a campaign, and was made earl of Athlone, and had noble rewards for the great service he had done; though, without detracting from him, a large share of all that was done was due to some of the general officers, in particular to Rouvigny, made upon this earl of Galway, to Mackay, and Tallmash. Old Rouvigny being dead, his son offered his service to the king, who unwillingly accepted of it; because he knew that an estate which his father had in France, and of which he had still the income, would be immediately confiscated ; but he had no regard to that, and heartily engaged in the king's service, and has been ever since employed in many eminent posts : in all which he has acquitted himself with that great reputation, both for capacity, integrity, courage, and application, as well as success in most of his undertakings, that he is justly reckoned among the great men of the age : and to crown all, he is a man of eminent virtues, great piety, and zeal for religion.

The emperor's affairs in Hungary went on successfully this year, under the command of prince Lewis of Baden ; though he committed an error that was likely to have proved fatal to him : his stores lay near him in great boats on the Danube, but upon some design he made a motion off from that river ; of which the grand vizier took the advantage, and got into his camp between him and his stores ; so that he must either starve, or break through to come at his provisions. The Turks had not time to fortify themselves in their new camp, so he attacked them with such fury, that they were quite routed, and lost camp and cannon and a great part of their army, the grand vizier himself being killed. If the court of Vienna had really desired a peace, they might have had it upon this victory on very easy terms ; but they resolved they would be masters of all Transylvania ; and, in order to that, they undertook the siege of Great Waradin, which they were forced to turn to a blockade ; so that it fell not into their hands till the spring following. The emperor was led on by the prophecies, that assured him of constant conquests, and that he should in conclusion arrive at Constantinople itself : so that the practices of those whom the French had gained about him, had but too much matter to work on in himself.

The news of the total reduction of Ireland confirmed him in his resolutions of carrying on the war in Hungary. It was reckoned that England, being now disengaged at home, would with the rest of the protestant allies be able to carry on the war with France. And the two chief passions in the emperor's mind, being his hatred of heresy, and his hatred of France, it was said, that those about him, who served the interests of that court, persuaded him that he was to let the war go on between France, and those he esteemed heretics ; since he would be a gainer, which side soever should lose ; either France would be humbled, or the heretics be exhausted ; while he should extend his dominions and conquer infidels. The king had a sort of regard and submission to the emperor, that he had to no other prince whatsoever ; so that he did not press him, as many desired he should, to accept of a peace with the Turks, that so he might turn his whole force against France.

Germany was now more entirely united in one common interest than ever. The third party that the French had formed to obstruct the war, were now gone off from those measures, and engaged in the general interest of the empire : the two northern kings had some satisfaction given them in point of trade, that so they might maintain their neutrality : and they were favourable to the allies, though not engaged with them. The king of Sweden, whom the French were pressing to offer his mediation for a peace, wrote to the duke of Hanover, assuring him he would never hearken to that proposition, till he had full assurances from the French, that they would own the present government of England.

That duke, who had been long in a French management, did now break off all commerce with that court, and entered into a treaty both with the emperor and with the king. He promised great supplies against France and the Turk, if he might be made an elector of the empire : in which the king concurred to press the matter so earnestly at the court of Vienna, that they agreed to it, in case he could gain the consent of the other electors ; which the emperor's ministers resolved to oppose, underhand, all they could. He quickly gained the consent of the greater number of the electors ; yet new objections were still made. It was said, that if this was granted, another electorate in a popish family ought also to be created, to balance the advantage that this gave the Lutherans ; and they moved that Austria should be made an electorate. But this was so much opposed, since it gave the emperor two votes in the electoral college, that it was let fall. In conclusion, after a year's negotiation, and a great opposition, both by popish and protestant princes, (some of the latter considering more their jealousies of the house of Hanover than the interest of their religion,) the investiture was given, with the title of elector of Brunswick and great marshal of the empire. The French opposed this with all the artifices they could set at work. The matter lay long in an unsettled state: nor was he now admitted into the college; it being said that the unanimous consent of all the electors must be first had.

The affairs of Savoy did not go on so prosperously as was hoped for: Caraffa, that commanded the imperial army, was more intent on raising contributions than on carrying on the war: he crossed every good motion that was made: Montmelian was lost, which was chiefly imputed to Caraffa: the young duke of Schomberg, sent thither to command those troops that the king paid, undertook to relieve the place, and was assured that many protestants in Dauphiny would come and join him. But Caraffa, and indeed the court of Turin, seemed to be more afraid of the strength of heresy than of the power of France; and chose to let that important place fall into their hands, rather than suffer it to be relieved by those they did not like. When the duke of Savoy's army went into quarters, Caraffa obliged the neighbouring princes and the state of Genoa to contribute to the subsistence of the imperial army, threatening them otherwise with winter quarters; so that how ill soever he managed the duke of Savoy's concerns, he took care of his own. He was recalled upon the complaints made against him on all hands, and Caprara was sent to command in his room.

The greatest danger lay in Flanders, where the feebleness of the Spanish government did so exhaust and weaken the whole country, that all the strength of the confederate armies was scarce able to defend it: the Spaniards had offered to deliver it up to the king, either as he was king of England, or as he was stadtholder of the United Provinces. He knew the bigotry of the people so well, that he was convinced it was not possible to get them to submit to a protestant government: but he proposed the elector of Bavaria, who seemed to have much heat, and an ambition of signalling himself in that country, which was then the chief scene of war: and he could support that government by the troops and treasure that he might draw out of his electorate: besides, if he governed that country well, and acquired a fame in arms, that might give him a prospect of succeeding to the crown of Spain in the right of his electoress, who, if the house of Bourbon was set aside, was next in that succession. The Spaniards agreed to this proposal; but they would not make the first offer of it to that elector, nor would he ask it; and it stuck for some time at this: but the court of Vienna adjusted the matter by making the proposition, which the elector accepted: and that put a new life into those oppressed and miserable provinces.

This was the general state of affairs when a new session of parliament was opened at Westminster, and then it appeared that a party was avowedly formed against the government. They durst not own that before, while the war of Ireland continued. But now, since that was at an end, they began to infuse into all people that there was no need of keeping up a great land army, and that we ought only to assist our allies with some auxiliary troops, and increase our force at sea. Many that understood not the state of foreign affairs were drawn into this conceit, not considering that, if Flanders was lost, Holland must submit and take the best terms they could get. And the conjunction of those two great powers at sea, must presently ruin our trade, and in a little time subdue us entirely. But it was not easy to bring all people to apprehend this aright; and those who had ill intentions would not be beaten out of it, but covered worse designs with this pretence: and this was still kept up as a prejudice against the king and his government, that he loved to have a great army about him; and that when they were once modelled, he would never part with them, but govern in an arbitrary way as soon as he had prepared his soldiers to serve his ends.

Another prejudice had more colour and as bad effects. The king was thought to love the Dutch more than the English, to trust more to them, and to admit them to more freedom with him. He gave too much occasion to a general disgust, which was spread both among the English officers and the nobility: he took little pains to gain the affections of the nation, nor did he constrain himself enough to render his government more acceptable: he was shut up all the day long; and his silence, when he admitted any to an audience, distasted them as much as if they had been denied it. The earl of Marlborough thought that the great services he had done, were not acknowledged, nor rewarded, as they well deserved, and began to speak like a man discontented. And the strain of all the nation almost was, that the English were overlooked, and the Dutch were the only persons favoured or trusted. This was national: and the English being too apt to despise other nations, and bring of more lively tempers than the Dutch, grew to express a contempt and an aversion for them, that went almost to a mutiny. It is true the Dutch behaved themselves so well and so regularly in their quarters, and paid for everything so punctually, whereas the English were apt to be rude and exacting; especially those who were all this winter coming over from Ireland, who had been so long in an enemy's country that they were not easily brought into order; so that the common people were generally better pleased with the Dutch soldiers than with their own countrymen, but it was not the same as to the officers. These seeds of discontent were carefully managed by the enemies of the government; and by those means matters went on heavily in the house of commons. The king was also believed to be so tender in every point that seemed to relate to his prerogative, that he could not well bear anything that was a diminution of it: and he was said to have taken a dislike and mistrust of all those whose notions leaned to public liberty, though those were the persons that were the firmest to him, and the most zealous for him. The men whose notions of the prerogative were the highest were suspected to be Jacobites: yet it was observed that many of these were much courted, and put into employments, in which they showed so little affection to the government, and so close a correspondence with its professed enemies, that it was generally believed they intended to betray it. The blame of employing these men was cast on the earl of Nottingham, who, as the Whigs said, infused into the king jealousies of his best friends, and inclined him to court some of his bitterest enemies.

The taking off parliament men, who complained of grievances, by places and pensions, was believed to be now very generally practised. Seymour, who had in a very injurious manner not only opposed everything, but had reflected on the king's title and conduct, was this winter brought into the treasury and the cabinet council: yet, though a great opposition was made and many delays contrived, all the money that was asked was at length given. Among the bills that were offered to the king at the end of the session, one was to secure the judges' salaries, and to put it out of the king's power to stop them. The judges had their commission during their good behaviour; yet their salaries were not so secured to them, but that these were at the king's pleasure. But the king put a stop to this, and refused to pass the bill; for it was represented to him, by some of the judges themselves, that it was not fit they should be out of all dependence on the court; though it did not appear that there was any hurt in making judges in all respects free and independent. A parliament was summoned to meet in Ireland, to annul all that had passed in king James's parliament; to confirm anew the act of settlement; and to do all other things that the broken state of that impoverished island required; and to grant such supplies as they could raise, and as the state of their affairs would permit.

Affairs in Scotland were put in another method: lord Tweeddale was made lord chancellor, and not long after a marquis in that kingdom: lord Melvill was put in a less important post, and most of his creatures were laid aside: but several of those who had been in Montgomery's plot were brought into the council and ministry. Johnston, who had been sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, was called home and made secretary of state for that kingdom. It began soon to appear in Scotland how ill the king was advised, when he brought in some of the plotters into the chief posts of that government: as this disgusted the presbyterians, so it was very visible that those pretended converts came into his service, only to have it in their power to deliver up that kingdom to king James. They scarcely disguised their designs; so that the trusting such men amazed all people. The presbyterians had very much offended the king, and their fury was instrumental in raising great jealousies of him in England: he well foresaw the ill effects this was likely to have, and therefore he recommended to a general assembly, that met this winter, to receive the episcopal clergy, to concur with them in the government of the church, upon their desiring to be admitted: and in case the assembly could not be brought to consent to this, the king ordered it to be dissolved, without naming any other time or place of meeting. It was not likely that there could be any agreement, where both parties were so much inflamed one against another:

and those who had the greatest credit with both, studied rather to exasperate than to soften them. The episcopal party carried it high : they gave it out that the king was now theirs, and that they were willing to come to a concurrence with presbytery, on design to bring all about to episcopacy in a little time. The presbyterians, who at all times were stiff and peevish, were more than ordinarily so at this time : they were jealous of the king ; their friends were now disgraced, and their bitterest enemies were coming into favour : so they were surly, and would abate in no point of their government : and upon that the assembly was dissolved. But they pretended that by law they had a right to an annual meeting, from which nothing could cut them off ; for they said, according to a distinction much used among them, that the king's power of calling synods and assemblies was cumulative, and not privative : that is, he might call them if he would, and appoint time and place ; but that, if he did not call them, they might meet by an inherent right that the church had, which was confirmed by law : therefore they adjourned themselves. This was represented to the king as a high strain of insolence that invaded the rights of the crown, of which he was become very sensible. Most of those who came now into his service, made it their business to incense him against the presbyterians, in which he was so far engaged, that it did alienate that party much from him.

There was at this time, a very barbarous massacre committed in Scotland, which showed both the cruelty and the treachery of some of those who had unhappily insinuated themselves into the king's confidence. The earl of Bredalbane formed a scheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the king would give twelve or fifteen thousand pounds for doing it, which was remitted down from England : and this was to be divided among the heads of the tribes or clans of the highlanders. He employed his emissaries among them, and told them the best service they could do king James, was to lie quiet, and reserve themselves to a better time : and if they would take the oaths, the king would be contented with that, and they were to have a share of this sum that was sent down to buy their quiet. But this came to nothing ; their demands rose high ; they knew this lord had money to distribute among them ; they believed he intended to keep the best part of it to himself ; so they asked more than he could give. Among the most clamorous and obstinate of these were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, who were believed guilty of much robbery and many murders, and so had gained too much by their pilfering war to be easily brought to give it over. The head of that valley had so particularly provoked lord Bredalbane, that as his scheme was quite defeated by the opposition that he raised, so he designed a severe revenge. The king had, by a proclamation, offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders that had been in arms against him, upon their coming in, by a prefixed day, to take the oaths : the day had been twice or thrice prolonged, and it was at last carried to the end of the year 1691 ; with a positive threatening of proceeding to military execution against such as should not come into his obedience by the last day of December.

All were so terrified that they came in ; and even that Macdonald went to the governor of Fort William, on the last of December, and offered to take the oaths ; but he, being only a military man, could not, or would not, tender them, and Macdonald was forced to seek for some of the legal magistrates to tender them to him. The snows were then fallen, so four or five days passed before he could come to a magistrate : he took the oaths in his presence, on the fourth or fifth of January, when, by the strictness of law, he could claim no benefit by it. The matter was signified to the council, and the person had a reprimand for giving him the oaths when the day was past.

This was kept up from the king : and the earl of Bredalbane came to court to give an account of his diligence, and to bring back the money, since he could not do the service for which he had it. He informed against this Macdonald, as the chief person who had defeated that good design : and that he might both gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to all the Highlanders, he proposed that orders should be sent for a military execution on those of Glencoe. An instruction was drawn by the secretary of state, lord Stair, to be both signed and countersigned by the king (that so he might bear no part of the blame, but that it might lie wholly on the king), that such as had not taken the oaths by the time limited should be shut out of the benefit of the indemnity, and be received only upon mercy.

But when it was found that this would not authorise what was intended, a second order was got to be signed and countersigned, that if the Glencoe men could be separated from the rest of the Highlanders, some examples might be made of them, in order to strike terror into the rest. The king signed this without any inquiry about it; for he was too apt to sign papers in a hurry, without examining the importance of them. This was one effect of his slowness in dispatching business; for, as he was apt to suffer things to run on till there was a great heap of papers laid before him, so then he signed them a little too precipitately. But all this while the king knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the oaths within the time, nor of his having taken them, soon after it was passed, when he came to a proper magistrate. As these orders were sent down, the secretary of state wrote many private letters to Levingston, who commanded in Scotland, giving him a strict charge and particular directions for the execution of them: and he ordered the passes in the valley to be kept, describing them so minutely, that the orders were certainly drawn by one who knew the country well. He gave also a positive direction that no prisoners should be taken, that so the execution might be as terrible as was possible. He pressed this upon Levingston with strains of vehemence that looked as if there was something more than ordinary in it: he indeed grounded it on his zeal for the king's service, adding, that such rebels and murderers should be made examples of.

In February a company was sent to Glencoe, who were kindly received and quartered over the valley; the inhabitants thinking themselves safe, and looking for no hostilities. After they had staid a week among them, they took their time in the night and killed about six-and-thirty of them, the rest taking the alarm and escaping. This raised a mighty outcry, and was published by the French in their gazettes, and by the jacobites in their libels, to cast a reproach on the king's government as cruel and barbarous; though in all other instances it had appeared that his own inclinations were gentle and mild rather to an excess. The king sent orders to enquire into the matter; but when the letters written upon this business were all examined, which I myself read, it appeared that so many were involved in the matter, that the king's gentleness prevailed on him to a fault; and he contented himself with dismissing only the master of Stair from his service. The Highlanders were so inflamed with this, that they were put in as forward a disposition as the jacobites could wish for to have rebelled upon the first favourable opportunity: and indeed the not punishing this with a due rigour was the greatest blot in this whole reign, and had a very great effect in alienating that nation from the king and his government*.

An incident happened near the end of this session that had very ill effects; which I unwillingly mention, because it cannot be told without some reflections on the memory of the queen, whom I always honoured beyond all the persons I had ever known. The earl of Nottingham came to the earl of Marlborough with a message from the king, telling him that he had no more use for his services, and therefore he demanded all his commissions. What drew so sudden and so hard a message was not known; for he had been with the king that morning, and had parted with him in the ordinary manner. It seemed some letter was intercepted, which gave suspicion: it is certain that he thought he was too little considered, and that he had upon many occasions censured the king's conduct, and reflected on the Dutch. But the original cause of his disgrace arose from another consideration: the princess

* A very interesting anecdote, connected with this cruel massacre, is told by colonel Stewart, in his "Sketches of the Highlands." He relates that the belief that punishment for cruelty, oppression, or misconduct, in an individual, descended as a curse on his children, to the third and fourth generation, was not confined to the common people—all ranks were influenced by this belief. The late colonel Campbell, of Glenlyon, retained this creed during a thirty years' intercourse with the world, as an officer in the 42nd regiment. He was grandson of the lord of Glenlyon, who commanded the military at the massacre of Glencoe. In the year 1771, he was ordered to superintend the execution of a soldier, condemned to death by the sentence of a court martial. A reprieve, in the mean time, arrived, with an order that the ceremony should proceed till the very moment of execution, when it was directed to supersede the fatal order to fire. The colonel gave strict orders to the men not to fire till he pulled a white handkerchief from his pocket as the signal. When all was prepared, and the clergyman had performed the last sacred rites of religion, the colonel pulled the reprieve from his pocket—but with it the white handkerchief; at the sight of which twenty bullets pierced the heart of the reprieved victim! The paper dropped from the colonel's hand, and, striking his forehead, he exclaimed in unutterable agony, "The curse of God and of Glencoe is here." He instantly retired from the service, and wept over this unfortunate accident till the day of his death.

thought herself too much neglected by the king, whose cold way towards her was soon observed : after the king was on the throne, no propositions were made to her of a settlement, nor any advances of money. So she, thinking she was to be kept in a necessitous dependence on the court, got some to move in the house of commons, in the year 1690, when they were in the debate concerning the revenue, that she should have assignments suitable to her dignity. This both king and queen took amiss from her : the queen complained more particularly that she was then ill, after the lying-in of the duke of Gloucester at Hampton Court, and that she herself was treating her and the young child with the tenderness of a mother, and that yet such a motion was made before she had tried, in a private way, what the king intended to assign her. The princess, on the other hand, said she knew the queen was a good wife, submissive and obedient to every thing that the king desired ; so she thought the best way was to have a settlement by act of parliament. On the other hand, the custom had always been that the royal family (a prince of Wales not excepted) was kept in a dependence on the king, and had no allowance but from his mere favour and kindness ; yet in this case, in which the princess was put out of the succession during the king's life, it seemed reasonable that somewhat more than ordinary should be done in consideration of that. The act passed, allowing her a settlement of fifty thousand pounds. But upon this a coldness followed, between not only the king, but even the queen, and the princess. And the blame of this motion was cast on the countess of Marlborough, as most in favour with the princess : and this had contributed much to alienate the king from her husband, and had disposed him to receive ill impressions of him.

Upon his disgrace, his lady was forbidden the court. The princess would not submit to this ; she thought she ought to be allowed to keep what persons she pleased about herself. And when the queen insisted on the thing, she retired from the court. There were, no doubt, ill offices done on all hands, as there were some that pressed the princess to submit to the queen, as well as others who pressed the queen to pass it over, but without effect : both had engaged themselves before they had well reflected on the consequences of such a breach : and the matter went so far, that the queen ordered that no public honours should be shown the princess, besides many other lesser matters, which I unwillingly reflect on, because I was much troubled to see the queen carry such a matter so far : and the breach continued to the end of her life. The enemies of the government tried what could be made of this to create distractions among us : but the princess gave no encouragement to them. So that this misunderstanding had no other effect, but that it gave enemies much ill-natured joy and a secret spiteful diversion*.

The king gave Russel the command of the fleet ; though he had put himself on ill terms with him, by pressing to know the grounds of the earl of Marlborough's disgrace : he had not only lived in great friendship with him, but had carried the first messages that had passed between him and the king when he went over to Holland : he almost upbraided the king with the earl of Marlborough's services, who, as he said, had set the crown on his head. Russel also came to be on ill terms with the earl of Nottingham, who, as he thought, supported a faction among the flag officers against him : and he fell indeed into so ill an humour on many accounts, that he seemed to be for some time in doubt whether he ought to undertake the command of the fleet or not. I tried, at the desire of some of his friends, to soften him a little, but without success.

The king went over to Holland in March to prepare for an early campaign. He intimated somewhat in his speech to the parliament of a descent designed upon France ; but we had neither men nor money to execute it. And, while we were pleasing ourselves with the thoughts of a descent on France, king James was preparing for a real one on England. It was intended to be made in the end of April : he had about him fourteen thousand English and Irish : and marshal Belfonds was to accompany him with about three thousand French.

* A lengthy account of this affair is given in the duchess of Marlborough's letters, published in 1742, in which she terms this "the famous quarrel." It is accompanied by a long letter from queen Mary to the princess Anne, insisting upon her breaking with the Marlboroughs instantly, and threatening the royal displeasure, &c. in case of disobedience. This is followed by Anne's answer, dated February 2nd, 1692, remonstrating, and another letter closing the correspondence by a positive refusal.

They were to sail from Cherbourg and La Hogue, and some other places in Normandy, and to land in Sussex, and from thence to march with all haste to London. A transport fleet was also brought thither: they were to bring over only a small number of horses; for their party in England undertook to furnish them with horses at their landing. At the same time the king of France was to march with a great army into Flanders; and he reckoned that the descent in England would either have succeeded, since there was a very small force left within the kingdom, or at least that it would have obliged the king to come over with some of his English troops: and in that case, which way soever the war of England had ended, he should have mastered Flanders, and so forced the States to submit: and in case other designs had failed there was one in reserve, managed by the French ministry and by Luxembourg, of assassinating the king, which would have brought about all their designs. The French king seemed to think the project was so well laid that it could not miscarry; for he said publicly, before he set out, that he was going to make an end of the war. We in England were all this while very secure, and did not apprehend we were in any danger. Both the king and his secretaries were much blamed for taking so little care to procure intelligence: if the winds had favoured the French, they themselves would have brought us the first news of their design: they sent over some persons to give their friends notice but a very few days before they reckoned they should be on our coast: one of these was a Scotchman, and brought the first discovery to Johnstoun: orders were presently sent out to bring together such forces as lay scattered in quarters: and a squadron of our fleet that was set to sea was ordered to lay on the coast of Normandy; but the heavens fought against them more effectually than we could have done. There was for a whole month together such a storm that lay on their coast, that it was not possible for them to come out of their ports; nor could marshal D'Estrees come about with the squadron from Toulon, so soon as was expected. In the beginning of May, about forty of our ships were on the coast of Normandy, and were endeavouring to destroy their transport ships: upon which, orders were sent to marshal Tourville to sail to the channel and fight the English fleet. They had a westerly wind to bring them within the channel, but then the wind struck into the east, and stood so long there, that it both brought over the Dutch fleet and brought about our great ships. By this means our whole fleet was joined: so that Tourville's design of getting between the several squadrons that composed it was lost. The king of France, being then in Flanders, upon this change of wind, sent orders to Tourville not to fight: yet the vessel that carried these was taken, and the duplicate of these orders, that was sent by another conveyance, came not to him till the day after the engagement.

On the nineteenth of May, Russel came up with the French, and was almost twice their number; yet not above the half of his ships could be brought into the action, by reason of the winds: Rook, one of his admirals, was thought more in fault. The number of the ships that engaged was almost equal: our men said that the French neither showed courage nor skill in the action. The night and a fog separated the two fleets, after an engagement that had lasted some hours. The greatest part of the French ships drew near their coasts; but Russel not casting anchor, as the French did, was carried out by the tide: so next morning he was at some distance from them. A great part of the French fleet sailed westward through a dangerous sea, called the Race of Alderney: Ashby was sent to pursue them; and he followed them some leagues: but then the pilots pretending danger, he came back: so twenty-six of them, whom if Ashby had pursued, by all appearance, he had destroyed them all, got into St. Malo's. Russel came up to the French admiral and the other ships that had drawn near their coasts. Delaval burnt the Admiral and his two seconds; and Rook burnt sixteen more before La Hogue*.

* It is said that Louis the Fourteenth, knowing that admiral Russel was avaricious, sent him 20,000*l.*, requesting him not to fight on this occasion, but to manœuvre. Under pretence of deliberating, he sent to William the Third, to know how he was to act. The answer was laconic—"Take the money, and beat them." William raised him in 1697 to the peerage, by the title of the earl of Orford in Suffolk, and viscount Barfleur in Normandy. His various services and reverses will be noticed in future pages. He died in 1727. That he was avaricious seems admitted; but he was beloved in private life, and idolised by his sailors. One of his festivals had an accompaniment quite in the nautical style. He had made a cistern of punch, composed of four hogsheds of brandy, eight

It was believed, that if this success had been pursued with vigour, considering the consternation with which the French were struck upon such an unusual and surprising blow, that this victory might have been carried much farther than it was. But Russel was provoked by some letters and orders that the earl of Nottingham sent him from the queen, which he thought were the effects of ignorance : and upon that he fell into a crossness of disposition : he found fault with every order that was sent him ; but would offer no advices on his part. And he came soon after to St. Helen's, which was much censured ; for though the disabled ships must have been sent in, yet there was no such reason for bringing in the rest that were not touched. Cross winds kept them long in port ; so that a great part of the summer was spent before he went out again. The French had recovered out of the first disorder which had quite dispirited them. A descent in France came to be thought on when it was too late : about seven thousand men were shipped, and it was intended to land them at St. Malo's ; but the seamen were of opinion that neither there nor any where else a descent was then practicable. They complained that the earl of Nottingham was ignorant of sea affairs, and yet that he set on propositions relating to them, without consulting seamen, and sent orders which could not be obeyed without endangering the whole fleet. So the men who were thus shipped lay some days on board, to the great reproach of our counsels : but that we might not appear too ridiculous, both at home and abroad, by landing them again in England, the king ordered them to be sent over to Flanders, after they had been for some weeks on shipboard. And so our campaign at sea, that began so gloriously, had a poor conclusion. The common reflection that was made on our conduct was, that the providence of God and the valour of our men had given us a victory, of which we knew not what use to make ; and, which was worse, our merchants complained of great losses this summer ; for the French having laid up their fleet, let their seamen go and serve in privateers, with which they watched all the motions of our trade : and so by an odd reverse of things, as we made no considerable losses, while the French were masters of our sea two years before, so now, when we triumphed on that element, our merchants suffered the most. The conclusion of all was Russel complained of the ministry, particularly of the earl of Nottingham ; and they complained no less of him ; and the merchants complained of the admiralty : but they, in their own defence, said that we had not ships nor seamen, both to furnish out a great fleet and at the same time to send out convoys for securing the trade.

In Flanders the design, to which the French trusted most, failed : that was laid for assassinating the king : one Grandval had been in treaty with Louvois about it ; and it was intended to be executed the former year. He joined with Du Mont to follow the king and shoot him as he was riding about in his ordinary way, moving slowly, and visiting the posts of his army. The king of France had lost two ministers one after another. Seignelay died first, who had no extraordinary genius himself ; but he knew all his father's methods, and pursued them so, that he governed himself both by his father's maxims and with his tools. Louvois did not survive him long ; he had more fire, and so grew uneasy at the authority madame de Maintenon took in things which she could not understand : and was in conclusion so unacceptable to the king, that once, when he flung his bundle of papers down upon the floor before him, upon some provocation, the king lifted up his cane : but the lady held him from doing more : yet that affront, as was given out, sunk so deep into Louvois' spirits, that he died suddenly a few days after. Some said it was of an apoplexy ; others suspected poison : for a man that knew so many secrets would have been dangerous if he had outlived his favour. His son, Barbesieux, had the survivance of his place, and continued in it for some years ; but, as he was young, so he had not a capacity equal to the post. He found, among his father's papers, a memorandum of this design of Grandval's : so he sent for him, and resolved to pursue it ; in which madame de Maintenon concurred, and Luxembourg was trusted with the direction of it. Du Mont retired this winter to Zell, as one that had forsaken the French service : from some practices and discourses of his a suspicion arose, of which sir William Colt, the king's envoy there, gave notice : so one Leefdale, a Dutch papist, was secretly sent to Paris, as a person that would enter into the design ; but, in reality, went on purpose to discover it.

Grandval and he came back to Flanders to set about it : but Leefdale brought him into a party that seized on him. Both king James and his queen were, as Grandval said, engaged in the design : one Parker, whom they employed in many black designs, had concerted the matter with Grandval, as he confessed, and had carried him to king James, who encouraged him to go on with it, and promised great rewards. When Grandval saw there was full proof against him, he confessed the whole series of the management without staying till he were put to the torture. Mr. Morel, of Berne, a famous medalist (who had for some years the charge of the French king's cabinet of medals, but being a protestant, and refusing to change his religion, was kept a close prisoner in the Bastile for seven years), was let out in April this year. And, before he left Paris, his curiosity carried him to St. Germain's, to see king James : he happened both to go and come back in the coach with Grandval ; and while he was there he saw him in private discourse with king James : Grandval was full of this project, and, according to the French way, he talked very loosely to Morel, not knowing who he was ; but fancied he was well affected to that court. He said there was a design in hand that would confound all Europe : for the prince of Orange, so he called the king, would not live a month. This Morel wrote over to me in too careless a manner ; for he directed his letter with his own hand, which was well known at court ; yet it came safe to me. The king gave orders that none belonging to him should go near Grandval, that there might be no colour for saying that the hopes of life had drawn his confession from him : nor was he strictly interrogated concerning circumstances ; but was left to tell his story as he pleased himself. He was condemned ; and suffered with some slight remorse for going into a design to kill a king. His confession was printed. But how black soever it represented the court of France, no notice was taken of it : nor did any of that court offer to disown or disprove it, but let it pass and be forgotten : yet so blind and violent was their party among us, that they resolved they would believe nothing that either blemished king James or the French court.

But though this miscarried, the French succeeded in the siege of Namur, a place of great importance, that commanded both the Meuse and Sambre, and covered both Liege and Maestricht : the town did soon capitulate, but the citadel held out much longer. The king came with a great army to raise the siege : Luxembourg lay in his way with another to cover it, and the Meuse lay between. The king intended to pass the river and force a battle ; but such rains fell the night before he designed to do it, and the river swelled so much, that he could not pass it for some days : he tried, by another motion, to come and raise the siege. But the town having capitulated so early, and the citadel laying on the other side of the Sambre, he could not come at it : so after a month's siege it was taken. This was looked on as the greatest action of the French king's life ; that, notwithstanding the depression of such a defeat at sea, he yet supported his measures so as to take that important place in the view of a great army. The king's conduct was on this occasion much censured : it was said, he ought to have put much to hazard, rather than suffer such a place to be taken in his sight.

After Namur surrendered, that king went back to Paris in his usual method ; for, according to the old Persian luxury, he used to bring the ladies with him, with the music, poems, and scenes, for an opera and a ball ; in which he and his actions were to be set out with the pomp of much flattery. When this action was over, his forces lay on the defensive, and both armies made some motions, watching and waiting on one another.

At Steenkirk, the king thought he had a favourable occasion for attacking the French in their camp ; but the ground was found to be narrower and less practicable than the king had been made to believe it was. Ten battalions began the attack, and carried a post with cannon, and maintained it long, doing great execution on the enemy ; and if they had been supported or brought off it would have proved a brave attempt ; but they were cut in pieces. In the whole action the French lost many more men than the confederates did, for they came so thick that our fire made great execution. The conduct of this affair was much censured. It was said, the ground ought to have been better examined before the attack was begun, and the men ought to have been better maintained than they were: for many thought that, if this had been done, we might have had a total victory. Count Solms bore the blame of the errors committed on this occasion. The English had been sometimes checked by him, as he was much disgusted with their heat and pride: so they charged all on him, who had some good qualities; but did not manage them in an obliging manner. We lost in this action about five thousand men, and many brave officers. Here Mackay was killed, being ordered to a post that he saw could not be maintained: he sent his opinion about it; but the former orders were confirmed: so he went on, saying only, "The will of the Lord be done." He was a man of such strict principles, that he would not have served in a war that he did not think lawful. He took great care of his soldiers' morals, and forced them to be both sober and just in their quarters: he spent all the time that he was master of in secret prayers, and in reading of the Scriptures. The king often observed that when he had full leisure for his devotions, he acted with a peculiar exaltation of courage. He had one very singular quality: in councils of war he delivered his opinion freely, and maintained it with due zeal; but how positive soever he was in it, if the council of war overruled, even though he was not convinced by it, yet to all others he justified it, and executed his part with the same zeal as if his own opinion had prevailed. After the action at Steenkirk, there was little done this campaign. A detachment that the king sent from his army, joined with those bodies that came from England, broke in some way into the French conquests: they fortified Dixmuyde and Furness, and put the country about them under contribution, and became very uneasy neighbours to Dunkirk. The command of those places was given to the count of Horn, who understood well the way to make all possible advantages by contributions; but he was a man of no great worth, and of as little courage. This disgusted the English still more; who said the Dutch were always trusted and preferred, while they were neglected. They had some colour to censure this choice the following winter; for, upon the motion of some French troops, Horn (without studying to amuse the enemy, or to gain time, upon which much may depend in winter) did immediately abandon Dixmuyde. All he had to justify himself was a letter from the elector of Bavaria, telling him that he could send him no relief; and therefore he ordered him to take care of the garrison, which was of more importance than the place itself. Thus the campaign ended in Flanders; Namur was lost; the reputation of the king's conducting armies was much sunk; and the English were generally discontented, and alienated from the Dutch.

Nothing was done on the Rhine. The elector of Saxony had promised to bring an army thither; but Shening, his general, who had great power over him, was gained by the French to break his design. The duke of Saxony complained that the emperor favoured the circles of Franconia and Swabia so much, that he could have no good quarters assigned him for his army: and upon this occasion it was said that the emperor drew much money from those circles, that they might be covered from winter quarters; and that he applied all that to carrying on the war in Hungary; and so left the weight of the war with France to lie very heavy on the princes of the empire. This contest went on so high, that Shening, who was thought the ill instrument in it, going for his health to the hot baths in Bohemia, was seized on by the emperor's orders; upon which great expostulations passed between the courts of Vienna and Dresden. There were two small armies that acted separately on the Rhine, under the command of the landgrave of Hesse and the marquis of Bareith: but they were not able to cover the empire: and another small army, brought together by the duke of Wirtemberg, for the defence of his country, was totally defeated: not only cannon and baggage, but the duke himself, fell into the enemy's hands.

But though the emperor did, as it were, abandon the empire to the French, he made no great progress in Hungary: the Turks lay upon the defensive, and the season was spent in motions, without either battle or siege. There was still some discourse, but no great probability, of peace. Two English ambassadors dying, the one sir Thomas Hussay, soon after his arrival at Constantinople, and the other, Mr. Harbord, on his way thither: the lord Paget, then our ambassador at the emperor's court, was ordered to go thither, to mediate the peace. He found the mediation was, in a great measure, spoiled by the Dutch ambassador before his arrival; for he had been prevailed on, by the court of Vienna, to offer the mediation of the Dutch upon a very high scheme. Caminieck and the Ukrain, and Podolia, with Moldavia and Valachia, were demanded for Poland: Transylvania, with the person of count Tekeli, for the emperor; and Achaia and Livadia, as an antemurale to cover the Morea, for the Venetians. The court of Vienna, by offering such a project, reckoned the war must go on, which they desired. The ministers of the Porte, who were gained by the French to carry on the war, were glad to see so high a project: they were afraid of tumults; so they spread this project over the whole empire, to show on what ignominious terms the mediation was proposed; and by that they justified their going on with the war. But the lord Paget offered the king's mediation upon another project; which was, that every prince was to keep what he was then possessed of: and Caminieck was only demanded to be razed. If this had been offered at first, the Ottoman court durst not have refused it; the people were become so weary under a long and unprosperous war: but the vizier suppressed this, and made it still pass among them, that the English pressed the same project that the Dutch had proposed; which was the more easily believed there, because how ignorant soever they were at that court, they knew well what an interest the king of England had in the States. So the war was still carried on there: and Trumball, who came over to England at this time, told the king that if, instead of sending embassies, he would send a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, to destroy the French trade and stop the commerce with Turkey, he would quickly bring that court to other measures, or raise such tumults among them as would set that empire, and even Constantinople itself, all in a flame.

In Piedmont, the campaign was opened very late, and the French were on the defensive; so the duke of Savoy entered into Dauphiny with an army; and if he had carried on that attempt with the spirit with which he began it, he had put the affairs of France on that side into great disorder; but he was either ill served or betrayed in it: he sat down before Ambrun, and besieged it in form: so that a place, which he might have carried in three days, cost him some weeks: and in every step he made it appear there was either a great feebleness, or much treachery, in his counsels. He made no great progress; yet the disorder it threw that and the neighbouring provinces into was very great. He was stopped by the small-pox, which saved his honour as much as it endangered his person: the retreat of his army, when his life was in danger, looked like a due caution. He recovered of the small-pox, but a ferment remained still in his blood, and broke out so often into feverish relapses, that it was generally thought he was poisoned. Many months passed before he was out of danger. So the campaign ended there with considerable losses to the French, but with no great advantage to the duke. The greatest prejudice the French suffered this year was from the season: they had a very bad harvest and no vintage in the northern parts. We in England had great apprehensions of as bad a harvest from a very cold and wet summer. Great deluges of rain continued till the very time of reaping. But, when we were threatened with a famine, it pleased God to send such an extraordinary change of the season, that we had a very plentiful crop; enough both to serve ourselves and to supply our neighbours, which made us easy at home, and brought in much wealth for that corn which we were able to spare.

In the beginning of September there was an earthquake felt in most places in England, and was at the same time felt in many parts of France, Germany, and the Netherlands. No harm was done by it, though it continued for three or four minutes. I can write nothing of it from my own observation, for it was not sensible in the place where I happened to be at that time; nor can it be determined whether this had any relation to those terrible earthquakes that happened some months after this in Sicily and Malta, upon which I cannot enlarge, having seen no other account of them than what was in public gazettes, which represented them as the most dreadful by much of any that are in history: it was estimated that about one hundred thousand persons perished by them in Sicily. It is scarcely to be imagined that the earthquake, which about the same time destroyed the best part of the chief town in Jamaica, could have any connection with these in Europe. These were very extraordinary things, which made those who studied apocalyptical matters imagine that the end of the world drew near. It had been happy for us if such dismal accidents had struck us with a deeper sense of the judgments of God.

We were indeed brought to more of an outward face of virtue and sobriety: and the great examples that the king and queen set the nation had made some considerable alterations as to public practices, but we became deeply corrupted in principle: a disbelief of revealed religion, and a profane mocking at the Christian faith and the mysteries of it, became avowed and scandalous. The queen, in the king's absence, gave orders to execute the laws against drunkenness, swearing, and the profanation of the Lord's day, and sent directions over England to all magistrates to do their duty in executing them; to which the king joined his authority upon his return to England. Yet the reformation of manners, which some zealous men studied to promote, went on but slowly: many of the inferior magistrates were not only remiss but very faulty themselves: they did all they could to discourage those who endeavoured to have vice suppressed and punished: and it must be confessed that the behaviour of many clergymen gave atheists no small advantage: they had taken the oaths and read the prayers for the present government; they observed the orders for public fasts and thanksgivings; and yet they showed in many places their aversion to our establishment but too visibly: so that the offence that this gave in many parts of the nation was too evident: in some places it broke out in very indecent instances, that were brought into courts of law and censured. This made many conclude that the clergy were a sort of men that would swear and pray even against their consciences rather than lose their benefices; and by consequence that they were governed by interest and not by principle. The jacobites grew still to be more and more outrageous, while the clergy seemed to be neutrals in the dispute; and, which was yet the most extraordinary thing in the whole matter, the government itself acted with so much remissness, and so few were enquired after or punished, that those who were employed by the king behaved themselves in many places as if they had secret instructions to be heavy upon his best friends, and to be gentle to his enemies. Upon the whole matter, the nation was falling under such a general corruption, both as to morals and principles, and that was so much spread among all sorts of people, that it gave us great apprehensions of heavy judgments from Heaven*.

The session of parliament was opened under great disadvantages. The earl of Marlborough and some other peers had been put in the Tower upon a false accusation of high treason, which was evidently proved to be a conspiracy, designed by some profligate creatures, who fancied that forgeries and false-swearing would be as acceptable and as well rewarded in this reign as they had been formerly. But, till this was detected, the persons accused were kept in prison, and were now only out upon bail: so it was said to be contrary to the nature and freedom of parliaments for prisoners to sit in it. It was confessed that in times of danger, and such was the former summer, it must be trusted to the discretion of a government, to commit such persons as were suspected: but when the danger was over, by our victory at sea, those against whom there lay nothing besides suspicions, ought to have been set at liberty: and this was thought reasonable. There was an association pretended to be drawn against the government, to which the subscriptions of many lords were set so dexterously, that the lords themselves said they could not distinguish between their true subscriptions and those that were forged for them. But the manner of the discovery, with several other circumstances, carried such marks of imposture, that the lords of the council ordered a strict prosecution of all concerned in it, which ended in a full conviction of the forgery: and those who had combined in it were whipped and pilloried, which, to the reproach of our constitution, is the only punishment that our law has yet provided for such practices. The lords passed some votes, asserting their privileges; and were offended with the judges for detaining some in prison, though there was no reason nor colour for their displeasure. But where the privilege or the dignity of peerage is in question, it is not easy to keep the house within bounds.

The debate went off in a bill that indemnified the ministry for those commitments, but limited them for the future by several rules; all which rules were rejected by the commons. They thought those limitations gave a legal power to commit in cases where they were observed; whereas they thought the safer way was to indemnify the ministry, when it was visible they did not commit any but upon a real danger, and not to set them any rules; since, as to the committing of suspected persons, where the danger is real and visible, the public safety must be first looked to and supersede all particular laws. When this was over, an attempt was made in both houses, for the abjuration of king James: the king himself was more set on it than he had been formerly. It was rejected by the house of commons: and though some steps were made in it by the lords, yet the opposition was so great that it was let fall.

The affairs at sea occasioned much heat in both houses. The earl of Nottingham laid before the lords, upon an address they had made to the king, all the letters that had passed between himself and Russel, with all the orders he had sent him: and he aggravated Russel's errors and neglects very severely. But the house of commons justified Russel and gave him thanks over and over again; and remained so fixed in this, that though the lords then communicated the papers the earl of Nottingham had laid before them to the commons, they would not so much as read them, but renewed their first votes that justified Russel's fidelity, courage, and conduct.

The king was now possessed against him: for he dismissed him from his service, and put the command of the fleet into the hands of three persons, Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel: the two first were thought so inclinable to king James's interests, that it made some insinuate that the king was in the hands of those who intended to betray him to his enemies; for though no exception lay against Shovel, yet it was said, he was only put with the other two to give some reputation to the commission, and that he was one against two: so that he could neither hinder nor do any thing. The chief blame of this nomination was thrown on the earl of Nottingham; and of those who belonged to his office many stories were raised and spread about, as if there had been among them, besides a very great remissness in some of the concerns of the government, an actual betraying of all our secrets and counsels. The opinion of this was spread both within and without the kingdom, and most of our confederates were possessed with it. He justified not only himself but all his under secretaries; both the king and queen continued still to have a good opinion of his fidelity; but they saw some defects in his judgment, with a most violent party heat, that appeared upon all occasions, and even in the smallest matters. The bills for the supply went on with a heavy progress in the house of commons; those who could not oppose them yet showed their ill humour in delaying them, and clogging them with unacceptable clauses all they could. And they continued that wasteful method of raising money upon remote funds, by which there lay a heavy discount on tallies; so that above a fourth part was, in some of them, to be discounted: the parties of whig and tory appeared almost in every debate, and in every question.

The ill humour prevailed most in the house of lords, where a strong opposition was made to every thing that was proposed for the government. They passed many votes, and made many addresses to the king, which were chiefly designed to load the administration and to alienate the king from the Dutch. The commons began with great complaints of the Admiralty: and then they had the conduct in Flanders, particularly in the action at Steenkirk, before them: and they voted some heads of an address relating to those matters: but by a secret management they let the whole thing fall, after they had passed those angry votes. Any thing that the lords could do was of less moment when it was not likely to be seconded by the commons; yet they showed much ill humour.

This was chiefly managed by the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Mulgrave; and they drew in the earl of Shrewsbury, who was very ill pleased with the credit that some had with the king, and lived in a particular friendship with the earl of Marlborough, and thought that he was both ungratefully and unjustly persecuted. These lords had all the jacobites ready to assist them in every thing that could embroil matters; a great many whigs, who were discontented and jealous of the ministry, joined with them: they knew that all their murmuring would signify little, unless they could stop a money bill: and, since it was settled in the house of commons as a maxim, that the lords could not make any alterations in money-bills, when the bill for four shillings in the pound land-tax came up, they put their strength to carry a clause, that the peers should tax themselves. And though, in the way in which this clause was drawn up, it could not be defended, yet they did all that was possible to put a stop to the bill ; and with unusual vehemence pressed for a delay, till a committee should be appointed to examine precedents. This the earl of Mulgrave pressed for many hours, with a force of argument and eloquence beyond any thing that I had ever heard in that house. He insisted much upon the dignity of peerage ; and made this, which was now proposed, to be so main a part of that dignity, that he exhausted all the topics of rhetoric, to convince the lords, that, if they yielded to this, they divested themselves of their true greatness ; and nothing would remain but the name and shadow of a peer, which was but a pageant. But after all the pomp and heat of his oratory, the lords considered the safety of the nation more than the shadow of a privilege ; and so they passed the bill.

These lords also set on foot a proposition that had never been offered, but when the nation was ready to break out into civil wars ; and that was, that a committee of lords and commons should be appointed to confer together, concerning the state of the nation ; this once begun would have grown in a very short time to have been a council of state ; and they would soon have brought all affairs under their inspection ; but this was so strongly opposed, that it was soon let fall.

When the party that was set against the court saw they could carry nothing in either house of parliament, then they turned their whole strength against the present parliament, to force a dissolution ; and in order to that, they first loaded it with a name of an ill sound ; and, whereas king Charles's long parliament was called the pensioner parliament, they called this the officers' parliament ; because many that had commands in the army were of it : and the word that they gave out among the people was, that we were to be governed by a standing army, and a standing parliament. They tried to carry a bill that rendered all members of the house of commons incapable of places of trust or profit ; so that every member that accepted a place should be expelled the house, and be incapable of being chosen again to sit in the current parliament. The truth was, it came to be observed, that some got credit by opposing the government ; and that to silence them, they were preferred : and then they changed their note, and were as ready to flatter as before to find fault. This gave a specious colour to those who charged the court with designs of corrupting members, or, at least, of stopping their mouths by places and pensions. When this bill was set on, it went through the house of commons with little or no difficulty : those who were in places had not strength and credit to make great opposition to it, they being the persons concerned, and looked on as parties : and those who had no places, had not the courage to oppose it ; for in them it would have looked as an art to recommend themselves to one. So the bill passed in the house of commons ; but it was rejected by the lords, since it seemed to establish an opposition between the crown and the people, as if those who were employed by the one could not be trusted by the other.

When this failed, another attempt was made in the house of lords ; in a bill that was offered, enacting, That a session of parliament should be held every year, and a new parliament be summoned every third year, and that the present parliament should be dissolved within a limited time. The statutes for annual parliaments in king Edward the First, and king Edward the Third's time, are well known ; but it is a question whether the supposition "if need be" falls upon the whole act, or only upon those words, "or oftener:" it is certain these acts were never observed, and the non-observance of them was never complained of as a grievance. Nor did the famous act in king Charles the First's time, carry the necessity of holding a session further than to once in three years. Anciently, considering the haste and hurry in which parliaments sat, an annual parliament might be no great inconvenience to the nation ; but by reason of the slow methods of sessions now, an annual parliament in times of peace would become a very insupportable grievance. A parliament of a long continuance seemed to be very dangerous, either to the crown, or to the nation ; if the conjuncture, and their proceedings, gave them much credit, they might grow very uneasy to the crown, as happened in king Charles the First's time ; or in another situation of affairs, they might be so practised upon by the court, that they might give all the money, and all the liberties of England up, when they were to have a large share of the money, and were to be made the instruments of tyranny, as it was likely to have been in king Charles the Second's time. It was likewise hoped, that frequent parliaments would put an end to the great expense candidates put themselves to in elections ; and that it would oblige the members to behave themselves so well, both with relation to the public, and in their private deportment, as to recommend them to their electors at three years' end ; whereas when a parliament was to sit many years, members covered with privileges were apt to take great liberties, forgot that they represented others, and took care only of themselves. So it was thought, that England would have a truer representative, when it was chosen anew every third year, than when it run on to the end of a reign. All that was objected against this was, that frequent elections would make the freeholders proud and insolent, when they knew that applications must be made to them at the end of three years ; this would establish a faction in every body of men that had a right to an election ; and whereas now an election put men to a great charge all at once, then the charge must be perpetual all the three years, in laying in for a new election, when it was known how soon it must come round. And as for the dissolution of the present parliament, some were for leaving it to the general triennial clause, that it might still sit three years ; they thought that, during so critical a war, as that in which we were now engaged, it was not advisable to venture on a new election, since we had so many among us who were so ill affected to the present establishment : yet it was said, this parliament had already sat three years ; and, therefore, it was not consistent with the general reason of the act to let it continue longer. So the bill passed in the house of lords ; and though a bill from them, dissolving a parliament, struck only at the house of commons, the lords being still the same men ; so that, upon that single account, many thought they would have rejected it, yet they also passed it, and fixed their own dissolution to the twenty-fifth of March in the next year ; so that they reserved another session to themselves. The king let the bill lie for some time on the table : so that men's eyes and expectations were much fixed on the issue of it. But, in conclusion, he refused to pass it ; so the session ended in ill humour. The rejecting a bill, though an unquestionable right of the crown, has been so seldom practised, that the two houses are apt to think it a hardship when there is a bill denied *.

But to soften the distaste this might otherwise give, the king made considerable alterations in his ministry. All people were now grown weary of the great seal's being in commission ; it made the proceedings in chancery to be both more dilatory, and more expensive ; and there were such exceptions made to the decrees of the commissioners, that appeals were brought against most of them, and frequently they were reversed. Sir John Somers had now got great reputation, both in his post of attorney-general, and in the house of commons ; so the king gave him the great seal. He was very learned in his own profession, with a great deal more learning in other professions, in divinity, philosophy, and history. He had a great capacity for business, with an extraordinary temper ; for he was fair and gentle, perhaps to a fault, considering his post ; so that he had all the patience and softness, as well as the justice and equity, becoming a great magistrate. He had always agreed in his notions with the whigs, and had studied to bring them to better thoughts of the king, and to a greater confidence in him †. Trenchard was made secretary of state ; he had been engaged * King William was persuaded to consent to the triennial bill, two years subsequently. His rejection of the bill, as mentioned in the text, is the last time the prerogative of the crown has been so employed ; and, although the king has an undoubted right to withhold his consent to any bill passed by the two houses, yet he would be now a very rash monarch who would venture to do it against the united opinions of the collected wisdom of the nation. In earlier periods of our history, the prerogative was profusely exercised. In sir Symond Dowe's "Journal," p. 596, it is stated, that queen Elizabeth, at the close of a session, gave her consent to forty-three bills, and rejected forty-eight.

† John, lord Somers, baron Evesham, born in 1650, at Worcester, was one of the brightest ornaments of his age. His father sent him to Trinity College, Oxford ; and here he formed an intimacy with the young duke of Shrewsbury, that never afterwards was weakened. He first obtained public notice by the talents displayed by him as one of the counsel employed to defend, in 1688, the seven bishops, or seven golden candlesticks, as they were emphatically denominated. Always acting consistently far with the duke of Monmouth, as was told formerly. He got out of England, and lived some years beyond sea, and had a right understanding of affairs abroad : he was a calm and sedate man, and was much more moderate than could have been expected, since he was a leading man in a party. He had too great a regard to the stars, and too little to religion*. The bringing these men into those posts was ascribed chiefly to the great credit the earl of Sunderland had gained with the king ; he had now got into his confidence, and declared openly for the whigs. These advancements had a great effect on the whole party, and brought them to a much better opinion of the king. A young man, Mr. Montague, a branch of the earl of Manchester's family, began to make a great figure in the house of commons. He was a commissioner of the treasury, and soon after made chancellor of the exchequer. He had great vivacity and clearness, both of thought and expression ; his spirit was at first turned to wit and poetry, which he continued still to encourage in others, when he applied himself to more important business. He came to have great notions with relation to all the concerns of the treasury, and of the public funds, and brought those matters into new and better methods : he shewed the error of giving money upon remote funds, at a vast discount, and with great premiums to raise loans upon them ; which occasioned a great outcry at the sums that were given, at the same time that they were much shrunk before they produced the money that was expected from them. So he pressed the king to insist on this as a maxim, to have all the money for the service of a year to be raised within that year†.

with the whigs, he obtained the favour of William, who made him solicitor-general in 1689, and attorney-general in 1692. In the following year we have seen that he was made lord keeper, and four years subsequently was ennobled, and appointed lord high chancellor. Never had so much dignity, or so much mildness, been displayed ; never such a complication of endowments centred in one person. He was a prodigy. Lord Orford said he was "a chapel in a place where every other room is profaned." In the city he only had to ask for the king, and the money was had. The laws of England were known to him, and he was not ignorant of those of Greece, Rome, or modern kingdoms. Foreign ambassadors, noblemen, and strangers saw, in an individual of private birth, unused to courts, the manners of the most finished courtier : professional men of all kinds found in him, for he admitted them to his table, an adept in that science they had spent a life in studying. A lucid eloquence was natural to him. His arguments were called "geometrical stairs," supporting each other. He was the truest patriot and sincerest of all William's ministers ; yet, as will be seen in future pages, even he could not escape the machinations of those who desired place and power more than they respected worth. In 1710, he finally retired from public affairs, and died in 1716—a warning against presumption to the most talented—an idiot ! His great foible was a devotion to women, and this hastened his death. Unmarried, his titles died with him. It is greatly to be lamented that nearly all his MSS were destroyed in 1752 by a fire in Lincoln's-Inn. The few that escaped have been published by lord Hardwicke. A good life of this great man is still a desideratum. Whoever undertakes it, will find valuable materials in those papers, and in the "Shrewsbury Correspondence." Maddock's Life of Somers, and the sketch of his early years, by Cooksey, are very imperfect. There is a memoir of him in the Biographia Britannica.

* Sir John Trenchard was of the legal profession. His residence was Wolverton, in Dorsetshire. He narrowly escaped being executed, for one of the witnesses swore that Trenchard undertook to raise troops at Taunton, although, as he was the first mover of the exclusion bill, it was considered James the Second would have him destroyed. He joined Monmouth's expedition, but escaped when it was defeated. At the revolution he returned to England, and represented Dorchester in Parliament. He was made a serjeant in 1689, and afterwards secretary of state, as mentioned above. He enjoyed his distinctions a very short time, dying in 1694.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

† Charles Montague was the youngest son of a youngest son of an earl of Manchester, and born at Horton, in Northamptonshire, during 1661. The remainder of his career may be told in the words of Dr. Johnson. He was educated first in the country, and then removed to Westminster ; where, in 1677, he was chosen a king's scholar, and recommended himself to Busby by his felicity in extemporary epigrams. He contracted a very intimate friendship with Mr. Stepney ; and, in 1682, when Stepney was elected to Cambridge, the election of Montague being not to proceed until the year following, he was afraid lest, by being placed at Oxford, he might be separated from his companion, and therefore solicited to be removed to Cambridge. It seemed, indeed, time to wish for a removal, for he was already a schoolboy of twenty-one. At Trinity College, of which his uncle was the master, he commenced his acquaintance with the great Newton, which continued through his life, and was at last attested by a legacy. In 1685, his verses on the death of king Charles made such an impression upon the earl of Dorset, that he was invited to town, and introduced by that universal patron of the wits. In 1687 he joined with Prior in "the City Mouse and Country Mouse," a burlesque of Dryden's "Hind and Panther." He signed the invitation to the prince of Orange, and sat in the convention. About the same time he married the countess dowager of Manchester, and intended to have taken orders, but changed his purpose, and purchased for 1,500*l*. the place of one of the clerks of council. After he had written his epistle on the victory of the Boyne, his patron, Dorset, introduced him to the king, saying, "Sire, I have a mouse to wait on your majesty." To which the king is said to have replied, "You do well to put me in the way of making a man of him." In 1691, being a member of the house of commons, he argued warmly in favour of a law to grant the assistance of counsel in trials for high treason ; and in the midst of his speech, falling into some confusion, was for a while silent ; but recovering himself, observed, "how reasonable it was to allow counsel to men called as criminals before a court of justice, when it appeared how much the presence of this assembly would disconcert one of their own body." He now rose fast into honours and employment, being made one of the

But as the employing these men had a very good effect on the king's affairs, so a party came to be now formed that studied to cross and defeat every thing; this was led by Seymour and Musgrave. The last was a gentleman of a noble family in Cumberland, whose life had been regular, and his deportment grave. He had lost a place in king James's time; for though he was always a high tory, yet he would not comply with his designs. He had indeed contributed much to increase his revenue, and to offer him more than he asked; yet he would not go into the taking off the tests. Upon the revolution, the place out of which he had been turned, was given to a man that had a good share of merit in that great event. This alienated him from the king; and he, being a man of good judgment, and of great experience, came to be considered as the head of the party; in which he found his account so well, that no offers that were made him could ever bring him over to the king's interests. Upon many critical occasions he gave up some important points, for which the king found it necessary to pay him very liberally.

But the party of the tories was too inconsiderable to have raised a great opposition, if a body of whigs had not joined with them; some of these had such republican notions, that they were much set against the prerogative: and they thought the king was become too stiff in maintaining it; others were offended because they were not considered nor preferred, as they thought they deserved. The chief of these were, Mr. Paul Foley and Mr. Harley*. The first of these was a younger son of one, who from mean beginnings had, by iron works, raised one of the greatest estates that had been in England in our time. He was a learned, though not a practising lawyer; and was a man of virtue and good principles, but morose and wilful; and he had the affectation of passing for a great patriot by his constant finding fault with the government, and venting an ill humour, and a bad opinion of the court. Harley was a man of a noble family, and very eminently learned; much turned to politics, and of a restless ambition. He was a man of great industry and application, and knew forms, and the records of parliament so well, that he was capable both of lengthening out and of perplexing debates. Nothing could answer his aspiring temper; so he and Foley joined with the tories to create jealousies, and raise an opposition. They soon grew to be able to delay matters long, and set on foot some very uneasy things that were popular; such as the bill against parliament-men being in places, and that for dissolving the parliament, and for having a new one every third year.

That which gave them much strength was, the king's cold and reserved way; he took no pains to oblige those that came to him, nor was he easy of access; he lived out of town at Kensington, and his chief confidants were Dutch. He took no notice of the clergy, and seemed to have little concern in the matters of the church, or of religion; and at this time some atheists and deists, as well as Socinians, were publishing books against religion in general, and more particularly against the mysteries of our faith. These expressed great zeal for the government, which gave a handle to those who were waiting for all advantages, and were careful of increasing and improving them, to spread it all over the nation, that the king, and those about him, had no regard to religion, nor to the church of England.

But now I go on to the transactions of this summer. The king had, in his speech to the parliament, told them he intended to land a considerable army in France this year: so, after the session, orders were given for hiring a fleet for transports, with so great a train of artillery, that it would have served an army of forty thousand men. This was very acceptable to the whole nation, who loved an active war, and were very uneasy to see so much money paid, and so little done with it; but all this went off without any effect. The commissioners of the treasury, a privy councillor, and chancellor of the exchequer, as mentioned in the text. He merited the gratitude of his country by effecting a re-coinage of the silver currency in two years, an undertaking that was deemed impossible to complete. In 1696, he projected the general fund, and raised the credit of the exchequer; examined the grants of the Irish crown lands, and was voted by the house of commons to have deserved his majesty's favour. In 1698, he was advanced to be first commissioner of the treasury, and appointed one of the regency in the king's absence; the year after, he was raised to the peerage. He was twice attacked by the house of commons, so uncertain is popular favour, but was as often protected by the counter-votes of the peers. He again came into office upon the accession of George the First, but died soon after, in 1715, to the confusion of the chief practitioners of that time, Doctors Shadwell, Scigerthal, Blackmore, and Mead, who declared his disease to be a pleurisy, when it proved to be an inflammation of the lungs.—Johnson's Lives of the Poets; Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

French had attempted this winter the siege of Rhinfeldt, a place of no great consequence; but it lay upon the Rhine, not far from Coblenz; and by it Franconia would have been open to them. They could not cut off the communication by the Rhine; so that fresh supplies of men and provisions were every day sent to them by the care of the landgrave of Hesse, who managed the matter with such success, that after a fortnight's stay before it, the French were forced to raise the siege; which was a repulse so seldom given them, that upon it some said, they were then sensible that Louvois was dead. The French had also made another attempt upon Huy, of a shorter continuance, but with the like success. The campaign was opened with great pomp in Flanders; for the king of France came thither in person, accompanied by the ladies of the court, which appeared the more ridiculous, since there was no queen at the head of them, unless madame de Maintenon was to be taken for one, to whom respects were indeed paid with more submission than is commonly done to queens; so that what might be wanting in the outward ceremony, was more than balanced by the real authority that she had. It was given out, that the king of France, after he had amused the king for some days, intended to have turned either to Brussels on the one hand, or to Liege on the other. In the mean while the French were working on the Dutch, by their secret practices, to make them hearken to a separate peace; and the ill humour that had appeared in the parliament of England against them was an argument much made use of, to convince them how little ground they had to trust to their alliance with England; so that, as French practices had raised this ill humour among us, they made now this use of it to break our mutual confidence, and by consequence our alliance with the States. The king made great haste, and brought his army much sooner together than the French expected: he encamped at Park, near Louvain: by which he broke all the French measures; for he lay equally well posted to relieve Brussels or Liege. It was grown the more necessary to take care of Liege, because though the bishop was true to the allies, yet there was a faction formed among the capitulars, to offer themselves to the French; but the garrison adhered to the bishop; and now, when so great an army lay near them, they broke the measures which that faction had taken. The French king, seeing that the practices of treachery, on which he chiefly relied, succeeded so ill, resolved not to venture himself in any dangerous enterprise; so he and the ladies went back to Versailles.

The dauphin, with a great part of the army, was sent to make head against the Germans who had brought an army together, commanded by the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse, and the prince of Baden; the Germans moved slowly, and were retarded by some disputes about the command; so that the French came on to Heidelberg, before they were ready to cover it. The town could make no long resistance, but it was too soon abandoned by a timorous governor. The French were not able to hinder the conjunction of the Germans, though they endeavoured it; they advanced towards them. And though the Dauphin was much superior in numbers, and studied to force them to action, yet they kept close; and he did not think fit to attack them in their camp. The French raised great contributions in the Wirtemberg; but no action happened on the Rhine all this campaign. The French had better success, and less opposition, in Catalonia: they took Rosas, and advanced to Barcelona, expecting their fleet, which was to have bombarded it from the sea, while their army attacked it by land. This put all Spain under a great consternation; the design of this invasion was, to force them to treat of a separate peace; while they felt themselves so vigorously attacked, and saw that they were in no condition to resist.

Affairs in Piedmont gave them a seasonable relief: the duke of Savoy's motions were so slow, that it seemed both sides were resolved to lie upon the defensive. The French were very weak there, and they expected to be as weakly opposed; but in the end of July, the duke began to move; and he obliged Catinat to retire with his small army, having made him quit some of his posts. And then he formed the siege of St. Bridget, a fort that lay above Pignerol, and, as was believed, might command it. After twelve days' siege, the French abandoned it, and he was master of it; but he was not furnished for undertaking the siege of Pignerol, and so the campaign went off in marches and countermarches; but in the end of it, Catinat, having increased his army by some detachments, came up to the duke of Savoy. They engaged at Orbasson, where the honour of the action, but with that the greatest loss, fell to the French ; for, though they carried it by their numbers, their bodies being less spent and fuller, yet the resistance that was made was such, that the duke of Savoy gained more in his reputation, than he suffered by the loss of the day.

The two armies lay long in Flanders, watching one another's motions, without coming to action. In July, Luxembourg went to besiege Huy, and carried it in two or three days. The king moved that way, on design either to raise the siege, or to force a battle. Those in Huy did not give him time to come to their relief ; and Luxembourg made a feint towards Liege, which obliged the king to send some battalions to reinforce the garrison of that place. He had also sent another great detachment, commanded by the duke of Wirtemberg, to force the French lines, and to put their country under contribution ; which he executed with great success, and raised above four millions. Luxembourg thought this was an advantage not to be lost : so that, as soon as he had received orders from the king of France to attack the king in his camp, he came up to him near Landen, upon the river Gitte. He was about double the king's number, chiefly in horse. The king might have secured himself from all attacks, by passing the river ; and his conduct in not doing it was much censured, considering his strength, and the enemy's. He chose rather to stay for them, but sent away the baggage and heavy cannon to Mechlin, and spent the whole night in planting batteries, and casting up retrenchments. On the twenty-ninth of July the French began their attack, early in the morning, and came on with great resolution, though the king's cannon did great execution ; they were beaten off with the loss of many officers in several attacks ; yet they came still on with fresh bodies, till at last, after an action of seven or eight hours' continuance, they broke through, in a place where there was such a body of German and Spanish horse, that the army on no side was thought less in danger. These troops gave way ; and so the French carried the honour of the day, and were masters both of the king's camp and cannon : but the king passed the river, and cut the bridges, and lay secure out of reach. He had supported the whole action with so much courage, and so true a judgment, that it was thought he got more honour that day than even when he triumphed at the Boyne. He charged himself in several places ; many were shot round about him with the enemy's cannon : one musket-shot carried away part of his scarf, and another went through his hat, without doing him any harm. The French lost so many men, and suffered so much in the several onsets they had made, that they were not able to pursue a victory, which cost them so dear. We lost in all about seven thousand ; and among these there was scarce an officer of note ; only the count de Solms had his leg shot off by a cannon ball, of which he died in a few hours. By all the accounts that came from France, it appeared that the French had lost double the number, with a vastly greater proportion of officers. The king's behaviour, during the battle, and in the retreat, was much magnified by the enemy, as well as by his own side. The king of France was reported to have said upon it, that Luxembourg's behaviour was like the prince of Condé's, but the king's like M. Turenne's. His army was, in a few days, as strong as ever, by recalling the duke of Wirtemberg, and the battalions he had sent to Liege, and some other bodies that he drew out of garrisons. And the rest of the campaign passed over, without any other action ; only at the end of it, after the king had left the army, Charleroi was besieged by the French : the country about it had been so eat up, that it was not possible to subsist an army that might have been brought to relieve it : the garrison made a brave resistance, and held out a month, but it was taken at last.

Thus the French triumphed every where ; but their successes were more than balanced by two bad harvests, that came successively one after another ; they had also suffered much in their vintage ; so that they had neither bread nor wine. Great diligence was used to bring in corn from all parts ; and strict orders were given by that court, for regulating the price of it, and for furnishing their markets ; there was also a liberal distribution ordered by that king for the relief of the poor. But misery will be misery still, after all possible care to alleviate it. Great multitudes perished for want, and the whole kingdom fell into an extreme poverty ; so that all the pomp of their victories could not make them easy at home. They tried all possible methods for bringing about a general peace ; or if that failed, for a separate peace with some of the confederates ; but there was no disposition in any of them to hearken to it; nor could they engage the northern crowns to offer their mediation. Some steps were indeed made, for they offered to acknowledge the present government of England; but in all other points their demands were still so high, that there was no prospect of a just peace till their affairs should have brought them to an humbler posture.

But while the campaign, in all its scenes, was thus unequal and various, the French, though much weaker at sea, were the most successful there; and though we had the superior strength, we were very unprosperous; and by our ill conduct we lost much, both in our honour and interest, on that element. The great difficulty that the French were under in their marine was, by reason of their two great ports, Brest and Toulon; and from the bringing their fleets together, and sending them back again. The danger they ran in that, and the delays that it put them under, were the chief occasions of their losses last year; but these were, in a great measure, made up to them now. We were sending a very rich fleet of merchant ships to the Mediterranean, which was valued at many millions; some of these had lain ready a year and a half, waiting for a convoy, but were still put off by new delays; nor could they obtain one after Russel's victory, though we were then masters at sea. They were promised a great one in winter. The number of the merchant ships did still increase; so that the convoy, which was at first designed, was not thought equal to the riches of the fleet, and to the danger they might run by ships that might be sent from Toulon to intercept them. The court of France was watching this carefully; a spy among the jacobites gave advice, that certain persons sent from Scotland to France, to shew with how small a force they might make themselves masters of that kingdom, had hopes given them for some time: upon which several military men went to Lancashire and Northumberland, to see what could be expected from thence, if commotions should happen in Scotland. But in February the French said they could not do what was expected; and the Scotch agents were told that they were obliged to look after the Smyrna fleet, which they reckoned might be of more consequence than even the carrying Scotland could be. The fleet was ready in February, but new excuses were again made; for it was said, the convoy must be increased to twenty men of war; Rook was to command it: a new delay was likewise put in, on the pretence of staying for advice from Toulon, whether the squadron that was laid up there was to lie in the Mediterranean this year, or to come about to Brest. The merchants were very uneasy under those delays, since the charge was likely to eat up the profit of the voyage; but no dispatch could be had; and very probable reasons were offered to justify every new retardment. The French fleet had gone early out of Toulon, on design to have destroyed the Spanish fleet, which lay in the bay of Puzzolo; but they lay so safe there, that the French saw they could not succeed in any attempt upon them; afterwards they stood off to the coast of Catalonia, to assist their army, which was making some conquests there. Yet these were only feints to amuse and to cover their true design. The fleet at Brest sailed away from thence so suddenly, that they were neither completely manned nor victualled; and they came to Lagos Bay in Algarve. Tenders were sent after them, with the necessary complement of men and provisions: this sudden and unprovided motion of the French fleet looked as if some secret advice had been sent from England, acquainting them with our designs. But at the secretary's office, not only there was no intelligence concerning their fleet, but when a ship came in that brought the news of their having sailed from Brest, they were not believed. Our main fleet sailed out into the sea for some leagues with Rook, and the merchant ships; and when they thought they were out of danger, they came back. Rook was unhappy in that, which, upon any other occasion, would have been a great happiness: he had a fair and a strong gale of wind, so that no advice sent after him could overtake him; nor did he meet with any ships at sea that could give him notice of the danger that lay before him. He doubled the Cape of St. Vincent, and had almost fallen in with the French fleet, before he was aware of it. He dreamed of no danger but from the Toulon squadron, till he took a fire-ship; the captain whereof endeavoured to deceive him by a false story, as if there had been only fifteen men of war lying at Lagos, that intended to join D'Estrees. The merchants were for going on, and believed the information; they were confirmed in this by the disorder the French seemed to be in; for they were cutting their cables, and drawing near the shore. The truth was, when they saw Rook's fleet, they apprehended by their numbers that the whole fleet of England was coming towards them; and indeed had they come so far with them, here was an occasion offered, which perhaps may not be found again in an age, of destroying their whole strength at sea. But as the French soon perceived their error, and were forming themselves into a line, Rook saw his error likewise, and stood out to sea, while the merchants fled, as their fears drove them; a great many of them sticking still close to him; others sailed to Cadiz, and some got to Gibraltar; and, instead of pursuing their voyage, put in there; some ships were burnt or sunk, and a very small number was taken by the French. They did not pursue Rook, but let him sail away to the Madeiras; and from thence he came, first to Kinsale, and then into England. The French tried what they could do upon Cadiz, but found that it was not practicable. They came next to Gibraltar, where the merchants sunk their ships, to prevent their falling into their hands; from thence they sailed along the coast of Spain, and burnt some English and Dutch ships that were lying at Malaga, Alicant, and in some other places. They hoped to have destroyed the Spanish fleet; but they put in at Port Mahon, where they were safe. At length, after a very glorious campaign, the French came back to Toulon. It is certain, if Tourville had made use of all his advantages, and had executed the design, as well as it was projected, he might have done us much mischief: few of our men-of-war, or merchantmen, could have got out of his hands. The loss fell heaviest on the Dutch; the voyage was quite lost, and the disgrace of it was visible to the whole world, and very sensible to the trading part of the nation.

The appearances were such, that it was generally surmised our counsels were betrayed. The secretary, that attended on the admirals, was much suspected, and charged with many things; but the suspicions rose high even as to the secretary of state's office. It was said, that our fleet was kept in port till the French were laid in their way, and was then ordered to sail, that it might fall into their hands. Many particulars were laid together, which had such colours, that it was not to be wondered at, if they created jealousy, especially in minds sufficiently prepared for it. Upon enquiry, it appeared, that several of those, who, for the last two years, were put in the subaltern employments, through the kingdom, did upon many occasions shew a disaffection to the government, and talked and acted like enemies. Our want of intelligence of the motions of the French, while they seemed to know every thing that we either did, or designed to do, cast a heavy reproach upon our ministers, who were now broken so in pieces, that they acted without union or concert: every one studied to justify himself, and to throw the blame on others; a good share of this was cast on the earl of Nottingham: the marquis of Caermarthen was much suspected; the earl of Rochester began now to have great credit with the queen, and seemed to be so violently set against the whigs, that they looked for dreadful things from him, if he came again to govern; for, being naturally warm, and apt to heat himself in company, he broke out into sallies, which were carried about, and began to create jealousies, even of the queen herself.

I was in some sort answerable for this; for, when the queen came into England, she was so possessed against him, that he tried all his friends and interest in the court, to be admitted to clear himself, and to recover her favour, but all in vain; for they found her so alienated from him, that no person would undertake it. Upon that he addressed himself to me: I thought that, if he came into the service of the government, his relation to the queen would make him firm and zealous for it: and I served him so effectually, that the queen laid aside all her resentments, and admitted him, by degrees, into a high measure of favour and confidence*. I quickly saw my error; and he took pains to convince me effectually of it; for * Some of the harshest treatment Dr. Burnet met with in the two former reigns, had passed through the hands of the earl of Rochester; no two men ever differed more widely in their principles, both in church and state; yet the first good offices done that earl, with the king and queen (after all other applications for introduction had failed), their entire reconciliation to him, and the first advantages he reaped in consequence of that reconciliation, were owing to our author. And when the earl of Clarendon was afterwards unhappily engaged in the conspiracy against the government, in 1690, and some hotter whigs were for the severest methods, the bishop became a hearty and successful advocate in his favour. These matters are but cursorily mentioned in the history, but will more fully appear from the four following original letters; the first, written by the countess of Ranelagh; the other three by the earl of Rochester himself:—

he was no sooner possessed of her favour, than he went into an interest, very different from what I believed he would have pursued. He talked against all favour to dissenters, and for

" My lord,

" Your lordship knows that by my lord Rochester's desiring me to help him to thank you for your forwardness to do him favours with their majesties (out of the sense he had, that he ought to be more grateful for them, because he had not at all deserved them from your lordship), he had informed me, that you had done him such favours; and when, pursuant to his desire, I began to give you humble thanks for him (who is a person in whom I can be very sensibly obliged) I told your lordship I was pleased in paying this duty, as much upon your account, as upon his lordship's, as having attempted to conquer him by weapons, fit to be used by one of your profession and character; and I hoped he might be advantaged, as well by being gained by you, as by reaping good fruits of your mediation with their majesties. And now I present your lordship, in the enclosed, with what appears to me an evidence, that my hopes of his making ingenuous returns, for your generous advances towards a friendship with him, were not groundless; since he would sure never have pitched upon you, to manage an application of his about an interest wherein the visible subsistence of his family is so deeply concerned, if he did not firmly believe the reality of your intentions towards him; though he have no merits of his towards you, or any thing else, but your Christian beginnings towards him, to build that faith upon. Nor can he, in my poor opinion, give you a clearer proof of his being already overcome by you, than in choosing you to be the person to whom he would in such an interest be obliged; since he thereby puts himself upon the peril of being faithfully yours, or a very unthankful man; which I do so much assure myself he will not be, that I humbly beg your lordship to put this obligation upon him, to perfect what you have already begun to do for him, of a like nature, and to the same royal person: who would not, I think, act unbecomingly herself, nor the eminent station God has placed her in, in assisting five innocent children, who have the honour to be related to her royal mother, who did still, with great tenderness, consider her own family, when she was most raised above it; especially when, in assisting them, her majesty will need only to concern herself, to preserve a property made theirs by the law of England, which as queen of this kingdom she is obliged to maintain.

" I send your lordship my lord Rochester's letter to me, that you may see he has thoughts that justify what I have said here for him, and has expressed them much better than I can do: so that as an argument to gain your pardon, for this confused scribble of mine, I present you with his good writing. I am,

" Your lordship's humble and affectionate servant,
" July 13th, 1689. " K. RANELAGH."

" My Lord,

" The good offices, your lordship has told me, you have endeavoured to do me with the queen, of your own accord and generosity, incline me to be desirous to be obliged to your lordship, for the favour of presenting the enclosed petition to her majesty. Your lordship will see, by the reading it, the occasion and the subject of it; and I am sure I need not suggest any thing to your own kind thoughts to add at the delivery of it, save only this, which I thought not proper to touch in the petition, that I have certainly as good a title in law to it as any man has to any thing he possesses; as likewise that the pension is appropriated, to be paid out of a part of the revenue, which never was designed by any act of parliament, for any public use of the government; which I think has something of weight and reason to distinguish it from those pensions that are placed on the more public branches of the revenue.

" I know not whether the queen can do me any good in this affair, but I will believe her majesty cannot but wish she could; however, I think I should have been very wanting to my children if I had not laid this case most humbly before her majesty; lest at one time or other she herself might say, I had been too negligent in not making applications to her; which having now done, I leave the rest, with all possible submission, to her own judgment, and to the reflections, that some good-natured moments may incline her to make towards my family. I should say a great deal to your lordship, for my own confidence, in addressing all this to your lordship, some passages of my life having been such as may very properly give it that name: but, I think, whatever you would be content to hear on that subject will be better expressed by the person, who does me the honour to deliver this to your lordship, from

" My lord,

" Your lordship's most obedient servant,
" July 13, 1689. " ROCHESTER."

" My lord,

" Upon what account soever it is, that your lordship is pleased to let me hear from you, I take it to be something of good fortune, whatsoever ill cause there may be in it too. Therefore I humbly thank your lordship for the honour of yours of the 18th from Salisbury; which was sent me to this pretty place, where I love to be, as much as you do at your palace; and though I cannot do so much good to others as your lordship does there to all that are near you, yet I do more to myself than I can do any where else. Quid sentire putas, quid credis, amice, precari? Sit mihi quod nunc est, etiam minus, ut mihi vivam quod superest avi. Forgive this transgressional rapture, and receive my thanks, which I pay your lordship again, for your kind letter. For indeed I do take it very kindly, that you were so much concerned, as to give me a kind hint of that unseasonable discourse you came to be acquainted with when you were last in London; I will make the best use of it I can, to prevent the like for the future, if I have any credit. And in the mean time I must make use of this opportunity to calm and soften your resentments, towards this friend of mine, as you call him in the beginning of your letter. I will allow you as a servant to the king and queen, and a subject to their crown, to have as great a detestation of the contrivance, as you can wish; and upon my word, I can accompany you in it. But when I consider you, as once you were, a concerned friend of this lord, to have a respect for his family, and particularly for my father, who lost not only all the honours and preferments of this world, but even the comforts of it too, for the integrity and uprightness of his heart: you must forgive me, if I conjure you, by all that's sacred in this generation in which we live together, by the character that you bear, and by the religion you profess, that you do not (as much as in you lies) suffer this next heir of my good father's name and honour, to go down with sorrow to the grave. I would not flatter myself that your lordship should be moved with any fondness of mine, to endeavour to bring to pass, what is not fit for a wise and a good man to propose; that would be to make a very ill use of your friendship to me, and I would rather be corrected myself in my own desires, than expose your lordship on such an account. But I hope that they, who are the supreme directors of this matter setting up the notions of persecution and violence, which he had so much promoted in king Charles's time, and professed himself an enemy to the present bishops, and to the methods they were taking, of preaching and visiting their dioceses, of obliging the clergy to attend more carefully to their functions, and of endeavouring to gain the dissenters by gentle and calm methods.

The king had left the matters of the church wholly in the queen's hands. He found he could not resist importunities which were not only vexatious to him, but had drawn preferments from him, which he came soon to see were ill bestowed; so he devolved that care upon the queen, which she managed with strict and religious prudence. She declared openly against the preferring of those who put in for themselves, and took care to inform herself particularly of the merits of such of the clergy as were not so much as known at court, nor using any methods to get themselves recommended; so that we had reason to hope, that, if this course should be long continued, it would produce a great change in the church, and in the temper of the clergy. She consulted chiefly with the archbishop of Canterbury, whom she favoured and supported in a most particular manner. She saw what need there was of it; for a party was formed against him, who set themselves to censure every thing he did. It was a melancholy thing to consider that, though we never saw an archbishop before him apply himself so entirely, without partiality or bias, to all the concerns of the church and religion, as he did; and that the queen's heart was set on promoting them, yet such an evil spirit should seem to be let loose upon the clergy. They complained of every thing that was done, if it was not in their own way; and the archbishop bore the blame of all. He did not enter into any close correspondence, or the concerting measures with the ministry, but lived much abstracted from them; so they studied to depress him all they could. This made a great impression upon him. He grew very uneasy in his great post: we were all soon convinced, that there was a sort of clergymen among us that would never be satisfied, as long as the toleration was continued; and they seemed resolved to give it out, that under God, may in their great wisdom and goodness judge, that it may prove as much to their honour and safety too, to pass over this particular, as if they should pursue the strictest measures of justice in it. Though I am a brother, if I did not, upon the greatest reflection I can make, think I should be of the same opinion, if I were none, I would not press this matter upon you. For I cannot but think, that the queen would do, and would be glad to avow it too, a very great thing for the memory of that gentleman, so long in his grave. It is upon this account I am begging of your lordship to do all that's possible, to preserve every part and branch and member of his family, from the least transient stain of infamy and reproach. And if God was prevailed with by Abraham, to have saved a whole city for the sake of ten righteous men, I hope there may be as charitable an inclination to spare the débris of our broken family, for the sake of him who was the raiser of it.

"I ask your lordship's pardon for being thus importunate; for I have great need of your help, and I hope I shall have it from you. Losses of many and good friends I have borne, and submitted with patience to the pleasure of Almighty God; but a calamity of this nature, that I now deprecate, has in it something so frightful, and on some accounts so unnatural, that I beg you for God's sake, from an angry man yourself, grow an advocate for me and for the family on this account. I am ever,

"My lord,

"Your lordship's most faithful humble servant,

"ROCHESTER.

"New Park, March 21st, 1690-91."

"My lord,

"I was warm, I confess, in the last letter I gave your lordship the trouble of, and I thank you for reproving the vehemence of my style, in your last of the twenty-eighth; I am grown cooler, and acknowledge my fault; neither did I commit it with an apprehension that your lordship was inexorable, or that it would be so much as needful to desire your assistance in that matter. But you may remember, you had used a word to me, when you were here, an attainder, that I acknowledge sounded very harsh to me, and when I had reflected a little more upon it, as likewise that your lordship did not use to speak by chance, and consequently that you had good ground for what you said, I own it heated me all over, which made me express my thoughts to you with more transport than was fit, and I will say no more of them, for fear of running into new excesses. What your lordship proposes for my lord Clarendon to desire, is perfectly agreeable to my mind; but I know not, whether it be not a little too early, and that such a petition might be presented with a better grace, if he were once out of the Tower upon bail, than it would be while he is under this close confinement. But as your lordship says, the affair of Mona must for the present put a stop to every man's private thoughts, for that is a matter of such vast importance to the public, that it is but very fit, that all particular considerations should give way to it, and wait the determination of that great point: I cannot but believe the French are masters of it before now, because all the letters that came by the last post, that I could hear of, looked upon it as a thing impracticable to relieve it, but we have had no letters since Saturday. What the French will do next, whether send their men into quarters for two months, or try to follow their blow, is what men are now most anxious about. One of my old friends, with whom of late I have renewed my acquaintance, says upon all these mighty occasions, 'Prudens futuri temporis exitum Caliginosa nocte premit Deus Ridetque si mortalis ultra Fas trepidat.' But I confess to you I cannot be quite so overcome with philosophy, as not to be concerned beforehand, at what this dark night is to bring forth."

the church was in danger, till a prosecution of dissenters should be again set on foot; nor could they look at a man with patience, or speak of him with temper, who did not agree with them in these things. The bishops fell under the displeasure of the whigs by the methods they took, not only of protecting, but of preferring some of these men, hoping by that means both to have softened them and their friends; but they took their preferments as the rewards that they supposed were due to their merit; and they employed the credit and authority which their preferments brought them, wholly against those to whom they owed them. The whigs were much turned against the king; and were not pleased with those who had left them, when they were so violent in the beginning of this reign; and it was a hard thing, in such a divided time, to resolve to be of no party, since men of that temper are pushed at by many, and protected by no side. Of this we had many instances at that time; and I myself had some very sensible ones; but they are too inconsiderable to be mentioned. In this bad state we were, when a session of parliament came on with great apprehensions, occasioned by our ill success, and by the king's temper, which he could no way constrain, or render more complaisant, but chiefly from the disposition of men's minds, which was practised on with great industry by the enemies of the government, who were driving on jealousies daily.

A parliament had been summoned in Ireland by the lord Sidney; but they met full of discontent, and were disposed to find fault with every thing: and there was too much matter to work upon; for the lord lieutenant was apt to excuse or justify those who had the address to insinuate themselves into his favour; so that they were dismissed before they brought their bills to perfection. The English in Ireland thought the government favoured the Irish too much; some said this was the effect of bribery, whereas others thought it was necessary to keep them safe from the prosecutions of the English, who hated them, and were much sharpened against them. The protecting the Irish was indeed in some sort necessary, to keep them from breaking out, or from running over to the French: but it was very plain that the Irish were Irish still, enemies to the English nation, and to the present government; so that all kindness shewed them beyond what was due in strict justice, was the cherishing an inveterate enemy. There were also great complaints of an ill administration, chiefly in the revenue, in the pay of the army, and in the embezzling of stores. Of these much noise was made in England, which drew addresses from both houses of parliament to the king, which were very invidiously penned; every particular being severely aggravated. So the king called back the lord Sidney, and put the government of Ireland into three lords justices; lord Capel, brother to the earl of Essex, sir Cyril Wyche, and Mr. Duncomb. When they were sent from court, the queen did very earnestly recommend to their care, the reforming of many disorders that were prevailing in that kingdom; for, neither had the late destructive war, out of which they were but beginning to recover themselves, nor their poverty, produced those effects, that might have been well expected.

The state of Ireland leads me to insert here a very particular instance of the queen's pious care in the disposing of bishoprics: lord Sidney was so far engaged in the interest of a great family of Ireland, that he was too easily wrought on to recommend a branch of it to a vacant see. The representation was made with an undue character of the person: so the queen granted it. But when she understood that he lay under a very bad character, she wrote a letter, in her own hand, to lord Sidney, letting him know what she had heard, and ordered him to call for six Irish bishops, whom she named to him, and to require them to certify to her their opinion of that person: they all agreed that he laboured under an ill fame; and, till that was examined into, they did not think it proper to promote him; so that matter was let fall. I do not name the person; for I intend not to leave a blemish on him; but set this down as an example, fit to be imitated by Christian princes.

Another effect of the queen's pious care of the souls of her people was finished this year, after it had been much opposed, and long stopped. Mr. Blair, a very worthy man, came over from Virginia, with a proposition for erecting a college there. In order to which, he had set on foot a voluntary subscription, which arose to a great sum; and he found out some branches of the revenue there that went all into private hands, without being brought into any public account, with which a free-school and college might be well endowed. The English born there were, as he said, capable of every thing, if they were provided with the means of a good education ; and a foundation of this kind in Virginia, that lay in the middle, between our southern and northern plantations, might be a common nursery to them all ; and put the people born there in a way of further improvement. Those concerned in the management of the plantations had made such advantages of those particulars, out of which the endowment was to be raised, that all possible objections were made to the project, as a design that would take our planters off from their mechanical employments, and make them grow too knowing to be obedient and submissive. The queen was so well pleased with the design, as apprehending the very good effects it might have, that no objection against it could move her : she hoped it might be a means of improving her own people, and of preparing some to propagate the gospel among the natives ; and therefore, as she espoused the matter with a particular zeal, so the king did very readily concur with her in it. The endowment was fixed, and the patent was passed for the college called, from the founders, the William and Mary College.

Affairs in Scotland grew more and more out of joint. Many whom the king had trusted in the ministry there, were thought enemies to him and his government ; and some took so little care to conceal their inclinations, that, when an invasion was looked for, they seemed resolved to join in it. They were taken out of a plot, which was managed by persuading many to take oaths to the government, on design to betray it ; and were now trusted with the most important posts. The presbyterians began to see their error, in driving matters so far, and in provoking the king so much ; and they seemed desirous to recover his favour, and to manage their matters with more temper. The king came likewise to see that he had been a little too sudden in trusting some who did not deserve his confidence. Duke Hamilton had for some years withdrawn from business ; but he was now prevailed with to return to council ; many letters were intercepted between France and Scotland ; in those from Scotland, the easiness of engaging that nation was often repeated, if no time were lost ; it seemed therefore necessary to bring that kingdom into a better state.

A session of parliament was held there, to which duke Hamilton was sent as the king's commissioner ; the supplies that were asked were granted ; and now the whole presbyterian party was again entire in the king's interest ; the matters of the church were brought to more temper than was expected : the episcopal clergy had more moderate terms offered them ; they were only required to make an address to the general assembly, offering to subscribe to a confession of faith, and to acknowledge presbytery to be the only government of that church, with a promise to submit to it ; upon which, within a fortnight after they did that, if no matter of scandal was objected to them, the assembly was either to receive them into the government of the church, or, if they could not be brought to that, the king was to take them into his protection, and maintain them in their churches, without any dependence on the presbytery. This was a strain of moderation that the presbyterians were not easily brought to ; a subscription that owned presbytery to be the only legal government of that church, without owning any divine right in it, was far below their usual pretensions. And this act vested the king with an authority, very like that which they were wont to condemn as Erastianism. Another act was also passed, requiring all in any office in church or state, to take, besides the oath of allegiance, a declaration called the assurance, owning the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful sovereigns, and promising fidelity to them against king James, and all his adherents. The council was also empowered to tender these, as they should see cause for it, and to fine and imprison such as should refuse them. When the session was near an end, Nevil Payne was brought before the parliament, to be examined, upon the many letters that had been intercepted. There was a full evidence against him in many of his own letters ; but he sent word to several of the lords, in particular to duke Hamilton, that as long as his life was his own, he would accuse none ; but he was resolved he would not die ; and he could discover enough to deserve his pardon. This struck such terror into many of them, whose sons or near relations had been concerned with him, that he moving for a delay, on a pretence of some witnesses that were not then at hand, a time was given him beyond the continuance of the session ; so he escaped, and that enquiry was stifled. The session ended calmly ; but the king seemed to have forgotten Scotland so entirely, that he let three months go over before he took notice of any of their petitions ; and, though he had asked, and had supplies for an augmentation of forces, and many had been gained to consent to the tax, by the hope of commissions in the troops that were to be levied ; yet the king did not raise any new ones, but raised the supply, and applied it to other uses : this began again to raise an ill humour, that had been almost quite laid down, in the whole course of this session, which was thought a reconciling one. The clergy let the day prefixed, for making their submission to the assembly, slip, and did not take the oaths ; so they could claim no benefit by the act that had been carried in their favour, not without some difficulty. And the law, that was intended to save them, did now expose them to ruin ; since by it, they, not taking the oaths, had lost their legal rights to their benefices. Yet they were suffered to continue in them, and were put in hope, that the king would protect them, though it was now against law. They were also made to believe, that the king did not desire that they should take the oaths, or make any submission to presbytery : and it is certain, that no public signification of the king's mind was made to them ; so they were easily imposed on by surmises and whispers ; upon this the distractions grew up afresh. Many concluded there, as well as in England, that the king's heart led him still to court his enemies, even after all the manifest reasons he had to conclude, that the steps they made towards him were only feigned submissions, to gain such a confidence as might put it in their power to deliver him up.

The earl of Middleton went over to France in the beginning of this year ; and it was believed he was sent by a great body among us, with a proposition, which, had he had the assurance to have made, and they the wisdom to have accepted, might have much increased our factions and jealousies. It was, that king James should offer to resign his title in favour of his son, and likewise to send him to be bred in England, under the direction of a parliament, till he should be of age ; but I could never hear that he ventured on this advice ; in another he succeeded better. When king James thought the invasion from Normandy, the former year, was so well laid, that he seemed not to apprehend it could miscarry, he had prepared a declaration, of which some copies came over. He promised nothing in it, and pardoned nobody by it ; but he spoke in the style of a conqueror, who thought he was master, and therefore would limit himself by no promises, but such as were conceived in general words, which might be afterwards expounded at pleasure. This was much blamed, even by his own party, who thought that they themselves were not enough secured by so loose a declaration : so the earl of Middleton, upon his going over, procured one of another strain, which, as far as words could go, gave all content ; for he promised every thing, and pardoned all persons. His party got this into their hands. I saw a copy of it, and they waited for a fit occasion to publish it to the nation.

We were also at this time alarmed with a negotiation, that the court of France was setting on foot at Madrid ; they offered to restore to the crown of Spain all that had been taken from it, since the peace of Munster, on condition that the duke of Anjou should be declared the heir of that crown, in default of issue by the king : the grandees of Spain, who are bred up to a disregard and contempt of all the world besides themselves, were inclinable to entertain this proposition ; though they saw that by so doing they must lose the house of Austria, the elector of Bavaria, and many of their other allies. But the king himself, weak as he was, stood firm and intractable ; and seemed to be as much set on watching their conduct, as a man of his low genius could possibly be. He resolved to adhere to the alliance, and to carry on the war, though he could do little more than barely resolve on it. The Spaniards thought of nothing but their intrigues at Madrid ; and for the management of the war, and all their affairs, they left the care of that to their stars, and to their allies.

The king came over to England in November ; he saw the necessity of changing both his measures and his ministers ; he expressed his dislike of the whole conduct at sea ; and named Russel for the command of the fleet next year ; he dismissed the earl of Nottingham, and would immediately have brought the earl of Shrewsbury again into the ministry : but when that lord came to him, he thought the king's inclinations were still the same that they had been for some years, and that the turn which he was now making was not from choice, but force ; so that went off, and the earl of Shrewsbury went into the country ; yet the king soon after sent for him, and gave him such assurances, that he was again made secretary of state, to the general satisfaction of the whigs*. But the person that had the king's confidence to the highest degree, was the earl of Sunderland, who, by his long experience and his knowledge of men and things, had gained an ascendant over him, and had more credit with him than any Englishman ever had: he had brought the king to this change of councils by the prospect he gave him of the ill condition his affairs were in, if he did not entirely both trust and satisfy those, who, in the present conjuncture, were the only party that both could and would support him. It was said, that the true secret of this change of measures was, that the tories signified to the king plainly, that they could carry on the war no longer, and that therefore he must accept of such a peace as could be had: this was the most pernicious thing that could be thought on, and the most contrary to the king's notions and designs; but they being positive, he was forced to change hands, and to turn to the other party; so the whigs were now in favour again, and every thing was done that was likely to put them in good humour. The commission of the lieutenancy for the city of London, on which they had set their hearts, much more perhaps than it deserved, was so altered, that the whigs were the superior number; and all other commissions over England were much changed. They were also brought into many places of trust and profit; so that the king put his affairs chiefly into their hands; yet so, that no tory who had expressed zeal or affection for the government was turned out. Upon this the whigs expressed new zeal and confidence in the king. All the money that was asked for the next year's expense was granted very readily.

Among other funds that were created, one was for constituting a bank, which occasioned great debates: some thought a bank would grow to be a monopoly. All the money of England would come into their hands, and they would in a few years become the masters of the stock and wealth of the nation. Others argued for it; that the credit it would have, must increase trade and the circulation of money, at least in bank notes. It was visible that all the enemies of the government set themselves against it, with such a vehemence of zeal, that this alone convinced all people, that they saw the strength that our affairs would receive from it. I had heard the Dutch often reckon up the great advantages they had from their banks; and they concluded that, as long as England continued jealous of the government, a bank could never be settled among us, nor gain credit enough to support itself: and upon that they judged that the superiority in trade must still lie on their side. This, with all the other remote funds that were created, had another good effect; it engaged all those who were concerned in them, to be, upon the account of their own interest, zealous for maintaining the government; since it was not to be doubted, but that a revolution would have swept all these away. The advantages that the king, and all concerned in tallics, had from the bank, were soon so sensibly felt, that all people saw into the secret reasons that made the enemies of the constitution set themselves with so much earnestness against it†.

The enquiry into the conduct at sea, particularly with relation to the Smyrna fleet, took up much time, and held long: great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it seemed a train was laid, that they should not get out of our ports till the French were ready to lie in their way, and intercept them. Our want of intelligence was much complained of: the instructions that the admirals, who commanded the fleet, had received from the cabinet council, were thought ill given, and yet worse executed; their orders seemed weakly drawn, ambiguous, and defective: nor had they shown any zeal in doing more than strictly to obey

* It seems that, at their first interview, the earl of Shrewsbury was so dissatisfied with the king, that after an angry altercation, he left London for his seat in Oxfordshire. William, in his cooler moments, saw the importance of obtaining the earl's services, and employed the blandishments of the royal concubine, Elizabeth Villiers, afterwards countess of Orkney, and of the earl's favourite, Mrs. Loudee. Even these failed, and it was not until he saw that the king intended really to confide in the whig party, by appointing them to some of the chief offices, that he was persuaded to accept the secretary's seals.—See the Correspondence in Coxe's Shrewsbury Papers.

† The Bank of England was projected by Mr. W.

Paterson, a merchant. It was with extreme difficulty that he and his friends obtained a charter, which is dated July 27, 1694, and was granted only for twelve years, the corporation to be determinable on a year's notice. The original capital subscribed was 1,200,000*l.*, which they lent to the government at eight per cent. interest, and an allowance of 4,000*l.* annually for managing expenses. The difficulties this corporation has had to encounter, the important assistance it has afforded to our various administrations, and the great influence it has over our moneyed interests, are subjects of important and interesting consideration.

such orders: they had very cautiously kept within them, and had been very careful never to exceed them in a tittle; they had used no diligence to get certain information concerning the French fleet, whether it was still in Brest, or had sailed out; but in that important matter, they had trusted general and uncertain reports too easily; nor had they sailed with Rook, till he was past danger. To all this their answer was, that they had observed their orders: they had reason to think the French were still in Brest; that therefore it was not safe to sail too far from the coast of England when they had (as they understood) ground to believe, that they had left behind them a great naval force, which might make an impression on our coast, when they were at too great a distance from it; the getting certain intelligence from Brest, was represented as impracticable. They had many specious things to say in their own defence, and many friends to support them; for it was now the business of one party to accuse, and of another to justify that conduct. In conclusion, there was not ground sufficient to condemn the admirals, as they had followed their instructions; so a vote passed in their favour. The rest of the business of the session was managed both with dexterity and success; all ended well, though a little too late; for the session was not finished before the end of April. Prince Lewis of Baden came this winter to concert measures with the king: he stayed above two months in England, and was treated with very singular respects, and at a great expense.

The tories began in this session to obstruct the king's measures more openly than before; the earls of Rochester and Nottingham did it in the house of lords, with a peculiar edge and violence: they saw how great a reputation the fair administration of justice by the judges, and more particularly that equity, which appeared in the whole proceedings of the court of chancery, gave the government; therefore they took all occasions that gave them any handle to reflect on these. We had many sad declamations, setting forth the misery the nation was under, in so tragical a strain, that those who thought it was quite otherwise with us, and that under all our taxes and losses, there was a visible increase of the wealth of the nation, could not hear all this without some indignation.

The bishops had their share of ill humour vented against them; it was visible to the whole nation that there was another face of strictness, of humility and charity among them, than had been ordinarily observed before: they visited their dioceses more; they confirmed and preached oftener than any who had in our memory gone before them; they took more care in examining those whom they ordained, and in looking into the behaviour of their clergy, than had been formerly practised: but they were faithful to the government, and zealous for it; they were gentle to the dissenters, and did not rail at them, nor seem uneasy at the toleration. This was thought such a heinous matter, that all their other diligence was despised; and they were represented as men who designed to undermine the church, and to betray it.

Of this I will give one instance; the matter was of great importance; and it occasioned great and long debates in this, and in the former session of parliament; it related to the duke of Norfolk, who had proved his wife guilty of adultery, and did move for an act of parliament, dissolving his marriage, and allowing him to marry again. In the later ages of popery, when marriage was reckoned among the sacraments, an opinion grew to be received, that adultery did not break the bond, and that it could only entitle to a separation, but not such a dissolution of the marriage, as gave the party that was injured a right to marry again: this became the rule of the spiritual courts, though there was no definition made about it before the council of Trent. At the time of the reformation, a suit of this nature was prosecuted by the marquis of Northampton; the marriage was dissolved, and he married a second time: but he found it necessary to move for an act of parliament to confirm this subsequent marriage. In the reformation of the ecclesiastical laws, that was prepared by Cranmer and others, in king Edward's time, a rule was laid down, allowing of a second marriage, upon a divorce for adultery. This matter had lain asleep above an hundred years, till the present duke of Rutland, then lord Roos, moved for the like liberty. At that time a sceptical and libertine spirit prevailed, so that some began to treat marriage only as a civil contract, in which the parliament was at full liberty to make what laws they pleased; and most of king Charles's courtiers applauded this, hoping by this doctrine that the king might be divorced from the queen. The greater part of the bishops, apprehending the consequence that lord Roos's act might have, opposed every step that was made in it; though many of them were persuaded, that in the case of adultery, when it was fully proved, a second marriage might be allowed. In the duke of Norfolk's case, as the lady was a papist, and a busy Jacobite, so a great party appeared for her. All that favoured the Jacobites and those who were thought engaged in lewd practices, espoused her concern with a zeal that did themselves little honour. Their number was such, that no progress could be made in the bill, though the proofs were but too full, and too plain. But the main question was, whether supposing the matter fully proved, the duke of Norfolk should be allowed a second marriage? The bishops were desired to deliver their opinions, with their reasons: all those who had been made during the present reign, were of opinion, that a second marriage in that case was lawful, and conformable, both to the words of the gospel, and to the doctrine of the primitive church; and that the contrary opinion was started in the late and dark ages. But all the bishops that had been made by the two former kings, were of another opinion, though some of them could not well tell why they were so. Here was a colour for men, who looked at things superficially, to observe that there was a difference of opinion, between the last made bishops, and those of an elder standing; from which they inferred, that we were departing from the received doctrine of our church; and upon that topic, the earl of Rochester charged us very vehemently. The bill was let fall at this time: nor was the dispute kept up, for no books were written on the subject of either side.

The king went beyond sea in May; and the campaign was opened soon after. The armies of both sides came very near one another: the king commanded that of the confederates, as the dauphin did the French. They lay between Brussels and Liege; and it was given out, that they intended to besiege Maestricht: the king moved towards Namur, that he might either cut off their provisions, or force them to fight; but they were resolved to avoid a battle; so they retired likewise, and the campaign passed over in the ordinary manner; both of them moving and watching one another. The king sent a great detachment to break into the French country at Pont Esperies; but though the body he sent had made a great advance, before the French knew any thing of their march, yet they sent away their cavalry with so much haste, and in so continued a march, that they were possessed of the pass before the body the king had sent could reach it; whereby they gained their point, though their cavalry suffered much. This design failing, the king sent another body towards Huy, who took it in a few days. It was become more necessary to do this, for the covering of Liege, which was now much broken into faction; their bishop was dead, and there was a great division in the chapter; some were for the elector of Cologne, and others were for the elector Palatine's brother; but that for the elector of Cologne was the stronger party, and the court of Rome judged in their favour. The differences between that court and that of Versailles, were now so far made up, that the bulls for the bishops, whom the king had named to the vacant sees, were granted, upon the submission of all those who had been concerned in the articles of 1682; yet after all that reconciliation, the real inclinations of the court of Rome lay still towards the confederates: the alliance that France was in with the Turk, was a thing of an odious sound at Rome. The taking of Huy covered Liege; so that they were both safer and quieter. The confederates, especially the English and the Dutch, grew weary of keeping up vast armies, that did nothing else, but lay for some months advantageously posted, in view of the enemy, without any action.

On the Rhine, things went much in the usual manner; only at the end of the campaign, the prince of Baden passed the Rhine, and raised great contributions in Alsace, which the French suffered him to do, rather than hazard a battle. There was nothing of any importance done on either side in Piedmont; only there appeared to be some secret management between the court of France, and that of Turin, in order to a peace; it was chiefly negotiated at Rome, but was all the while denied by the duke of Savoy.

In Catalonia, the Spaniards were beat off from some posts, and Gironne was taken; nor was Barcelona in any condition to have resisted, if the French had set down before it. The court of Madrid felt their weakness, and saw their danger so visibly, that they were forced to implore the protection of the English fleet. The French had carried the best part of their naval force into the Mediterranean, and had resolved to attack Barcelona, both by sea and land, at the same time ; and, upon their success there, to have gone round Spain, destroying their coasts every where. All this was intended to force them to accept the offers the French were willing to make them ; but to prevent this, Russel was ordered to sail into the Mediterranean with a fleet of threescore great ships. He was so long stopt in his voyage by contrary winds, that the French, if they had pursued their advantages, might have finished the conquest of Catalonia ; but they resolved not to hazard their fleet ; so it was brought back to Toulon, long before Russel could get into the Mediterranean, which was now left entirely free to him. But it was thought that the French intended to make a second attempt, in the end of the year, as soon as he should sail back to England : so it was proposed, that he might lie at Cadiz all the winter. This was an affair of that importance, that it was long and much debated, before it was resolved on. It was thought a dangerous thing to expose the best part of our fleet, so much as it must be, while it lay at so great a distance from us, that convoys of stores and provisions might easily be intercepted ; and indeed, the ships were so low in their provisions, when they came back to Cadiz (the vessels that were ordered to carry them having been stopped four months in the channel by contrary winds) that our fleet had not then above a fortnight's victuals on board ; yet when the whole matter was thoroughly canvassed, it was agreed, that our ships might both lie safe, and be well careened at Cadiz : nor was the difference in the expense, between their lying there, and in our own ports, considerable. By our lying there, the French were shut within the Mediterranean ; so that the ocean and their coasts were left open to us. They were in effect shut up within Toulon ; for they, having no other port in those seas but that, resolved not to venture abroad ; so that now we were masters of the seas every where. These considerations determined the king to send orders to Russel, to lie all the winter at Cadiz ; which produced very good effects. The Venetians and the great duke had not thought fit to own the king till then. A great fleet of stores and ammunition, with all other provisions for the next campaign, came safe to Cadiz ; and some clean men of war were sent out, in exchange for others, which were ordered home.

But while we were very fortunate in our main fleet, we had not the like good success in an attempt that was made on Camaret, a small neck of land that lies in the mouth of the river of Brest, and would have commanded that river, if we could have made ourselves masters of it. Talmash had formed the design of seizing on it ; he had taken care to be well informed of every thing relating to it : six thousand men seemed to be more than were necessary for taking and keeping it. The design, and the preparations for it, were kept so secret, that there was not the least suspicion of the project, till the hiring transport ships discovered it. A proposition had been made of this two years before to the earl of Nottingham, who, among other things, charged Russel with it, that this had been laid before him by men that came from thence, but that he had neglected it. Whether the French apprehended the design from that motion, or whether it was now betrayed to them, by some of those who were in the secret, I know not : it is certain, that they had such timely knowledge of it, as put them on their guard. The preparations were not quite ready by the day that was settled ; and, when all was ready, they were stopt by a westerly wind for some time ; so that they came thither a month later than was intended. They found the place was well fortified by many batteries, that were raised in different lines upon the rocks, that lay over the place of descent ; and great numbers were there ready to dispute their landing. When our fleet came so near as to see all this, the council of officers were all against making the attempt ; but Talmash had set his heart so much upon it, that he could not be diverted from it.

He fancied the men they saw were only a rabble brought together to make a show, though it appeared very evidently that there were regular bodies among them, and that their numbers were double to his. He began with a landing of six hundred men, and put himself at the head of them. The men followed him with great courage, but they were so exposed to the enemies' fire, and could do them so little harm, that it quickly appeared it was needlessly throwing away the lives of brave men to persist longer in so desperate an undertaking. The greatest part of those who landed were killed or taken prisoners, and not above an hundred of them came back. Talmash himself was shot in the thigh, of which he died in a few days, and was much lamented ; for he was a brave and generous man, and a good officer, very fit to animate and encourage inferior officers and soldiers ; but he was much too apt to be discontented, and to turn mutinous ; so that upon the whole, he was one of those dangerous men that are capable of doing as much mischief as good service. Thus that design miscarried, which, if it had been undertaken at any time before the French were so well prepared to receive us, might have succeeded, and must have had great effects *.

Our fleet came back to Plymouth ; and after they had set the land forces ashore, being well furnished with bomb-vessels and ammunition; they were ordered to try what could be done on the French coast †. They lay first before Dieppe, and burned it almost entirely to the ground. They went next to Havre de Grace, and destroyed a great part of that town. Dunkirk was the place of the greatest importance : so that attempt was long pursued in several ways, but none of them succeeded. These bombardings of the French towns soon spread a terror among all that lived near the coast : batteries were every where raised, and the people were brought out to defend their country : but they could do us no hurt, while our bombs at a mile's distance did great execution. The action seemed inhuman ; but the French, who had bombarded Genoa without a previous declaration of war, and who had so often put whole countries under military execution, even after they had paid the contributions that had been laid on them (for which they had protection given them), had no reason to complain of this way of carrying on the war, which they themselves had first begun.

The campaign ended every where to the advantage of the confederates, though no signal success had happened to their arms : and this new scene of action at sea raised the hearts of our people, as much as it sunk our enemies. The war in Turkey went on this year with various success : the Venetians made themselves masters of the isle of Scio, the richest and the best peopled of all the islands of the Archipelago : those of that island had a greater share of liberty left them, than any subjects of the Ottoman empire, and they flourished accordingly. The great trade of Smyrna that lay so near them, made them the more considerable. The Venetians fortified the port, but used the natives worse than the Turks had done : and as the island had a greater number of people upon it than could subsist by the productions within themselves, and the Turks prohibited all commerce with them from Asia, from whence they had their bread ; the Venetians could not keep this possession, unless they had carried off the greatest part of the inhabitants to the Morea, or their other dominions, that wanted people. The Turks brought their whole power at sea together, to make an attempt for recovering this island : two actions happened at sea, within ten days one of another ; in the last of which the Venetians pretended they had got a great victory : but their abandoning Scio, in a few days after, showed that they did not find it convenient to hold that island, which obliged them to keep a fleet at such a distance from their other dominions, and at a charge which the keeping the island could not balance. The Turks sent, as they did every year, a great convoy to Caminieck, guarded by the Crim-Tartars. The Polish army routed the convoy, and became masters of all the provisions ; but a second convoy was more happy, and got into the place ; otherwise it must have been abandoned. There was great distraction in the affairs of Poland : their queen's intrigues with the court of France gave much jealousy : their diets were broken up in confusion ; and they could never agree so far in the preliminaries, as to be able by their forms to do any business. In Transylvania, the emperor had, after a long blockade, forced Giula to surrender ; so that the Turks had now nothing in those parts, on the north of the Danube, but Temeswaer. The grand vizier came into Hungary with a great army, while the emperor had a very small one to oppose him. If the Turks had come on resolutely, and if the weather had continued good, it might have brought a fatal reverse on all the imperial affairs, and retrieved all that

* There appears no cause to wonder at the failure of this expedition. It had been the common topic of conversation in London for a month before it sailed, so that the enemy were quite prepared to oppose us. Then there was considerable confusion in landing from the boats, so that Talmaah could only land with nine hundred

the Turks had lost. But the grand vizier lay still, while the emperor's army increased, and such rains fell that nothing could be done. The affairs of Turkey were thus in great disorder: the grand seignior died soon after; and his successor in that empire gave his subjects such hopes of peace, that they were calmed for the present.

At the end of the campaign, the court of France flattered their people with hopes of a speedy end of the war: and some men of great consideration were sent to try what terms they could bring the empire or the states to: but the French were yet far from offering conditions, upon which a just or a safe peace could be treated of. The States sent some as far as to Maestricht, to see what powers those sent from France had brought with them, before they would grant them the passports that they desired: and when they saw how limited these were, the negotiation was soon at an end; or rather it never began. When the French saw this, they disowned their having sent any on such an errand; and pretended that this was only an artifice of the confederates to keep one another and their people in heart, by making them believe that they had now only a small remnant of the war before them, since the French had instruments every where at work to solicit a peace.

The king came to England in the beginning of November, and the parliament was opened with a calmer face than had appeared in any session during this reign. The supplies that were demanded, the total amounting to five millions, were all granted readily. An ill humour indeed appeared in some who opposed the funds, that would most easily and most certainly raise the money that was given, upon this pretence, that such taxes would now to be a general excise; and that the more easily money was raised, it would be the more easy to continue such duties to a longer period, if not for ever. The truth was, the secret enemies of the government proposed such funds as would be the heaviest to the people, and would not fully answer what they were estimated at; that so the nation might be uneasy under that load, and that a constant deficiency might bring on such a debt, that the government could not discharge, but must sink under it.

With the supply bills, as the price or bargain for them, the bill for frequent parliaments went on: it enacted, that a new parliament should be called every third year, and that the present parliament should be dissolved before the first of January, 1695-6; and to this the royal assent was given: it was received with great joy, many fancying that all their other laws and liberties were now the more secure, since this was passed into a law. Time must tell what effects it will produce; whether it will put an end to the great corruption with which elections were formerly managed, and to all those other practices that accompany them. Men that intended to sell their own votes within doors spared no cost to buy the votes of others in elections: but now it was hoped we should see a golden age, wherein the character men were in, and the reputation they had, would be the prevailing considerations in elections: and by this means it was hoped that our constitution, in particular that part of it which related to the house of commons, would again recover both its strength and reputation, which was now very much sunk; for corruption was so generally spread, that it was believed every thing was carried by that method.

But I am now coming towards the fatal period of this book. The queen continued still to set a great example to the whole nation, which shined in all the parts of it. She used all possible methods for reforming whatever was amiss. She took ladies off from that idleness which not only wasted their time but exposed them to many temptations: she engaged many both to read and to work: she wrought many hours a-day herself, with her ladies and her maids of honour working about her, while one read to them all. The female part of the court had been in the former reigns subject to much censure, and there was great cause for it; but she freed her court so entirely from all suspicion, that there was not so much as a colour for discourses of that sort. She did divide her time so regularly between her closet and business, her work and diversion, that every minute seemed to have its proper employment: she expressed so deep a sense of religion, with so true a regard to it; she had such right principles and just notions; and her deportment was so exact in every part of it; all being natural and unconstrained, and animated with due life and cheerfulness: she considered every thing that was laid before her so carefully, and gave such due encouragement to a freedom of speech: she remembered every thing so exactly, observing at the same time the closest reservedness, yet with an open air and frankness : she was so candid in all she said, and cautious in every promise she made ; and, notwithstanding her own great capacity, she expressed such a distrust of her own thoughts, and was so entirely resigned to the king's judgment, and so constantly determined by it, that when I laid all these things together, which I had large opportunities to observe, it gave a very pleasant prospect to balance the melancholy view that arose from the ill posture of our affairs in all other respects. It gave us a very particular joy when we saw that the person, whose condition seemed to mark her out as the defender and perfecter of our reformation, was such in all respects in her public administration, as well as in her private deportment, that she seemed well fitted for accomplishing that work for which we thought she was born : but we soon saw this hopeful view blasted, and our expectations disappointed, in the loss of her.

It was preceded by that of archbishop Tillotson, who was taken ill of a fit of a dead palsy in November, while he was in the chapel at Whitehall, on a Sunday, in the worship of God : he felt it coming on him, but, not thinking it decent to interrupt the divine service, he neglected it too long, till it fell so heavily on him, that all remedies were ineffectual ; and he died the fifth day after he was taken ill *. His distemper did so oppress him, and speaking was so uneasy to him, that though it appeared by signs and other indications that his understanding remained long clear, yet he was not able to express himself so as to edify others. He seemed still serene and calm, and in broken words he said he thanked God he was quiet within, and had nothing then to do but to wait for the will of Heaven. I preached his funeral sermon, in which I gave a character of him which was so severely true, that I perhaps kept too much within bounds, and said less than he deserved. But we had lived in such friendship together, that I thought it was more decent, as it always is more safe, to err on that hand. He was the man of the truest judgment and best temper I had ever known : he had a clear head, with a most tender and compassionate heart : he was a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and soon conquered enemy : he was truly and seriously religious, but without affectation, bigotry, or superstition : his notions of morality were fine and sublime : his thread of reasoning was easy, clear, and solid : he was not only the best preacher of the age, but seemed to have brought preaching to perfection : his sermons were so well heard and liked, and so much read, that all the nation proposed him as a pattern, and studied to copy after him : his parts remained with him clear and unclouded ; but the perpetual slanders and other ill usage he had been followed with for many years, most particularly since his advancement to that great post, gave him too much trouble, and too deep a concern : it could neither provoke him, nor fright him from his duty ; but it affected his mind so much, that this was thought to have shortened his days.

Sancroft had died a year before in the same poor and despicable manner, in which he had lived for some years : he died in a state of separation from the church ; and yet he had not the courage to own it in any public declaration : for neither living nor dying did he publish any thing concerning it. His death ought to have put an end to the schism that some were endeavouring to raise ; upon this pretence, that a parliamentary deprivation was never to be allowed, as contrary to the intrinsic power of the church ; and therefore they looked on Sancroft as the archbishop still, and reckoned Tillotson an usurper, and all that joined with him were counted schismatics ; they were willing to forget, as some of them did plainly condemn, the deprivations made in the progress of the reformation, more particularly those in the first parliament of queen Elizabeth's reign, and the deprivations made by the act of uniformity in the year 1662 : but from thence the controversy was carried up to the fourth century ; and a great deal of angry reading was brought out on both sides to justify, or to condemn, those proceedings. But arguments will never have the better of interest and humour ; yet now, even according to their own pretensions, the schism ought to have ceased ; since he, on whose account it was set up, did never assert his right ; and therefore that might have been more justly construed a tacit yielding it ; but those who have a mind to embroil church or state, will never want a pretence, and no arguments will beat them from it.

Both king and queen were much affected with Tillotson's death: the queen for many days spoke of him in the tenderest manner, and not without tears. He died so poor that, if the king had not forgiven his first fruits, his debts could not have been all paid: so generous and charitable was he in a post, out of which Sancroft had raised a great estate, which he left to his family; but Tillotson was rich in good works. His see was filled by Tenison, bishop of Lincoln. Many wished that Stillingfleet might have succeeded, he being not only so eminently learned, but judged a man in all respects fit for the post. The queen was inclined to him; she spoke with some earnestness oftener than once to the duke of Shrewsbury on that subject: she thought he would fill that post with great dignity: she also pressed the king earnestly for him: but as his ill health made him not capable of the fatigue that belonged to this province, so the whigs did generally apprehend that both his notions and his temper were too high; and all concurred to desire Tenison, who had a firmer health, with a more active temper, and was universally well liked for having served the cure of St. Martin's, in the worst time, with so much courage and discretion; so that at this time he had many friends and no enemies*.

The small pox raged this winter about London, some thousands dying of them, which gave us great apprehensions with relation to the queen, for she had never had them.

In conclusion, she was taken ill, but the next day that seemed to go off: I had the honour to be half an hour with her that day, and she complained then of nothing. The day following she went abroad; but her illness returned so heavily on her that she could disguise it no longer: she shut herself up long in her closet that night, and burned many papers, and put the rest in order; after that she used some slight remedies, thinking it was only a transient indisposition; but it increased upon her, and, within two days after, the small pox appeared, and with very bad symptoms. I will not enter into another's province, nor speak of matters so much out of the way of my own profession: but the physicians' part was universally condemned, and her death was imputed to the negligence, or unskilfulness, of Dr. Ratcliffe. He was called for, and it appeared but too evidently that his opinion was chiefly considered, and was most depended on. Other physicians were afterwards called, but not till it was too late†. The king was struck with this beyond expression. He came on the second day of her illness and passed the bill for frequent parliaments, which, if he had not done that day, it is very probable he would never have passed it. The day after, he called me into his closet, and gave a free vent to a most tender passion; he burst out into tears, and cried out that there was no hope of the queen, and that, from being the most happy, he was now going to be the most miserable, creature upon earth. He said, during the whole course of their marriage, he had never known one single fault in her: there was a worth in her that nobody knew besides himself; though he added, that I might know as much of her as any other person did. Never was such a face of universal sorrow seen in a court, or in a town, as at this time: all people, men and women, young and old, could scarcely refrain from tears. On Christmas-day the small pox sunk so entirely, and the queen felt herself so well upon it, that it was for a while concluded she had the measles, and that the danger was over. This hope was ill grounded, and of a short continuance; for, before night, all was sadly changed. It appeared that the small pox were now so sunk that there was no hope of raising them. The new archbishop attended on her; he performed all devotions, and had much private discourse with her. When the desperate condition she was in was evident

* Dr. Thomas Tenison is described by Mackay in his "Memoire," as being "a plain, good, heavy man;" a sketch that his conduct, as metropolitan, justifies us in thinking accurate. Dr. Stillingfleet was every way his superior; but, in those days, it was a point of importance to obtain a man for that high office who would not do any harm. Tenison appeared to disadvantage from being in such close juxtaposition to Tillotson. He was born at Cottenham, in Cambridgeshire, during the year 1636. It was while he held the rectory of St.

Martin's-in-the-fields, to which he was presented in 1680, that he founded the library which has just been thrown open to the public. It was for his strenuous opposition to popery, in the reign of James, that he obtained the bishopric of Lincoln in 1691, from whence he was translated to Canterbury. He died in 1715.—Biog. Britan.: Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

† Dr. Ratcliffe always declared that he was not called in until human skill could be of no avail. Burnet's statement shows that medical aid was long deferred.

beyond doubt, he told the king he could not do his duty faithfully, unless he acquainted her with the danger she was in. The king approved of it, and said, whatever effect it might have, he would not have her deceived in so important a matter. And, as the archbishop was preparing the queen with some address, not to surprise her too much with such tidings, she presently apprehended his drift, but showed no fear nor disorder upon it. She said she thanked God she had always carried this in her mind, that nothing was to be left to the last hour; she had nothing then to do but to look up to God, and submit to his will; it went further indeed than submission, for she seemed to desire death rather than life; and she continued to the last minute of her life in that calm and resigned state. She had formerly written her mind, in many particulars, to the king: and she gave order to look carefully for a small scrutoire that she made use of, and to deliver it to the king: and, having dispatched that, she avoided the giving herself or him the tenderness which a final parting might have raised in them both. She was almost perpetually in prayer. The day before she died she received the sacrament, all the bishops, who were attending, being admitted to receive it with her: we were, God knows, a sorrowful company; for we were losing her who was our chief hope and glory on earth: she followed the whole office, repeating it after the archbishop: she apprehended, not without some concern, that she should not be able to swallow the bread, yet it went down easily. When this was over, she composed herself solemnly to die; she slumbered sometimes, but said she was not refreshed by it; and said often that nothing did her good but prayer; she tried once or twice to have said somewhat to the king, but was not able to go through with it. She ordered the archbishop to be reading to her such passages of Scripture as might fix her attention and raise her devotion. Several cordials were given, but all was ineffectual; she lay silent for some hours: and some words that came from her showed her thoughts began to break. In conclusion, she died on the 28th of December, about one in the morning, in the thirty-third year of her age, and in the sixth of her reign.

She was the most universally lamented princess, and deserved the best to be so, of any in our age, or in our history. I will add no more concerning her in the way of a character: I have said a great deal already in this work; and I wrote a book, as an essay on her character, in which I have said nothing but that which I knew to be strictly true, without the enlargement of figure or rhetoric*. The king's affliction for her death was as great as it was just; it was greater than those who knew him best thought his temper capable of: he went beyond all bounds in it: during her sickness, he was in an agony that amazed us all, fainting often, and breaking out into most violent lamentations. When she died, his spirits sunk so low, that there was great reason to apprehend that he was following her; for some weeks after he was so little master of himself, that he was not capable of minding business, or of seeing company. He turned himself much to the meditations of religion, and to secret prayer; the archbishop was often and long with him: he entered upon solemn and serious resolutions of becoming in all things an exact and exemplary Christian. And now I am come to the period of this book with a very melancholy prospect; but God has ordered matters since beyond all our expectations†.

† Burnet's character of queen Mary has never been controverted in any material points. The mutual affection that was professed between her and the king was certainly genuine. Her private letters express naturally her love for him; and, after he was dead, a bracelet of her hair was found upon his arm.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger.

BOOK VI.

OF THE LIFE AND REIGN OF KING WILLIAM THE THIRD.

THE two houses of parliament set an example that was followed by the whole nation, of making consolatory and dutiful addresses to the king. The queen was buried with the ordinary ceremony, and with one piece of magnificence that could never happen before; for both houses of parliament went in procession before the chariot that carried her body to Westminster Abbey; where places were prepared for both houses to sit in form, while the archbishop preached the funeral sermon. This could never happen before, since the sovereign's death had always dissolved our parliaments. It is true, the earl of Rochester tried if he could have raised a doubt of the legality of this parliament's continuance, since it was summoned by king William and queen Mary; so, upon her death, the writ that ran in her name seemed to die with her. This would have had fatal consequences, if in that season of the year all things must have stood still till a new parliament could have been brought together: but the act that put the administration entirely in the king, though the queen had a share in the dignity of sovereign, made this cavil appear to be so ill grounded, that nobody seconded so dangerous a suggestion.

The parliament went on with the business of the nation, in which the earl of Rochester and that party artfully studied all that was possible to embroil our affairs. The state of our coin gave them too great a handle for it. We had two sorts of coin: the one was milled, and could not be practised on; but the other was not so, and was subject to clipping: and in a course of some years the old money was every year so much diminished, that it at last grew to be less than the half of the intrinsic value. Those who drove this trade were as much enriched as the nation suffered by it. When it came to be generally observed, the king was advised to issue out a proclamation, that no money should pass for the future by the tale, but by the weight, which would put a present end to clipping. But Seymour, being then in the treasury, opposed this: he advised the king to look on, and let that matter have its course: the parliament would in due time take care of it; but in the meanwhile the badness of money quickened the circulation, while every one studied to put out of his hands all the bad money; and this would make all people the readier to bring their cash into the exchequer, and so a loan was more easily made. The badness of the money began now to grow very visible; it was plain that no remedy could be provided for it, but by recoinning all the specie of England; and that could not be set about in the end of a session. The earls of Rochester and Nottingham represented this very tragically in the house of lords, where it was not possible to give the proper remedy; it produced only an act with stricter clauses and severer penalties against clippers: this had no other effect but that it alarmed the nation, and sunk the value of our money in the Exchange: guineas, which were equal in value to twenty-one shillings and sixpence in silver, rose to thirty shillings; that is to say, thirty shillings sunk to twenty-one shillings and sixpence. This public disgrace put on our coin, when the evil was not cured, was in effect a great point carried, by which there was an opportunity given to sink the credit of the government, and of the public funds; and it brought a discount of about 40*l.* per cent. upon tallies.

Another bill was set on foot, which was long pursued, and in conclusion carried by the Tories: it was concerning trials for treason; and the design of it seemed to be to make men as safe in all treasonable conspiracies and practices as was possible : two witnesses were to concur to prove the same fact, at the same time : counsel in matters of fact, and witnesses upon oath, were by it allowed to the prisoners ; they were to have a copy of the indictment and the panel in due time : all these things were in themselves just and reasonable : and if they had been moved by other men, and at another time, they would have met with little opposition : they were chiefly set on by Finch, the earl of Nottingham's brother, who had been concerned in the hard prosecutions for treasons in the end of king Charles's reign, and had then carried all prerogative points very far ; but was, during this reign, in a constant opposition to every thing that was proposed for the king's service : he had a copious way of speaking, with an appearance of beauty and eloquence to vulgar hearers ; but there was a superficialness in most of his harangues that made them seem tedious to better judges ; his rhetoric was all vicious, and his reasoning was too subtle. The occasion given for this bill leads me to give an account of some trials for treason during the last summer, which, for the relation they have to this matter, I have reserved for this place.

Lunt, an Irishman, who was bold and poor, and of a mean understanding, had been often employed to carry letters and messages between Ireland and England when king James was there. He was once taken up on suspicion, but he was faithful to his party, and would discover nothing ; so he continued after that to be trusted by them. But, being kept very poor, he grew weary of his low estate, and thought of gaining the rewards of a discovery. He fell into the hands of one Taaff, an Irish priest, who had not only changed his religion, but had married in king James's time. Taaff came into the service of the present government, and had a small pension. He was long in pursuit of a discovery of the imposture in the birth of the prince of Wales, and was engaged with more success in discovering the concealed estates of the priests and the religious orders, in which some progress was made. These seemed to be sure evidences of the sincerity of the man, at least in his opposition to those whom he had forsaken, and whom he was provoking in so sensible a manner. All this I mention the more particularly to show how little that sort of men are to be depended on ; he possessed those to whom his other discoveries gave him access, of the importance of this Lunt, who was then come from St. Germain's, and who could make great discoveries : so Lunt was examined by the ministers of state ; and he gave them an account of some discourses and designs against the king, and of an insurrection, that was to have broken out in the year 1692, when king James was designing to come over from Normandy : for he said he had carried at that time commissions to the chief men of the party, both in Lancashire and Cheshire. A carrier had been employed to carry down great quantities of arms to them : one of the chests, in which they were put up, had broken in the carriage, so the carrier saw what was in them ; and he deposed he had carried many of the same weight and size : the persons concerned, finding the carrier was true and secret, continued to employ him in that sort of carriage for a great while. Lunt's story seemed probable and coherent in all its circumstances : so orders were sent to seize on some persons, and to search houses for arms. In one house they found arms for a troop of horse, built up within walls very dexterously. Taaff was all this while very zealous in supporting Lunt's credit, and in assisting him in his discoveries. A solemn trial of the prisoners was ordered in Lancashire. When the set time drew near, Taaff sent them word that, if he should be well paid for it, he would bring them all off : it may be easily imagined that they stuck at nothing for such a service. He had got out of Lunt all his depositions, which he disclosed to them ; so they had the advantage of being well prepared to meet and overthrow his evidence in many circumstances : and at the trial Taaff turned against him, and witnessed many things against Lunt that shook his credit. There was another witness that supported Lunt's evidence, but he was so profligate a man, that great and just objections lay against giving him any credit ; but the carrier's evidence was not shaken. Lunt, in the trial, had named two gentlemen wrong, mistaking the one for the other ; but he quickly corrected his mistake : he had seen them but once, and they were both together, so he might mistake their names ; but he was sure these were the two persons with whom he had those treasonable negotiations. Taaff had engaged him in company in London, to whom he had talked very idly, like a man who resolved to make a fortune by swearing : and it seemed, by what he said, that he had many discoveries yet in reserve, which he intended to spread among many, till he should grow rich and considerable by it : this was sworn against him. By all these things his evidence was so blasted that no credit was given to him. Four of the judges were sent down to try the prisoners at Manchester and at Chester, where they managed matters with an impartial exactness. Any leaning that appeared was in favour of the prisoners, according to a characteristic that judges had always pretended to, but had not of late deserved so well as upon this occasion, of being counsel for the prisoner. The evidence that was brought against Lunt was afterwards found to be false ; but it looked then with so good an appearance, that both the king's counsel and the judges were satisfied with it ; and so, without calling for the rest of the evidence, the matter was let fall : and when the judges gave the charge to the jury, it was in favour of the prisoners, so that they were acquitted. And the rest of those who were ordered to be tried after them were all discharged without trial.

The whole party triumphed upon this as a victory, and complained both of the ministers of state and of the judges : the matter was examined into by both houses of parliament, and it evidently appeared that the proceeding had been not only exactly according to law, but that all reasonable favour had been shewed the prisoners ; so that both houses were fully satisfied : only the earls of Rochester and Nottingham hung on the matter long, and with great eagerness, and, in conclusion, protested against the vote by which the lords justified these proceedings. This examination was brought on with much noise, to give the more strength to the bill of treasons : but the progress of the examination turned so much against them who had made this use of it, that it appeared there was no just occasion given by that trial to alter the law. Yet the commons passed the bill : but the lords insisted on a clause, that all the peers should be summoned to the trial of a peer that was charged with high treason : the commons would not agree to that ; and so the bill was dropped for this time. By the late trial it had manifestly appeared how little the crown gained by one thing, which yet was thought an advantage, that the witnesses for the prisoner were not upon oath. Many things were upon this occasion witnessed in favour of the prisoners, which were afterwards found to be notoriously false : and it is certain that the terror of an oath is a great restraint, and many, whom an oath might overawe, would more freely allow themselves the liberty of lying in behalf of a prisoner to save his life.

When this design failed, another was set up against the bank, which began to have a flourishing credit, and had supplied the king so regularly with money, and that upon such reasonable terms, that those who intended to make matters go heavily, tried what could be done to shake the credit of the bank. But this attempt was rejected in both houses with indignation : it was very evident that public credit would signify little, if what was established in one session of parliament might be fallen upon and shaken in another.

Towards the end of the session, complaints were made of some military men who did not pay their quarters, pretending their own pay was in arrear ; but, it appearing that they had been paid, and the matter being further examined into, it was found that the superior officers had cheated the subalterns, which excused their not paying their quarters. Upon this the enquiry was carried further, and such discoveries were made, that some officers were broken upon it, while others prevented complaints, by satisfying those whom they had oppressed. It was found out that the secretary of the treasury had taken two hundred guineas, for procuring the arrears due to a regiment to be paid : whereupon he was sent to the Tower, and turned out of his place. Many were the more sharpened against him, because it was believed that he, as well as Trevor, the speaker, was deeply concerned in corrupting the members of the house of commons : he had held his place both in king Charles's and king James's time : and the share he had in the secret distribution of money, had made him a necessary man for those methods.

But the house, being on this scent, carried the matter still further. In the former session of parliament, an act had passed, creating a fund for the repayment of the debt owing to the orphans, by the chamber of London ; and the chamber had made Trevor a present of a thousand guineas, for the service he did them in that matter : this was entered in their books, so that full proof was made of it. It was indeed believed that a much greater present had been made him in behalf of the orphans ; but no proof of that appeared : whereas what had been taken in so public a manner could not be hid. This was objected to Trevor as corruption and a breach of trust ; and upon it he was expelled the house : and Mr. Paul Foley was chosen speaker in his room ; who had got great credit by his integrity, and his constant complaining of the administration.

One discovery made way for another : it was found that in the books of the East India company there were entries made of great sums given for secret services done the company, that amounted to 170,000*l.* : and it was generally believed that the greatest part of it had gone among the members of the house of commons. For the two preceding winters there had been attempts eagerly pursued by some for breaking the company, and either opening a free trade to the Indies, or at least erecting a new company : but it was observed that some of the hottest sticklers against the company did insensibly not only fall off from that heat, but turned to serve the company as much as they had at first endeavoured to destroy it. Seymour was among the chief of these : and it was said that he had 12,000*l.* of their money under the colour of a bargain for their saltpetre. Great pains and art were used to stifle this enquiry ; but curiosity, envy, and ill nature, as well as virtue, will on such occasions always prevail to set on enquiries. Those who have had nothing desire to know who have had something, while the guilty persons dare not show too great a concern in opposing discoveries. Sir Thomas Cook, a rich merchant, who was governor of the company, was examined concerning that great sum given for secret service : but he refused to answer. So a severe bill was brought in against him, in case he should not, by a prefixed day, confess how all that money had been disposed of. When the bill was sent up to the lords, and was likely to pass, he came in and offered to make a full discovery, if he might be indemnified for all that he had done, or that he might say, in that matter. The enemies of the court hoped for great discoveries that should disgrace both the ministers and the favourites : but it appeared that whereas both king Charles and king James had obliged the company to make them a yearly present of 10,000*l.*, that the king had received this but once ; and that though the company offered a present of 50,000*l.* if the king would grant them a new charter, and consent to an act of parliament confirming it, the king had refused to hearken to it. There were indeed presumptions that the marquis of Caermarthen had taken a present of five thousand guineas, which were sent back to sir Thomas Cook the morning before he was to make his discovery. The lords appointed twelve of their body to meet with twenty-four of the house of commons to examine into this matter ; but they were so ill satisfied with the account that was given them by the four persons who had been entrusted with the secret, that by a particular act, that passed both houses, they were committed to the Tower of London till the end of the next session of parliament, and restrained from disposing of their estates, real or personal. These were proceedings of an extraordinary nature, which could not be justified but from the extraordinary occasion that was given for them. Some said this looked like the setting up a court of inquisition, when new laws were made on purpose to discover secret transactions ; and that no bounds could be set to such a method of proceeding. Others said, that when entries were made of such sums secretly disposed of, it was as just for a parliament to force a confession, as it was common in the course of the law to subpoena a man to declare all his knowledge of any matter, how secretly soever it might have been managed, and what person soever might have been concerned in it. The lord president felt that he was deeply wounded with this discovery ; for, while the act against Cook was passing in the house of lords, he took occasion to affirm, with solemn protestations, that he himself was not at all concerned in that matter. But now all had broken out. One Firebrass, a merchant, employed by the East India company, had treated with Bates, a friend of the marquis of Caermarthen ; and for the favour that lord was to do them, in procuring them a new charter, Bates was to have for his use five thousand guineas. But now a new turn was to be given to all this : Bates swore that he indeed received the money, and that he offered it to that lord, who positively refused to take it : but, since it was already paid in, he advised Bates to keep it to himself ; though, by the examination, it appeared that Bates was to have 500*l.* for his own negotiating the affair : it did also appear that the money was paid into the hands of one of that lord's servants ; but he could not be come at. Upon this discovery the house of commons voted an impeachment for a misdemeanour against the lord president. He, to prevent that, desired to be heard speak to that house in his own justification. When he was before them he set out the services that he had done the nation, in terms that were not thought very decent: he assumed the greatest share of the honour of the revolution to himself: he expressed a great uneasiness to be brought under so black an imputation, from which he cleared himself as much as words could do: in the end, he desired a present trial. Articles were upon that brought against him: he, in answer to these, denied his having received the money. But his servant, whose testimony only could have cleared that point, disappearing, the suspicion still stuck on him. It was intended to hang up the matter to another session; but an act of grace came in the end of this, with an exception indeed as to corruption: yet this whole discovery was let fall, and it was believed too many of all sides were concerned in it; for, by a common consent, it was never revived; and thus the session ended.

The first consultation after it was over was concerning the coin, what methods should be taken to prevent further clipping, and for remedying so great an abuse. Some proposed the recoinning the money, with such a raising of the value of the species as should balance the loss upon the old money that was to be called in. This took with so many that it was not easy to correct an error that must have had very bad effects in the conclusion: for the only fixed standard must be the intrinsic value of an ounce of silver: and it was a public robbery that would very much prejudice our trade, not to keep the value of our specie near an equality with its weight and fineness in silver. So that the difference between the old and new money could only be set right by the house of commons, in a supply to be given for that end. The lord keeper, Somers, did indeed propose that which would have put an effectual stop to clipping for the future. It was, that a proclamation should be prepared with such secrecy, as to be published all over England on the same day, ordering money to pass only by weight; but that, at the same time, during three or four days after the proclamation, all persons, in every county, that had money, should bring it in to be told and weighed; and the difference was to be registered, and the money to be sealed up, to the end of the time given, and then to be restored to the owners; and an assurance was to be given, that this deficiency in weight should be laid before the parliament, to be supplied another way, and to be allowed them in the following taxes. But though the king liked this proposition, yet all the rest of the council were against it. They said this would stop the circulation of money, and might occasion tumults in the markets. Those whose money was thus to be weighed would not believe that the difference between the tale and the weight would be allowed them, and so might grow mutinous; therefore they were for leaving this matter to the consideration of the next parliament. So this proposition was laid aside; which would have saved the nation above a million of money. For now, as all people believed that the parliament would receive the clipped money in its tale, clipping went on, and became more visibly scandalous than ever it had been.

There was indeed reason to apprehend tumults: for, now, after the queen's death, the jacobites began to think, that the government had lost the half of its strength, and that things could not be kept quiet at home, when the king should be beyond sea. Some pretended they were for putting the princess in her sister's place; but that was only a pretence, to which she gave no sort of encouragement: king James lay at bottom. They fancied an invasion in the king's absence would be an easy attempt, which would meet with little resistance; so they sent some over to France, in particular one Charnock, a Fellow of Magdalen College, who in king James's time had turned papist, and was a hot and active agent among them. They undertook to bring a body of two thousand horse to meet such an army as should be sent over; but Charnock came back with a cold account, that nothing could be done at that time; upon which it was thought necessary to send over a man of quality, who should press the matter with some more authority; so the earl of Aylesbury was prevailed on to go. He was admitted to a secret conversation with the French king, and this gave rise to a design which was very near being executed the following winter.

But, if sir John Fenwick did not slander king James, they at this time proposed a shorter and more infallible way, by assassinating the king; for he said that some came over from France about this time who assured their party, and himself in particular, that a commission was coming over, signed by king James, which they affirmed they had seen, warranting them to attack the king's person. This, it is true, was not yet arrived ; but some affirmed they had seen it, and that it was trusted to one who was on his way hither. Therefore, since the king was so near going over to Holland, that he would probably be gone before the commission could be in England, it was debated among the jacobites whether they ought not to take the first opportunity to execute this commission, even though they had it not in their hands. It was resolved to do it, and a day was set for it ; but, as Fenwick said, he broke the design, and sent them word that he would discover it if they would not promise to give over the thoughts of it ; and upon this reason, he believed, he was not let into the secret the following winter. This his lady told me from him, as an article of merit to obtain his pardon ; but he had trusted their word very easily, it seems, since he gave the king no warning to be on his guard, and the two witnesses whom he said he could produce to vouch this, were then under prosecution, and outlawed ; so that the proof was not at hand, and the warning had not been given as it ought to have been. But of all this the government knew nothing, and suspected nothing at this time.

The king settled the government of England, in seven lords justices, during his absence ; and in this a great error was committed, which had some ill effects, and was like to have had worse. The queen, when she was dying, had received a kind letter from, and had sent a reconciling message to the princess, and so that breach was made up. It is true the sisters did not meet ; it was thought that might throw the queen into too great a commotion, so it was put off till it was too late ; yet the princess came soon after to see the king, and there was after that an appearance of good correspondence between them ; but it was little more than an appearance *. They lived still in terms of civility and in formal visits ; but the king did not bring her into any share in business, nor did he order his ministers to wait on her and give her any account of affairs. And now that he was to go beyond sea, she was not set at the head of the councils, nor was there any care taken to oblige those who were about her. This looked either like a jealousy and distrust, or a coldness towards her which gave all the secret enemies of the government a colour of complaint. They pretended zeal for the princess, though they came little to her ; and they made it very visible, on many occasions, that this was only a disguise for worse designs.

Two great men had died in Scotland the former winter, the dukes of Hamilton and Queensbury : they were brothers-in-law, and had been long great friends, but they became irreconcilable enemies. The first had more application, but the other had the greater genius. They were incompatible with each other, and indeed with all other persons ; for both loved to be absolute, and to direct every thing. The marquis of Halifax died in April this year. He had gone into all the measures of the tories, only he took care to preserve himself from criminal engagements. He studied to oppose every thing, and to embroil matters all he could. His spirit was restless, and he could not bear to be out of business. His vivacity and judgment sunk much in his last years, as well as his reputation. He died of a gangrene, occasioned by a rupture that he had long neglected. When he saw death so near him, and was warned that there was no hope, he shewed a great firmness of mind, and a calm that had much of true philosophy at least. He professed himself a sincere Christian, and lamented the former parts of his life, with solemn resolutions of becoming in all respects another man, if God should raise him up : and so, I hope, he died a better man than he lived.

The seven lords justices were the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, the lord privy seal, the lord steward, the lord chamberlain, the first secretary of state, and the first commissioner of the treasury †. They had no character nor rank except when four of them were together, and they avoided assembling to that number except at the council board, where it was necessary ; and when they were together they had regal authority vested in them. They were chosen by the posts they were in, so that no other person could think he was neglected by the preference : they were not envied by this titular greatness, since it was indeed only titular ; for they had no real authority trusted with them. They took care to keep within bounds, and to do nothing, but in matters of course, till they had the king's orders, to which they adhered exactly, so that no complaints could be made of them because they took nothing on them, and did only keep the peace of the kingdom, and transmit and execute the king's orders. The summer went over quietly at home ; for though the jacobites showed their disposition on some occasions, but most signally on the prince of Wales's birth-day, yet they were wiser than to break out into any disorder, when they had no hopes of assistance from France.

About the end of May the armies were brought together in Flanders ; the king drew his main force towards the French lines, and the design was formed to break through and to destroy the French Flanders. Luxembourg died this winter ; so the command of the French armies was divided between Villeroy and Boufflers, but the former commanded the stronger army. An attempt was made on the fort of Knock, in order to forcing the lines, and there was some action about it ; but all on the sudden Namur was invested, and the king drew off the main part of his army to besiege that place, and left above thirty thousand men under the command of the prince of Vaudemont, who was the best general he had ; for prince Waldeck died above a year before this. With that army he was to cover Flanders and Brabant, while the king carried on the siege.

As soon as Namur was invested, Boufflers threw himself into it, with many good officers and a great body of dragoons : the garrison was twelve thousand strong. A place so happily situated, so well fortified, and so well furnished and commanded, made the attempt seem bold and doubtful. The dry season put the king under another difficulty ; the Maese was so low that there was not water enough to bring up the barks, laden with artillery and ammunition, from Liege and Maestricht, so that many days were lost in bringing these overland ; and if Villeroy had followed the king close, it is thought he must have quitted the design ; but the French presumed upon the strength of the place and garrison, and on our being so little practised in sieges. They thought that Villeroy might make some considerable conquest in Flanders, and when that was done come in good time to raise the siege. Prince Vaudemont managed his army with such skill and conduct, that as he covered all the places on which he thought the French had an eye, so he marched with that caution, that though Villeroy had above double his strength, yet he could not force him to an engagement, nor gain any advantage over him. The military men that served under him, magnified his conduct highly, and compared it to any thing that Turenne, or the greatest generals of the age had done. Once it was thought, he could not get off ; but he marched under the cannon of Ghent without any loss. In this Villeroy's conduct was blamed, but without cause ; for he had not overseen his advantage, but had ordered the duke of Mayne, the French king's beloved son, to make a motion with the horse which he commanded ; and probably, if that had been speedily executed, it might have had ill effects on the prince of Vaudemont ; but the duke de Mayne despised Villeroy, and made no haste to obey his orders, so the advantage was lost, and the king of France put him under a slight disgrace for it. Villeroy attacked Dixmuyde and Deinse : the garrisons were not indeed able to make a great resistance ; but they were ill commanded. If their officers had been masters of a true judgment, or presence of mind, they might at least have got a favourable composition, and have saved the garrisons, though the places were not tenable ; yet they were basely delivered up, and about seven thousand men were made prisoners of war. And hereupon, though by a cartel that had been settled between the two armies, all prisoners were to be redeemed at a set price, and within a limited time ; yet the French having now so many men in their hands, did, without either colour or shame, give a new essay of their perfidiousness ; for they broke it upon this occasion, as they had often done at sea, indeed as often as any advantages on their side tempted them to it. The governors of those places were at first believed to have betrayed their trust and sold the garrisons, as well as the places, to the French ; but they were tried afterwards, and it appeared that it flowed from cowardice and want of sense ; for which one of them suffered, and the other was broken with disgrace.

Villeroy marched towards Brussels, and was followed by prince Vaudemont, whose chief care was to order his motions so, that the French might not get between him and the king's camp at Namur. He apprehended that Villeroy might bombard Brussels, and would have hindered it if the town could have been wrought on to give him the assistance that he desired of them. Townsmen upon all such occasions are more apt to consider a present, though a small expense, than a great, though an imminent danger; so prince Vaudemont could not pretend to cover them. The electress of Bavaria was then in the town; and though Villeroy sent a compliment to her, yet he did not give her time to retire, but bombarded the place for two days, with so much fury, that a great part of the lower town was burnt down. The damage was valued at some millions, and the electress was so frightened, that she miscarried upon it of a boy. When this execution was done, Villeroy marched towards Namur; his army was now so much increased by detachments brought from the Rhine, and troops drawn out of garrisons, that it was said to be one hundred thousand strong. Both armies on the Rhine were so equal in strength that they could only lie on the defensive, neither side being strong enough to undertake any thing. M. de L'Orge commanded the French, and the prince of Baden the imperialists: the former was sinking as much in his health as in his credit, so a great body was ordered to march from him to Villeroy; and another body equal to that commanded by the landgrave of Hesse came and joined the king's army.

The siege was carried on with great vigour: the errors to which our want of practice exposed us were all corrected by the courage of our men: the fortifications, both in strength and in the extent of the outworks, were double to what they had been when the French took the place. Our men did not only succeed in every attack, but went much further.—In the first great sally the French lost so many, both officers and soldiers, that after that they kept within their works and gave us no disturbance. Both the king and the elector of Bavaria went frequently into the trenches: the town held out one month, and the citadel another. Upon Villeroy's approach, the king drew off all the troops that could be spared from the siege, and placed himself in his way with an army of sixty thousand men; but he was so well posted, that after Villeroy had looked on him for some days he found it was not advisable to attack him. Our men wished for a battle, as that which would not only decide the fate of Namur, but of the whole war. The French gave it out that they would put all to hazard rather than suffer such a diminution of their king's glory as the retaking that place seemed to be. But the signal of the citadel's treating, put an end to Villeroy's designs; upon which, he apprehending that the king might then attack him, drew off with so much precipitation, that it looked more like a flight than a retreat.

The capitulation was soon ended and signed by Boufflers, who, as was said, was the first mareschal of France that had ever delivered up a place. He marched out with five thousand men; so it appeared he had lost seven thousand during the siege, and we lost in it only about the same number. This was reckoned one of the greatest actions of the king's life, and indeed one of the greatest that is in the whole history of war. It raised his character much, both at home and abroad, and gave a great reputation to his troops: the king had the entire credit of the matter, his general officers having a very small share in it, being most of them men of low genius, and little practised in things of that nature. Cohorn, the chief engineer, signalized himself so eminently on this occasion, that he was looked on as the greatest man of the age, and outdid even Vauban, who had gone far beyond all those that went before him in the conduct of sieges: but it was confessed by all, that Cohorn had carried that art to a much farther perfection during this siege. The subaltern officers and soldiers gave hopes of a better race that was growing up, and supplied the errors and defects of their superior officers. As the garrison marched out, the king ordered Boufflers to be stopped, in reprisal for the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deinse. Boufflers complained of this as a breach of articles, and the action seemed liable to censure. But many authorities and precedents were brought, both from law and history, to justify it. All obligations among princes, both in peace and war, must be judged to be reciprocal; so that he who breaks these first sets the other at liberty. At length the French consented to send back the garrisons, pursuant to the cartel: Boufflers was first set at liberty, and then these garrisons were released according to promise.

The officers were tried and proceeded against by councils of war, according to martial law. They were raised in the army by ill methods, and maintained themselves by worse: corruption had broken into the army, and oppression and injustice were much complained of. The king did not approve of those practices, but he did not inquire after them, nor punish them with a due severity; nor did he make difference enough between those who served well, sold nothing, and used their subalterns kindly, and those who set every thing to sale, and oppressed all that were under them; and when things of that kind go unpunished, they will soon make a great progress. There was little more done during the campaign in Flanders; nor was there any action upon the Rhine.

In Italy there was nothing done in the field by force of arms; but an affair of great consequence was transacted in a very mysterious manner. The duke of Savoy, after a very long blockade, undertook the siege of Casal; but he was so ill provided for it that no good account of it could be expected; the king had so little hopes of success, that he was not easily prevailed on to consent to the besieging it; but either the French intended to gain the pope and the Venetians, and in conclusion, that duke himself, with this extraordinary concession; or, since our fleet was then before Toulon, they judged it more necessary to keep their troops for the defence of their coast and fleet, than to send them to relieve Casal; so orders were sent to the governor to capitulate in such a number of days after the trenches were opened, so that the place was surrendered, though it was not at all straitened. It was agreed that it should be restored to the duke of Mantua, but so dismantled, that it might give jealousy to no side; and the slighting the fortifications went on so slowly, that the whole season was spent in it, a truce being granted all that while. Thus did the French give up Casal, after they had been at a vast expense in fortifying it, and had made it one of the strongest places in Europe.

Our fleet was all the summer master of the Mediterranean: the French were put into great disorder, and seemed to apprehend a descent, for Russel came before Marseilles and Toulon oftener than once: contrary winds forced him out to sea again, but with no loss. He himself told me he believed nothing could be done there; only the honour of commanding the sea, and of shutting the French within their ports, gave a great reputation to our affairs. In Catalonia the French made no progress; they abandoned Palamos, and made Gironne their frontier. The Spaniards once pretended to besiege Palamos, but they only pretended to do it; they desired some men from Russel, for he had regiments of marines on board: they said they had begun the siege, and were provided with every thing that was necessary to carry it on, only they wanted men, so he sent them some battalions; but when they came thither, they found not any one thing that was necessary to carry on a siege, not so much as spades, not to mention guns and ammunition; so Russel sent for his men back again. But the French of themselves quitted the place; for as they found the charge of the war in Catalonia was great, and though they met with a feeble opposition from the Spaniards, yet since they saw they could not carry Barcelona, so long as our fleet lay in those seas, they resolved to lay by in expectation of a better occasion. We had another fleet in our own channel that was ordered to bombard the French coast: they did some execution upon St. Malos, and destroyed Grandville, that lay not far from it: they also attempted Dunkirk, but failed in the execution: some bombs were thrown into Calais, but without any great effect, so that the French did not suffer so much by the bombardment as was expected: the country indeed was much alarmed by it; they had many troops dispersed all along their coast, so that it put their affairs in great disorder, and we were every where masters at sea. Another squadron, commanded by the marquis of Caermarthen (whose father was created duke of Leeds, to colour the dismissing him from business, with an increase of title), lay off from the isles of Scilly, to secure our trade and convoy our merchants. He was an extravagant man both in his pleasures and humours: he was slow in going to sea; and when he was out he fancied the French fleet was coming up to him, which proved to be only a fleet of merchant ships; so he left his station and retired into Milford haven, by which means that squadron became useless.

This proved fatal to our trade; many of our Barbadoes ships were taken by French cruizers and privateers. Two rich ships coming from the East Indies, were also taken one hundred and fifty leagues to the westward, by a very fatal accident, or by some treacherous advertisement, for cruizers seldom go so far into the ocean; and to complete the misfortunes of the East India company, three other ships that were come near Galway, on the west of Ireland, fell into the hands of some French privateers. Those five ships were valued at a million, so here was great occasion of discontent in the city of London: they complained that neither the admiralty nor the government took the care that was necessary for preserving the wealth of the nation. A French man-of-war at the same time fell upon our factory on the coast of Guinea; he took the small fort we had there, and destroyed it. These misfortunes were very sensible to the nation, and did much abate the joy which so glorious a campaign would otherwise have raised; and much matter was laid in for ill humour to work upon.

The war went on in Hungary; the new grand seignior came late into the field, but as late as it was the imperialists were not ready to receive him: he tried to force his way into Transylvania, and took some weak and ill-defended forts, which he soon after abandoned. Veterani, who was the most beloved of all the emperor's generals, lay with a small army to defend the entrance into Transylvania; the Turks fell upon him and overpowered him with numbers; his army was destroyed and himself killed, but they sold their lives dear: the Turks lost double their number and their best troops in the action, so that they had only the name and honour of a victory; they were not able to prosecute it, nor to draw any advantage from it. The stragglers of the defeated army drew together towards the passes, but none pursued them, and the Turks marched back to Adrianople, with the triumph of having made a glorious campaign. There were some slight engagements at sea between the Venetians and the Turks, in which the former pretended they had the advantage, but nothing followed upon them. Thus affairs went on abroad during this summer.

There was a parliament held in Scotland, where the marquis of Tweeddale was the king's commissioner. Every thing that was asked for the king's supply, and for the subsistence of his troops, was granted. The massacre in Glencoe made still a great noise, and the king seemed too remiss in inquiring into it; but when it was represented to him that a session of parliament could not be managed without high motions and complaints of so crying a matter, and that his ministers could not oppose these, without seeming to bring the guilt of that blood that was so perfidiously shed, both on the king and on themselves, to prevent that, he ordered a commission to be passed under the great seal, for a precognition in that matter, which is a practice in the law of Scotland of examining into crimes before the persons concerned are brought upon their trial. This was looked on as an artifice to cover that transaction by a private inquiry; yet when it was complained of in parliament, not without reflections on the slackness in examining into it, the king's commissioner assured them that, by the king's order, the matter was then under examination, and that it should be reported to the parliament. The inquiry went on, and in the progress of it a new practice of the earl of Bredalbane's was discovered; for the Highlanders deposed that while he was treating with them, in order to their submitting to the king, he had assured them that he still adhered to king James's interest, and that he pressed them to come into that pacification, only to preserve them for his service till a more favourable opportunity. This, with several other treasonable discourses of his being reported to the parliament, he covered himself with his pardon, but these discourses happened to be subsequent to it, so he was sent a prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh: he pretended he had secret orders from the king to say any thing that would give him credit with them, which the king owned so far that he ordered a new pardon to be past for him. A great party came to be formed in this session of a very odd mixture; the high presbyterians and the jacobites joined together to oppose every thing, yet it was not so strong as to carry the majority, but great heats arose among them.

The report of the massacre of Glencoe was made in full parliament; by that it appeared that a black design was laid, not only to cut off the men of Glencoe but a great many more clans, reckoned to be in all above six thousand persons. The whole was pursued in many letters, that were written with great earnestness; and though the king's orders carried nothing in them that was in any sort blamable, yet the secretary of state's letters went much further; so the parliament justified the king's instructions, but voted the execution in Glencoe to have been a barbarous massacre, and that it was pushed on by the secretary of state's letters beyond the king's orders. Upon that they voted an address to be made to the king, that he and others concerned in that matter might be proceeded against according to law ; this was carried by a great majority.

In this session, an act passed in favour of such of the episcopal clergy, as should enter into those engagements to the king that were by law required ; that they should continue in their benefices under the king's protection, without being subject to the power of the presbytery. This was carried with some address before the presbyterians were aware of the consequences of it, for it was plainly that which they call erastianism. A day was limited to the clergy for taking the oaths ; and by a very zealous and dexterous management, about seventy of the best of them were brought to take the oaths to the king : and so they came within the protection promised them by the act.

Another act passed that has already produced very fatal consequences to that kingdom, and may yet draw worse after it. The interlopers in the East India trade, finding that the company was likely to be favoured by the parliament, as well as by the court, were resolved to try other methods to break in upon that trade. They entered into a treaty with some merchants in Scotland ; and they had, in the former session, procured an act that promised letters patents to all such as should offer to set up new manufactures, or drive any new trade, not yet practised by that kingdom, with an exemption for twenty-one years from all taxes and customs, and with all such other privileges as should be found necessary for establishing or encouraging such projects. But here was a necessity of procuring letters patents, which they knew the credit that the East India company had at court would certainly render ineffectual. So they were now in treaty for a new act, which should free them from that difficulty. There was one Paterson, a man of no education, but of great notions, which, as was generally said, he had learned from the buccaneers, with whom he had consorted for some time. He had considered a place in Darien, where he thought a good settlement might be made, with another over against it in the South Sea ; and by two settlements there, he fancied a great trade might be opened both for the East and West Indies ; and that the Spaniards in the neighbourhood might be kept in great subjection to them : so he made the merchants believe, that he had a great secret, which he did not think fit yet to discover, and reserved to a fitter opportunity, only he desired that the West Indies might be named in any new act that should be offered to the parliament. He made them in general understand that he knew of a country, not possessed by Spaniards, where there were rich mines, and gold in abundance. While these matters were in treaty, the time of the king's giving the instructions to his commissioner for the parliament came on ; and it had been a thing of course, to give a general instruction to pass all bills for the encouragement of trade. Johnston told the king that he heard there was a secret management among the merchants for an act in Scotland, under which the East India trade might be set up ; so he proposed, and drew an instruction, empowering the commissioner to pass any bill, promising letters patents for encouraging of trade, yet limited so that it should not interfere with the trade of England. When they went down to Scotland, the king's commissioner either did not consider this, or had no regard to it, for he gave the royal assent to an act, that gave the undertakers, either of the East India or West India trade, all possible privileges, with exemption of twenty-one years from all impositions ; and the act directed letters patents to be passed under the great seal, without any further warrant for them. When this was printed, it gave a great alarm in England, more particularly to the East India company ; for many of the merchants of London resolved to join stock with the Scotch company, and the exemption from all duties gave a great prospect of gain. Such was the posture of affairs in Scotland.

In Ireland, the three lords justices did not agree long together ; the lord Capel studied to render himself popular, and espoused the interests of the English against the Irish, without any nice regard to justice or equity : he was too easily set on by those who had their own end in it to do every thing that gained him applause. The other two were men of severe tempers, and studied to protect the Irish, when they were oppressed ; nor did they try to make themselves otherwise popular than by a wise and just administration : so lord Capel was highly magnified, and they were as much complained of by all the English in Ireland. Lord Capel did undertake to manage a parliament so as to carry all things, if he was made lord deputy, and had power given him to place and displace such as he should name. This was agreed to, and a parliament was held there, after he had made several removes. In the beginning of the session, things went smoothly; the supply that was asked for the support of that government was granted; all the proceedings in king James's parliament were annulled; and the great act of settlement was confirmed and explained as they desired: but this good temper was quickly lost by the heat of some who had great credit with lord Capel. Complaints were made of sir Charles Porter, the lord chancellor, who was beginning to set on foot a tory humour in Ireland, whereas it was certainly the interest of that government to have no other division among them but that of English and Irish, and of protestant and papist. Lord Capel's party moved in the house of commons, that Porter should be impeached; but the grounds upon which this motion was made appeared to be so frivolous, after the chancellor was heard by the house of commons, in his own justification, that he was voted clear from all imputation by a majority of two to one: this set the lord deputy and the lord chancellor, with all the friends of both, at so great a distance from each other, that it put a full stop, for some time, to all business.

Thus factions were formed in all the king's dominions; and he being for so much of the year at a great distance from the scene, there was no pains taken to quiet these, and to check the animosities which arose out of them. The king studied only to balance them, and to keep up among the parties a jealousy of one another, that so he might oblige them all to depend more entirely on himself.

As soon as the campaign was over in Flanders, the king intended to come over directly into England; but he was kept long on the other side by contrary winds. The first point that was under debate upon his arrival was, whether a new parliament should be summoned, or the old one be brought together again, which by the law that was lately passed, might sit till lady-day*. The happy state the nation was in put all men, except the merchants, in a good temper; none could be sure we should be in so good a state next year; so that now probably elections would fall on men, who were well affected to the government; a parliament that saw itself in its last session, might affect to be froward, the members by such a behaviour, hoping to recommend themselves to the next election; besides, if the same parliament had been continued, probably the inquiries into corruption would have been carried on, which might divert them from more pressing affairs, and kindle greater heats: all which might be more decently dropped by a new parliament than suffered to lie asleep by the old one. These considerations prevailed, though it was still believed that the king's own inclinations led him to have continued the parliament yet one session longer; for he reckoned he was sure of the major vote in it. Thus this parliament was brought to a conclusion, and a new one was summoned.

The king made a progress to the north; and staid some days at the earl of Sunderland's, which was the first public mark of the high favour he was in. The king studied to constrain himself to a little more openness and affability than was natural to him; but his cold and dry way had too deep a root not to return too oft upon him: the jacobites were so descried, that few of them were elected; but many of the sourer sort of whigs, who were much alienated from the king, were chosen: generally, they were men of estates; but many were young, hot, and without experience. Foley was again chosen speaker, the demand of the supply was still very high, and there was a great arrear of deficiencies: all was readily granted, and lodged on funds that seemed to be very probable.

The state of the coin was considered, and there were great and long debates about the proper remedies. The motion of raising the money above its intrinsic value was still much pressed; many apprehended this matter could not be cured, without casting us into great disorders: our money, they thought, would not pass, and so the markets would not be furnished; and it is certain, that if there had been ill humours then stirring in the nation, this might have cast us into great convulsions. But none happened, to the disappointment of our enemies, who had their eyes and hopes long fixed on the effects this might produce. All came, in the end, to a wise and happy resolution of recoinage all the specie of England, in milled money: all the old money was ordered to be brought in, in public payments or loans, to the exchequer, and that by degrees ; first, the half-crown pieces, and the rest of the money by a longer day ; money of a bad alloy, as well as clipped money, was to be received, though this was thought an ill precedent, and that it gave too much encouragement to false coining, yet it was judged necessary upon this occasion, and it gave a present calm to a ferment that was then working all England over. Twelve hundred thousand pounds was given to supply the deficiency of the bad and clipped money. So this matter was happily settled, and was put in a way to be effectually remedied ; and it was executed with an order and a justice, with a quiet and an exactness, beyond all men's expectation. So that we were freed from a great and threatening mischief, without any of those effects that were generally apprehended from it*.

The Bill of trials, in cases of treason, was again brought into the house of commons, and passed there ; when it came up to the lords, they added the clause for summoning all the peers to the trial of a peer, which was not easily carried ; for those who wished well to the bill looked on this as a device to lose it, as no doubt it was, and therefore they opposed it ; but, contrary to the hopes of the court, the commons were so desirous of the bill, that when it came down to them they agreed to the clause, and so the bill passed, and had the royal assent.

A severe bill was brought in for voiding all the elections of parliament men, where the elected had been at any expense in meat, drink, or money, to procure votes. It was very strictly penned ; but time must show whether any evasions can be found out to avoid it. Certainly, if it has the desired effect, it would prove one of the best laws that ever was made in England ; for abuses in elections were grown to most intolerable excesses, which threatened even the ruin of the nation. Another act passed against unlawful and double returns, for persons had been often returned, plainly contrary to the vote of the majority ; and in boroughs, where there was a contest, between the select number of the Corporation, and the whole populace ; both sides had obtained favourable decisions, as that side prevailed, on which the person elected happened to be : so both elections were returned, and the house judged the matter. But by this act, all returns were ordered to be made according to the last determination of the house of commons. These were thought good securities for future parliaments ; it had been happy for the nation, if the first of these had proved as effectual as the last was.

Great complaints were made in both houses of the act for the Scotch East India company, and addresses were made to the king, setting forth the inconveniences that were likely to arise from thence to England ; the king answered, that he had been ill served in Scotland, but he hoped remedies should be found to prevent the ill consequences, that they apprehended from the act : and soon after this, he turned out both the secretaries of state, and the marquis of Tweeddale, and great changes were made in the whole ministry of that kingdom, both high and low. No enquiry was made, nor proceedings ordered, concerning the business of Glencoe, so that furnished the libellers with some colours in aspersing the king, as if he must have been willing to suffer it to be executed, since he seemed so unwilling to let it be punished.

But when it was understood in Scotland, that the king had disowned the act for the East India company, from which it was expected that great riches should flow into that kingdom, it is not easy to conceive how great and how general an indignation was spread over the whole kingdom ; the jacobites saw what a game it was likely to prove in their hands, they played it with great skill, and to the advantage of their cause, in a course of many years, and continue to manage it to this day. There was a great deal of noise made of the Scotch act in both houses of parliament in England by some who seemed to have no other design in that, but to heighten our distractions by the apprehensions that they expressed. The Scotch nation fancied nothing but mountains of gold, and the credit of the design rose so high, that subscriptions were made, and advances of money were offered, beyond what any

* The cause of the coin being so liable to suffer by clipping, was its being broad and thin, from being old and hammered. The fresh issue, mentioned in the text, was called "the grand recoinage of 1696." It amounted to £6,400,000 sterling. To expedite the issue, country mints were established at Bristol, Chester, Exeter, Norwich, and York. The pieces there struck have the first letter of these names under the bust of the king. (Essay on Medals, 153. ed. 1784.)

believed the wealth of that kingdom could have furnished. Paterson came to have such credit among them, that the design of the East India trade, how promising soever, was wholly laid aside; and they resolved to employ all their wealth in the settling a colony, with a port and fortifications, in Darien; which was long kept a secret, and was only trusted to a select number empowered by this new company, who assumed to themselves the name of the African company, though they never meddled with any concern in that part of the world. The unhappy progress of this affair will appear in its proper time.

The losses of the merchants gave great advantages to those who complained of the administration; the conduct, with relation to our trade, was represented as at best a neglect of the nation, and of its prosperity. Some, with a more spiteful malice, said it was designed that we should suffer in our trade, that the Dutch might carry it from us; and how extravagant soever this might seem, it was often repeated by some men of virulent tempers. And in the end, when all the errors, with relation to the protection of our trade, were set out and much aggravated, a motion was made to create by act of parliament, a council of trade.

This was opposed by those who looked on it as a change of our constitution, in a very essential point. The executive part of the government was wholly in the king; so that the appointing any council, by act of parliament, began a precedent of their breaking in upon the execution of the law, in which it could not be easy to see how far they might be carried; it was indeed offered, that this council should be much limited as to its powers, yet many apprehended, that if the parliament named the persons, how low soever their powers might be at first, they would be enlarged every session; and from being a council to look into matters of trade, they would be next empowered to appoint convoys and cruisers; this in time might draw in the whole admiralty, and that part of the revenue or supply that was appropriated to the navy: so that a king would soon grow to be a duke of Venice, and indeed those who set this on most zealously did not deny that they designed to graft many things upon it.

The king was so sensible of the ill effects this would have, that he ordered his ministers to oppose it as much as possibly they could. The earl of Sunderland, to the wonder of many, declared for it, as all that depended on him promoted it; he was afraid of the violence of the republican party, and would not venture on provoking them; the ministers were much offended with him for taking this method to recommend himself at their cost; the king himself took it ill, and he told me, if he went on driving it as he did, that he must break with him; he imputed it to his fear; for the unhappy steps he had made in King James's time, gave his enemies so many handles and colours for attacking him, that he would venture on nothing that might provoke them. Here was a debate plainly in a point of prerogative, how far the government should continue on its ancient bottom of monarchy, as to the executive part, or how far it should turn to a commonwealth; and yet, by an odd reverse, the whigs, who were now most employed, argued for the prerogative, while the tories seemed zealous for public liberty: so powerfully does interest bias men of all forms.

This was going on, and probably would have passed in both houses, when the discovery of a conspiracy turned men's thoughts quite another way: so that all angry motions were let fall, and the session came to a very happy conclusion, with greater advantages to the king than could have been otherwise expected. We were all this winter alarmed, from many different quarters, with the insolent discourses of the jacobites, who seemed so well assured of a sudden revolution, which was to be both quick and entire, that at Christmas they said it would be brought about within six weeks. The French fleet, which we had so long shut up within Toulon, was now fitting out, and was ordered to come round to Brest; our fleet, that lay at Cadiz, was not strong enough to fight them, when they should pass the straits; Russel had come home, with many of the great ships, and had left only a squadron there; but a great fleet was ordered to go thither; it was ready to have sailed in December; but was kept in our ports by contrary winds till February: this was then thought a great unhappiness; but we found afterwards, that our preservation was chiefly owing to it: and it was so extraordinary a thing to see the wind fixed at south-west during the whole winter, that few could resist the observing a signal providence of God in it. We were all this while in great pain for Rook, who commanded the squadron that lay at Cadiz, and was likely to suffer for want of the provisions and stores which this fleet was to carry him, besides the addition of strength this would bring him, in case the Toulon squadron should come about; we were only apprehensive of danger from that squadron, for we thought that we could be in none at home, till that fleet was brought about; the advertisements came from many places that some very important thing was ready to break out: it is true, the jacobites fed their party with such stories every year, but they both talked and wrote now with more than ordinary assurance. The king had been so accustomed to alarms and reports of this kind, that he had now so little regard to them as scarcely to be willing to hearken to those, who brought him such advertisements. He was so much set on preparing for the next campaign, that all other things were little considered by him.

But in the beginning of February, one captain Fisher came to the earl of Portland, and in general told him there was a design to assassinate the king; but he would not, or could not then, name any of the persons who were concerned in it: he never appeared more, for he had assurances given him, that he should not be made use of as a witness. Few days after that, one Pendergrass, an Irish officer, came to the earl of Portland, and discovered all that he knew of the matter; he freely told him his own name, but would not name any of the conspirators. La Rue, a Frenchman, came also to brigadier Levison, and discovered to him all that he knew; these two (Pendergrass and La Rue) were brought to the king apart, not knowing of one another's discovery; they gave an account of two plots then on foot, the one for assassinating the king, and the other for invading the kingdom. The king was not easily brought to give credit to this, till a variety of circumstances, in which the discoveries did agree, convinced him of the truth of the whole design.

It has been already told, in how many projects king James was engaged for assassinating the king; but all these had failed: so now one was laid that gave better hopes, and looked more like a military action than a foul murder. Sir George Berkeley, a Scotchman, received a commission from king James, to go and attack the prince of Orange in his winter quarters; Charnock, Sir William Perkins, Captain Porter, and La Rue, were the men to whose conduct the matter was trusted; the duke of Berwick came over, and had some discourse with them about the method of executing it. Forty persons were thought necessary for the attempt; they intended to watch the king as he should go out to hunt, or come back from it in his coach; some of them were to engage the guards, while others should attack the king, and either carry him off a prisoner, or, in case of any resistance, kill him. This soft manner was proposed, to draw military men to act in it, as a warlike exploit; Porter and Knightly went and viewed the grounds, and the way through which the king passed, as he went between Kensington and Richmond park, where he used to hunt commonly on Saturdays: and they pitched on two places, where they thought they might well execute the design. King James sent over some of his guards to assist in it; he spoke himself to one Harris, to go over and to obey such orders as he should receive from Berkeley; he ordered money to be given him, and told him that, if he was forced to stay long at Calais, the president there would have orders to furnish him*.

When the duke of Berwick had laid the matter so well here, that he thought it could not miscarry, he went back to France, and met king James at St. Denis, who was come so far on his way from Paris. He stopped there, and after a long conference with the duke of Berwick, he sent him first to his queen at St. Germain, and then to the king of France, and he himself called for a notary, and passed some act; but it was not known to what effect. When that was done, he pursued his journey to Calais to set himself at the head of an army of about 20,000 men, that were drawn out of the garrisons which lay near that frontier. These being full in that season, an army was in a very few days brought together, without any previous warning or noise. There came every winter a coasting fleet from all the sea-ports of France to Dunkirk, with all the provisions for a campaign; and it was given out that the French intended an early one this year. So that this coasting fleet was ordered to be there by the end of January; thus here were transport-ships, as well as an army, brought together in a very silent manner; there was also a small fleet of cruizers, and some men of war ready to convoy them over; many regiments were embarked, and king James was waiting at Calais for some tidings of that on which he chiefly depended ; for upon the first notice of the success of the assassination, he was resolved to have set sail : so near was the matter brought to a crisis, when it broke out by the discovery made by the persons above named. La Rue told all particulars with the greatest frankness, and named all the persons that they had intended to engage in the execution of it ; for several lists were among them, and those who concerted the matter had those lists given them, and took it for granted that every man named in those lists was engaged ; since they were persons on whom they depended, as knowing their inclinations, and believing that they would readily enter into the project, though it had not been at that time proposed to many of them, as it appeared afterwards. The design was laid to strike the blow on the 15th of February, in a lane that turns down from Turnham Green to Brentford ; and the conspirators were to be scattered about the green, in taverns and alehouses, and to be brought together upon a signal given. They were cast into several parties, and an aid-de-camp was assigned to every one of them, both to bring them together, and to give the whole the air of a military action : Pendergrass owned very freely to the king, that he was engaged in interest against him, as he was of a religion contrary to his. He said he would have no reward for his discovery ; but he hated a base action ; and the point of honour was the only motive that prevailed on him : he owned that he was desired to assist in seizing on him, and he named the person that was fixed on to shoot him ; he abhorred the whole thing, and immediately came to reveal it. His story did in all particulars agree with La Rue's ; for some time he stood on it, as a point of honour, to name no person ; but upon assurance given him that he should not be brought as a witness against them, he named all he knew. The king ordered the coaches and guards to be made ready next morning, being the 15th of February, and a Saturday, his usual day of hunting ; but some accident was pretended to cover his not going abroad that day. The conspirators continued to meet together, not doubting but that they should have occasion to execute their design the next Saturday : they had some always about Kensington, who came and went continually, and brought them an account of every thing that passed there. On Saturday, the 22d of February, they put themselves in a readiness, and were going out to take the posts assigned them ; but were surprised, when they had notice that the king's hunting was put off a second time ; they apprehended they might be discovered, yet as none were seized, they soon quieted themselves.

Next night, a great many of them were taken in their beds ; and the day following the whole discovery was laid before the privy council. At the same time, advices were sent to the king from Flanders, that the French army was marching to Dunkirk, on design to invade England. And now, by a very happy providence, though hitherto a very unacceptable one, we had a great fleet at Spithead ready to sail ; and we had another fleet, designed for the summer's service in our own seas, quite ready, though not yet manned. Many brave seamen, seeing the nation was in such visible danger, came out of their lurking holes, in which they were hiding themselves from the press, and offered their service ; and all people showed so much zeal, that in three days Russel, who was sent to command, stood over to the coast of France with a fleet of above fifty men of war. The French were amazed at this ; and upon it their ships drew so near their coasts, that he durst not follow them in such shallow water, but was contented with breaking their design, and driving them into their harbours. King James stayed for some weeks there ; but, as the French said, his malignant star still blasted every project that was formed for his service.

The court of France was much out of countenance with this disappointment ; for that king had ordered his design of invading England to be communicated to all the courts in which he had ministers : and they spoke of it with such an air of assurance, as gave violent presumptions that the king of France knew of the conspiracy against the king's person, and depended upon it ; for indeed, without that, the design was impracticable, considering how great a fleet we had at Spithead. Nor could any men of common sense have entertained a thought of it, but with a view of the confusion into which the intended assassination must have cast us. They went on in England seizing the conspirators ; and a proclamation was issued out, for apprehending those that absconded, with a promise of a thousand pounds reward to such as should seize on any of them, and the offer of a pardon to every conspirator that should seize on any of the rest. This set all people at work, and in a few weeks most of them were apprehended; only Berkeley was not found, who had brought the commission from king James, though great search was made for him. For, though the reality of such a commission was fully proved afterwards, in the trials of the conspirators, by the evidence of those who had seen and read it all written in king James's own hand (such a paper being too important to be trusted to any to copy), yet much pains was taken to have found the very person who was entrusted with it: the commission itself would have been a valuable piece, and such an original as was not to be found any where.

The military men would not engage on other terms: they thought, by the laws of war, they were bound to obey all orders that run in a military style, and no other; and so they imagined that their part in it was as innocent as the going on any desperate design during a campaign. Many of them repined at the service, and wished that it had not been put on them; but, being commanded, they fancied that they were liable to no blame nor infamy, but ought to be treated as prisoners of war.

Among those who were taken, Porter and Pendergrass were brought in. Porter had been a vicious man, engaged in many ill things; and was very forward and furious in all their consultations. The lord Cutts, who, as captain of the guards, was present when the king examined Pendergrass, but did not know his name, when he saw him brought in pressed him to own himself and the service that he had already done; but he claimed the promise of not being forced to be a witness, and would say nothing. Porter was a man of pleasure, who loved not the hardships of a prison, and much less the solemnities of an execution; so he confessed all: and then Pendergrass, who had his dependence on him, freely confessed likewise. He said, Porter was the man who had trusted him; he could not be an instrument to destroy him; yet he lay under no obligations to any others among them. Porter had been in the management of the whole matter; so he gave a very copious account of it all, from the first beginning. And now it appeared, that Pendergrass had been but a very few days among them, and had seen very few of them; and that he came and discovered the conspiracy the next day after it was opened to him.

When by these examinations the matter was clear and undeniable, the king communicated it in a speech to both houses of parliament. They immediately made addresses of congratulation, with assurances of adhering to him against all his enemies, and in particular against king James; and after that, motions were made in both houses for an association, wherein they should own him as their rightful and lawful king, and promise faithfully to adhere to him against king James, and the pretended prince of Wales; engaging at the same time to maintain the act of succession, and to revenge his death on all who should be concerned in it. This was much opposed in both houses, chiefly by Seymour and Finch in the house of commons, and the earl of Nottingham in the house of lords. They went chiefly upon this, that "rightful and lawful" were words that had been laid aside in the beginning of this reign; that they imported one that was king by descent, and so could not belong to the present king. They said the crown and the prerogative of it were vested in him, and therefore they would obey him, and be faithful to him, though they could not acknowledge him their rightful and lawful king. Great exceptions were also taken to the word "revenge," as not of an evangelical sound; but that word was so explained, that these were soon cleared: revenge was to be meant in a legal sense, either in the prosecution of justice at home, or of war abroad; and the same word had been used in that association, into which the nation entered, when it was apprehended that queen Elizabeth's life was in danger by the practices of the queen of Scots. After a warm debate, it was carried in both houses, that an association should be laid on the table, and that it might be signed by all such as were willing of their own accord to sign it; only with this difference, that instead of the words "rightful and lawful king," the lords put these words, "That king William hath the right by law to the crown of these realms; and that neither king James, nor the pretended prince of Wales, nor any other person, has any right whatsoever to the same." This was done to satisfy those, who said they could not come up to the words "rightful and lawful:" and the earl of Rochester offering these words, they were thought to answer the ends of the association, and so were agreed to. This was signed by both houses, excepting only fourscore in the house of commons, and fifteen in the house of lords. The association was carried from the houses of parliament over all England, and was signed by all sorts of people, a very few only excepted

The bishops also drew a form for the clergy, according to that signed by the house of lords, with some small variation, which was so universally signed, that not above an hundred all England over refused it.

Soon after this, a bill was brought into the house of commons, declaring all men incapable of public trust, or to serve in parliament, who did not sign the association. This passed with no considerable opposition; for those who had signed it of their own accord, were not unwilling to have it made general; and such as had refused it when it was voluntary, were resolved to sign it as soon as the law should be made for it. And at the same time, an order passed in council, for reviewing all the commissions in England, and for turning out of them all those who had not signed the association, while it was voluntary; since this seemed to be such a declaration of their principles and affections, that it was not thought reasonable that such persons should be any longer either justices of peace, or deputy lieutenants.

The session of parliament was soon brought to a conclusion. They created one fund, upon which two millions and a half were to be raised, which the best judges did apprehend was neither just nor prudent. A new bank was proposed, called the Land Bank, because the securities were to be upon land: this was the main difference between it and the Bank of England; and by reason of this, it was pretended, that it was not contrary to a clause in the act for that bank, that no other bank should be set up in opposition to it. There was a set of undertakers, who engaged that it should prove effectual, for the money for which it was given. This was chiefly managed by Foley, Harley, and the tories: it was much laboured by the earl of Sunderland; and the king was prevailed on to consent to it, or rather to desire it, though he was then told by many, of what ill consequence it would prove to his affairs. The earl of Sunderland's excuse for himself, when the error appeared afterwards but too evidently, was, that he thought it would engage the tories in interest to support the government*.

After most of the conspirators were taken, and all examinations were over, some of them were brought to their trials. Charnock, King, and Keys, were begun with: the design was fully proved against them. Charnock showed great presence of mind, with temper, and good judgment, and made as good a defence as the matter could bear; but the proof was so full, that they were all found guilty. Endeavours were used to persuade Charnock to confess all he knew, for he had been in all their plots from the beginning. His brother was employed to deal with him, and he seemed to be once in suspense; but the next time that his brother came to him, he told him, he could not save his own life without doing that which would take away the lives of so many, that he did not think his own life worth it. This showed a greatness of mind that had been very valuable, if it had been better directed. Thus this matter was understood at the time; but many years after this, the lord Somers gave me a different account of it. Charnock, as he told me, sent an offer to the king, of a full discovery of all their consultations and designs; and desired no pardon, but only that he might live in some easy prison; and if he was found to prevaricate, in any part of his discovery, he would look for the execution of the sentence. But the king apprehended, that so many persons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered desperate, that he was afraid to have such a scene opened, and would not accept of this offer. At his death, Charnock delivered a paper, in which he confessed he was engaged in a design to attack the prince of Orange's guards: but he thought himself bound to clear king James from having given any commission to assassinate him. King's paper, who suffered with him, was to the same purpose; and they both took pains to clear all those of their religion from any accession to it. King expressed a sense of the unlawfulness of the undertaking, but Charnock seemed fully satisfied with the lawfulness of it. Keys was a poor ignorant trumpeter, who had his dependence on Porter, and now suffered chiefly upon his evidence, for which he was

* The scheme of a Land Bank was suggested by Dr. Hugh Chamberlain, and was patronised by the tories, or landed interest, because they thought it would embarrass the whigs, and their monied supporters, the bank of England, &c. The new bank proposed to advance 2,000,000*l.* for the service of government, for which seven per cent. was to be paid, and the privilege granted them of lending a certain sum annually on landed securities. It was sanctioned by an act of parliament, but when the day of payment came, the projectors failed to fulfil their engagements, and the scheme proved entirely abortive.—Shrewsbury Correspondence.

much reflected on. It was said that servants had often been witnesses against their masters, but that a master's witnessing against his servant was somewhat new and extraordinary.

The way that Charnock and King took to vindicate king James did rather fasten the imputation more upon him: they did not deny that he had sent over a commission to attack the prince of Orange, which, as Porter deposed, Charnock told him he had seen. If this had been denied by a dying man his last words would have been of some weight; but instead of denying that which was sworn, he only denied that king James had given a commission for assassination; and it seems great weight was laid on this word, for all the conspirators agreed in it, and denied that king James had given a commission to assassinate the prince of Orange. This was an odious word, and perhaps no person was ever so wicked as to order such a thing in so crude a manner; but the sending a commission to attack the king's person was the same thing upon the matter, and was all that the witnesses had deposed; therefore their not denying this, in the terms in which the witnesses swore it, did plainly imply a confession that it was true. But some who had a mind to deceive themselves or others, laid hold on this and made great use of it, that dying men had acquitted king James of the assassination. Such slight colours will serve, when people are engaged beforehand to believe as their affections lead them.

Sir John Friend and sir William Perkins were tried next. The first of these had risen from mean beginnings to great credit and much wealth: he was employed by king James, and had all this while stuck firm to his interests: his purse was more considered than his head, and was open on all occasions, as the party applied to him. While Parker was formerly in the Tower, upon information of an assassination of the king designed by him, he furnished the money that corrupted his keepers, and helped him to make his escape out of the Tower: he knew of the assassination, though he was not to be an actor in it; but he had a commission for raising a regiment for king James, and he had entertained and paid the officers who were to serve under him: he had also joined with those who had sent over Charnock, in May 1695, with the message to king James mentioned in the account of the former year; it appearing now, that they had then desired an invasion with eight thousand foot and one thousand horse, and had promised to join these with two thousand horse upon their landing. In this the earl of Aylesbury, the lord Montgomery, son to the marquis of Powys, and sir John Fenwick, were also concerned. Upon all this evidence Friend was condemned, and the earl of Aylesbury was committed prisoner to the Tower. Perkins was a gentleman of estate, who had gone violently into the passions and interests of the court in king Charles's time: he was one of the six clerks in chancery, and took all oaths to the government rather than lose his place. He did not only consent to the design of assassination, but undertook to bring five men who should assist in it, and he had brought up horses for that service from the country, but had not named the persons, so this lay yet in his own breast. He himself was not to have acted in it, for he likewise had a commission for a regiment; and therefore was to reserve himself for that service: he had also provided a stock of arms which were hid under ground, and were now discovered: upon this evidence he was condemned. Great endeavours were used both with Friend and him to confess all they knew. Friend was more sullen, as he knew less; for he was only applied to and trusted, when they needed his money. Perkins fluctuated more; he confessed the whole thing for which he was condemned, but would not name the five persons whom he was to have sent in to assist in the assassination. He said he had engaged them in it, so he could not think of saving his own life by destroying theirs. He confessed he had seen king James's commission; the words differed a little from those which Porter had told, but Porter did not swear that he saw it himself, he only related what Charnock had told him concerning it, yet Perkins said they were to the same effect: he believed it was all written with king James's own hand; he had seen his writing often, and was confident it was written by him: he owned that he had raised and maintained a regiment, but he thought he could not swear against his officers, since he himself had drawn them into the service; and he affirmed that he knew nothing of the other regiments. He sent for the bishop of Ely, to whom he repeated all these particulars, as the bishop himself told me: he seemed much troubled with a sense of his former life, which had been very irregular. The house of commons sent some to examine him, but he gave them so little satisfaction that they left him to the course of the law. His tenderness in not accusing those whom he had drawn in, was so generous, that this alone served to create some regard for a man who had been long under a very bad character. In the beginning of April, Friend and he were executed together.

A very unusual instance of the boldness of the jacobites appeared upon that occasion: these two had not changed their religion, but still called themselves protestants; so three of the nonjuring clergymen waited on them to Tyburn, two of them had been often with Friend, and one of them with Perkins: and all the three at the place of execution joined to give them public absolution, with an imposition of hands, in the view of all the people; a strain of impudence that was as new as it was wicked, since these persons died owning the ill designs they had been engaged in, and expressing no sort of repentance for them. So these clergymen, in this solemn absolution, made an open declaration of their allowing and justifying these persons in all they had been concerned in: two of these were taken, and censured for this in the king's bench, the third made his escape.

Three other conspirators, Rookwood, Lowick, and Cranborn, were tried next. By this time the new act for trials in such cases began to take place, so these held long, for their counsel stuck upon every thing: but the evidence was now more copious, for three other witnesses came in, the government being so gentle as to pardon even the conspirators who confessed their guilt, and were willing to be witnesses against others. The first two were papists, they expressed their dislike of the design, but insisted on this, that as military men they were bound to obey all military orders; and they thought that the king, who knew the laws of war, ought to have a regard to this, and to forgive them. Cranborn called himself a protestant, but was more sullen than the other two; to such a degree of fury and perverseness had the jacobites wrought up their party. Knightly was tried next: he confessed all, and upon that, though he was condemned, he had a reprieve and was afterwards pardoned. These were all the trials and executions that even this black conspiracy drew from the government; for the king's inclinations were so merciful, that he seemed uneasy even under these acts of necessary justice.

Cook was brought next upon his trial on account of the intended invasion, for he was not charged with the assassination: his trial was considered as introductory to the earl of Aylesbury's, for the evidence was the same as to both. Porter and Goodman were two witnesses against him: they had been with him at a meeting, in a tavern in Leadenhall-street, where Charnock received instructions to go to France with the message formerly mentioned. All that was brought against this was, that the master of the tavern and two of his servants swore, that they remembered well when that company was at the tavern, for they were often coming into the room where they sat, both at dinner time and after it, and that they saw not Goodman there; nay, they were positive that he was not there. On the other hand, Porter deposed that Goodman was not with them at dinner, but that he came to that house after dinner, and sent him in a note, upon which he, with the consent of the company, went out and brought him in; and then it was certain that the servants of the house were not in that constant attendance, nor could they be believed in a negative against positive evidence to the contrary. Their credit was not such but that it might be well supposed, that, for the interest of their house, they might be induced to make stretches. The evidence was believed, and Cook was found guilty, and condemned: he obtained many short reprieves upon assurances that he would tell all he knew; but it was visible he did not deal sincerely; his punishment ended in banishment. Sir John Fenwick was taken not long after, going over to France, and was ordered to prepare for his trial, upon which he seemed willing to discover all he knew; and in this he went off and on, for he had no mind to die, and hoped to save himself by some practice or other. Several days were set for his trial, and he procured new delays by making some new discoveries. At last, when he saw that slight and general ones would not serve his turn, he sent for the duke of Devonshire, and wrote a paper as a discovery, which he gave him to be sent to the king; and that duke affirming to the lords justices that it was not fit that paper should be seen by any before the king saw it, the matter was suffered to rest for this time*.

* The chief of these prosecutions are in the 'State Trials.'

The summer went over, both in Flanders and on the Rhine, without any action. All the funds given for this year's service proved defective, but that of the Land bank failed totally, and the credit of the bank of England was much shaken. About five millions of clipped money was brought into the exchequer; and the loss that the nation suffered by the recoinage of the money, amounted to two millions and two hundred thousand pounds. The coinage was carried on with all possible haste; about eighty thousand pounds was coined every week; yet still this was slow, and the new money was generally kept up, so that for several months little of it appeared. This stop in the free circulation of money put the nation into great disorder. Those who, according to the act of parliament, were to have the first payments in milled money, for the loans they had made, kept their specie up, and would not let it go but at an unreasonable advantage. The king had no money to pay his army, so they were in great distress, which they bore with wonderful patience. By this means the king could undertake nothing, and was forced to lie on the defensive; nor were the French strong enough to make an impression in any place. The king had a mighty army, and was much superior to the enemy, yet he could do nothing; and it passed for a happy campaign because the French were not able to take any advantage from those ill accidents that our want of specie brought us under, which indeed were such, that nothing but the sense all had of the late conspiracy, kept us quiet and free from tumults. It now appeared what a strange error the king was led into, when he accepted of so great a sum to be raised by a Land bank. It was scarcely honourable, and not very safe at any time; but it might have proved fatal at a time in which money was likely to be much wanted, which want would have been less felt if paper credit had been kept up: but one bank working against another, and the goldsmiths against both, put us to great straits; yet the bank supplied the king in this extremity, and thereby convinced him that they were his friends in affection as well as interest*.

The secret practices in Italy were now ready to break out. The pope and the Venetians had a mind to send the Germans out of Italy, and to take the duke of Savoy out of the necessity of depending on those they called heretics. The management in the business of Casal looked so dark, that the lord Galway, who was the king's general and envoy there, did apprehend there was something mysterious under it. One step more remained, to settle the peace there; for the duke of Savoy would not own that he was in any negotiation, till he should have received the advances of money that were promised him from England and Holland, for he was much set on the heaping of treasure, even during the war, to which end he had debased his coin so, that it was not above a sixth part in intrinsic value of what it passed for. He was always beset with his priests, who were perpetually complaining of the progress that heresy was like to make in his dominions. He had indeed granted a very full edict in favour of the Vaudois, restoring their former liberties and privileges to them, which the lord Galway took care to have put in the most emphatical words, and passed with all the formalities of law, to make it as effectual as laws and promises can be; yet every step that was made in that affair went against the grain, and was extorted from him by the intercession of the king and the States, and by the lord Galway's zeal.

Good people, what will you of all be bereft?
Will you never learn wit while a penny is left?
You are all, like the dog in the fable, betray'd
To let go the substance and snatch at the shade;
Your specious pretences, and foreign expenses,
We war with religion, and waste all our chink,
'Tis nipt and 'tis clipped, 'tis lent and 'tis spent,
Till 'tis gone, till 'tis gone to the devil I think.

We pay for our new-born, we pay for our dead,
We pay if we're single, we pay if we're wed;

To show that our merciful senate don't fail
To begin at the head, and tax down to the tail.
We pay through the nose by subjecting foes,
Yet for all our expenses get nothing but blows;
At home we are cheated, abroad we're defeated,
But the end on't, the end on't, the Lord above knows.

We parted with all our old money, to shew
We foolishly hoped for a plenty of new;
But might have remember'd, when we came to the push,
That a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.
We now, like poor wretches, are kept under hatches,
At rack, and at manger, like beasts in the ark,
Since our burghesses and knights make us pay for our lights,
Why should we, why should we be kept in the dark?

* Alluding to the window tax.

In conclusion, the French were grown so weary of that war, and found the charge of it so heavy, that they offered not only to restore all that had been taken, but to demolish Pignerol, and to pay the duke some millions of crowns; and to complete the whole, that the duke of Burgundy should marry his daughter. To this he consented; but to cover this defection from his allies, it was further agreed that Catinat should draw his army together before the duke could bring his to make head against him; and that he should be ordered to attempt the bombardment of Turin, that so the duke might seem to be forced by the extremity of his affairs to take such conditions as were offered him. He had a mind to have cast the blame on his allies, but they had assisted him more effectually at this time than on other occasions. A truce was first made, and that, after a few months, was turned into an entire peace; one article whereof was, that the Milanese should have a neutrality granted them in case the German forces were sent out of Italy. All the Italian princes and states concurred in this, to get rid of the Germans as soon as was possible; so the duke of Savoy promised to join with the French to drive them out. Valence was the first place that the duke of Savoy attacked; there was a good garri-on in it, and it was better provided than the places of the Spaniards generally were. It was not much pressed, and the siege held some weeks, many dying in it. At last the courts of Vienna and Madrid accepted of the neutrality, and engaged to draw the Germans out of these parts upon an advance of money, which the princes of Italy were glad to pay to be delivered of such troublesome guests.

Thus ended the war in Piedmont, after it had lasted six years. Pignerol was demolished; but the French, by the treaty, might build another fort at Fenestrella, which is in the middle of the hills; and so it will not be so important as Pignerol was, though it may prove an uneasy neighbour to the duke of Savoy. His daughter was received in France as duchess of Burgundy, though not yet of the age of consent, for she was but ten years old.

Nothing of consequence passed in Catalonia: the French went no further than Gironne, and the Spaniards gave them no disturbance. Both the king and queen of Spain were at this time so ill, that, as is usual upon such occasions, it was suspected they were both poisoned. The king of Spain relapsed often, and at last remained in that low state of health, in which he seemed to be always rather dying than living. The court of France were glad of his recovery; for they were not then in a condition to undertake such a war as the dauphin's pretensions must have engaged them in.

In Hungary the Turks advanced again towards Transylvania, where the duke of Saxony commanded the imperial army. The Turks did attack them, and they defended themselves so well, that though they were beat, yet it cost the Turks so dear, that the grand seignior could undertake nothing afterwards. The imperialists lost about five thousand men; but the Turks lost above twice that number, and the grand seignior went back with an empty triumph as he did the former year. But another action happened, in a very remote place, which may come to be of a very great consequence to him. The Muscovites, after they had been for some years under the divided monarchy of two brothers, or rather of a sister, who governed all in their name, by the death of one of these came now under one czar: he entered into an alliance with the emperor against the Turks; and Azoph, which was reckoned a strong place, that commanded the mouth of the Tanais, or Don, where it falls into the Meotis-palus, after a long siege was taken by his army. This opened the Euxine sea to him, so that if he be furnished with men skilled in the building and sailing of ships, this may have consequences that may very much distress Constantinople, and be in the end fatal to that empire. The king of Denmark's health was now on a decline, upon which the duke of Holstein was taking advantage, and new disputes were like to arise there.

Our affairs at sea went well with relation to trade: all our merchant fleets came happily home; we made no considerable losses; on the contrary, we took many of the French privateers; they now gained little in that way of war, which in some of the former years had been very advantageous to them. Upon the breaking out of the conspiracy, orders were sent to Cadiz for bringing home our fleet; the Spaniards murmured at this, though it was reasonable for us to take care of ourselves in the first place. Upon that the French fleet was also ordered to come about : they met with rough weather, and were long in the passage ; so that if we had sent a squadron before Brest, we had probably made some considerable advantage ; but the fleet was so divided, that faction appeared in every order and in every motion ; nor did the king study enough to remedy this, but rather kept it up, and seemed to think that was the way to please both parties ; but he found afterwards, that by all his management with the tories he disgusted those who were affectionate and zealous for him, and that the tories had too deep an alienation from him to be overcome with good usage. Their submissions however to him gained their end, which was to provoke the whigs to be peevish and uneasy. Our fleet sailed towards the isle of Rhee, with some bomb vessels : some small islands were burnt and plundered, as St. Martin's was bombarded : the loss the French made was not considerable in itself, but it put their affairs in great distraction, and the charge they were at in defending their coast, was much greater than ours in attacking it. This was the state of affairs in England and abroad during the summer.

Scotland was falling into great misery by reason of two successive bad harvests, which exhausted that nation and drove away many of their people ; the greatest number went over to Ireland. A parliament was held at Edinburgh, and in a very thin house every thing that was asked was granted. They were in a miserable condition, for two such bad years lay extremely heavy on them.

This summer the French were making steps towards a peace : the court was very uneasy under so long and so destructive a war : the country was exhausted, they had neither men nor money ; their trade was sunk to nothing, and public credit was lost. The creation of new offices, which always was considered as a resource never to be exhausted, did not work as formerly ; few buyers or undertakers appeared. That king's health was thought declining ; he affected secrecy and retirement ; so that both the temper of his mind and the state of his affairs disposed him to desire a peace. One Callieres was sent to make propositions to the States, as D'Avaux was pressing the king of Sweden to offer his mediation : the States would hearken to no proposition till two preliminaries were agreed to ; the first was, that all things should be brought back to the state in which they were put by the treaties of Munster and Nimeguen. This imported not only the restoring Mons and Charleroy, but likewise Strasburg and Luxemburg, and that, in the state which they were in at present. The other preliminary was, that France should own the king whensoever the peace should be concluded. The emperor, who designed to keep off any negotiation as much as possible, moved that this should be done before the treaty was opened ; but the king thought the other was sufficient, and would not suffer the peace to be obstructed by a thing that might seem personal to himself. To all this the court of France, after some delays, consented ; but that spirit of chicane and injustice that had reigned so long in that court, did still appear in every step that was made, for they made use of equivocal terms in every paper that was offered in their name. The States had felt the effects of these in their former treaties too sensibly not to be now on their guard against them. The French still returned to them, and when some points seemed to be quite settled new difficulties were still thrown in. It was proposed by the French that the popish religion must continue still at Strasburg, that the king of France could not in conscience yield that point. It was also pretended that Luxemburg was to be restored in the same state in which it was when the French took it. These variations did almost break off the negotiation, but the French would not let it fall, and yielded them up again ; so it was visible all this was only an amusement and an artifice, by this shew of peace, to get the parliament of England to declare for it ; since as a trading nation must grow weary of war, so the party they had among us would join in with the inclination that was now become general, to promote the peace ; for though our affairs were in all respects, except that of the coin, in so good a condition that we felt ourselves grow richer by the war, yet during each campaign we ran a greater risk than our enemies did ; for all our preservation hung on the single thread of the king's life, and on that prospect the party that wrought against the government had great hopes, and acted with much spirit during the war, which we had reason to think must sink with a peace.

The parliament met in November ; and at the opening of the session, the king in his speech to the two houses, acquainted them with the overtures that were made towards a peace; but added, that the best way to obtain a good one, was to be in a posture for carrying on the war. The great difficulty was to find a way to restore credit: there was a great arrear due; all funds had proved deficient, and the total failing of the Land bank had brought a great confusion on all payments: the arrears were put upon the funds of the revenue, which had been granted for a term of but five years, and that was now ending; so a new continuance of those revenues was granted, and they were put under the management of the bank of England, which, upon that security, undertook the payment of them all. It was long before all this was fully settled: the bank was not willing to engage in it, yet at last it was agreed, and the bank quickly recovered its credit so entirely, that there was no discount upon the notes. The arrear amounted to ten millions, and five millions more were to be raised for the charge of the following year; so that one session was to secure fifteen millions, a sum never before thought possible to be provided for in any one session. There was not specie enough for giving that quick circulation which is necessary for trade; so to remedy that, the treasury was empowered to give out notes to the value of almost three millions, which were to circulate as a species of money, and to be received in taxes, and were to sink gradually, as the money should arise out of the fund that was created to answer them; by these methods all the demands, both for arrears and for the following year, were answered. The commons sent a bill to the lords, limiting elections to future parliaments, that none should be chosen but those who had such a proportion of estate or money: the lords rejected it: they thought it reasonable to leave the nation to their freedom in choosing their representatives in parliament. It seemed both unjust and cruel, that if a poor man had so fair a reputation as to be chosen, notwithstanding his poverty, by those who were willing to pay him wages, that he should be branded with an incapacity because of his small estate. Corruption in elections was to be apprehended from the rich rather than from the poor. Another bill was sent up by the commons, but rejected by the lords, prohibiting the importation of all East India silks and Bengala. This was proposed to encourage the silk manufacture at home, and petitions were brought for it by great multitudes, in a very tumultuary way; but the lords had no regard to that.

The great business of this session that held longest in both houses, was a bill relating to sir John Fenwick. The thing was of so particular a nature that it deserves to be related in a special manner; and the great share that I bore in the debate when it was in the house of lords, makes it more necessary for me copiously to enlarge upon it; for it may at first view seem very liable to exception, that a man of my profession should enter so far into a debate of that nature. Fenwick, when he was first taken, wrote a letter to his lady, setting forth his misfortune, and giving himself for dead unless powerful applications could be made for him, or that some of the jury could be hired to starve out the rest; and to that he added, "This, or nothing, can save my life." This letter was taken from the person to whom he had given it. At his first examination before the lords justices, he denied every thing, till he was shewed this letter, and then he was confounded. In his private treaty with the duke of Devonshire, he desired an assurance of life upon his promise to tell all he knew; but the king refused that, and would have it left to himself to judge of the truth and the importance of the discoveries he should make: so he, resolving to cast himself on the king's mercy, sent him a paper, in which after a bare account of the consultations among the jacobites (in which he took care to charge none of his own party) he said that king James and those who were employed by him, had assured them, that both the earls of Shrewsbury and Marlborough, the lord Godolphin and admiral Russel, were reconciled to him, and were now in his interests and acting for him*. This was a discovery that could signify

* The magnanimous conduct of the king upon this occasion is fully related in the "Shrewsbury Correspondence." He inclosed the calumniating paper to the duke of Shrewsbury, adding, "you are, I trust, too fully convinced of the entire confidence I place in you, to imagine that such an accusation has made any impression on me; if it had I should not have sent you this paper. You will observe the sincerity of this honest man, who only accuses those in my service, and not one of his own party."

The innocence of the duke was fully proved, and it is further shewn by the letter he wrote to the king upon the first information of sir John Fenwick's capture, and before he had brought charges against the duke. In this letter he expresses his conviction that, by proper management, sir John might be brought to give important information. This was not the conduct of a man conscious of his own guilt.

nothing but to give the king a jealousy of those persons; for he did not offer the least shadow or circumstance, either of proof or of presumption, to support this accusation. The king not being satisfied herewith, sent an order for bringing him to a trial, unless he made fuller discoveries: he desired to be further examined by the lords justices, to whom he, being upon oath, told some more particulars; but he took care to name none of his own side but those against whom evidence was already brought, or who were safe and beyond sea; some few others he named, who were in matters of less consequence that did not amount to high treason; he owned a thread of negotiations, that had passed between them and king James, or the court of France; he said the earl of Aylesbury had gone over to France, and had been admitted to a private audience of the French king, where he had proposed the sending over an army of thirty thousand men, and had undertaken that a great body of gentlemen and horses should be brought to join them. It appeared by his discoveries, that the jacobites in England were much divided: some were called compounders, and others noncompounders. The first sort desired securities from king James for the preservation of the religion and liberties of England; whereas the second sort were for trusting him upon discretion without asking any terms, putting all in his power, and relying entirely on his honour and generosity. These seemed indeed to act more suitably to the great principle upon which they all insisted, that kings have their power from God, and are accountable only to him for the exercise of it. Dr. Lloyd, the deprived bishop of Norwich, was the only eminent clergyman that went into this; and therefore all that party had, upon Sancroft's death, recommended him to king James to have his nomination for Canterbury.

Fenwick put all this in writing, upon assurance, that he should not be forced to witness any part of it. When that was sent to the king, all appearing to be so trifling, and no other proof being offered for any part of it, except his own word, which he had stipulated should not be made use of, his majesty sent an order to bring him to his trial; but as the king was slow in sending this order, so the duke of Devonshire, who had been in the secret management of the matter, was for some time in the country: the lords justices delayed the matter till he came to town; and then the king's coming was so near, that it was respited till he came over. By these delays, Fenwick gained his main design in them, which was to practise upon the witnesses.

His lady began with Porter; he was offered, that if he would go beyond sea, he should have a good sum in hand, and an annuity secured to him for his life; he hearkened so far to the proposition, that he drew those who were in treaty with him, together with the lady herself, who carried the sum that he was to receive, to a meeting, where he had provided witnesses, who should over-hear all that passed, and should, upon a signal, come in, and seize them with the money: which was done, and a prosecution upon it was ordered. The practice was fully proved, and the persons concerned in it were censured, and punished; so Porter was no more to be dealt with. Goodman was the other witness: first they gathered matter to defame him, in which his wicked course of life furnished them very copiously; but they trusted not to this method, and betook themselves to another, in which they prevailed more effectually; they persuaded him to go out of England: and by this means, when the last orders were given for Fenwick's trial, there were not two witnesses against him; so by the course of law, he must have been acquitted: the whole was upon this kept entire for the session of parliament. The king sent to the house of commons the two papers that Fenwick had sent him. Fenwick was brought before the house; but he refused to give any farther account of the matter contained in them; so they rejected them as false and scandalous, made only to create jealousies. And they ordered a bill of attainder to be brought against Fenwick, which met with great opposition in both houses, in every step that was made. The debates were the hottest, and held the longest, of any that I ever knew. The lords took a very extraordinary method to force all their absent members to come up; they sent messengers for them to bring them up, which seemed to be a great breach on their dignity; for the privilege of making a proxy was an undoubted right belonging to their peerage; but those who intended to throw out the bill, resolved to have a full house. The bill set forth the artifices Fenwick had used to gain delays; and the practice upon Porter, and Goodman's escape, the last having sworn treason against him at Cook's trial, and likewise to the grand jury, who had found the bill against him upon that evidence. So now Porter appearing, and giving his evidence against him, and the evidence that Goodman had given being proved, it was inferred that he was guilty of high treason, and that therefore he ought to be attainted.

The substance of the arguments brought against this way of proceeding, was, that the law was all men's security, as well as it ought to be their rule: if this was once broke through, no man was safe; men would be presumed guilty without legal proofs, and be run down, and destroyed by a torrent: two witnesses seemed necessary, by an indisputable law of justice, to prove a man guilty; the law of God, given to Moses, as well as the law of England, made this necessary; and, besides all former ones, the law lately made for trials in cases of treason, was such a sacred one, that it was to be hoped that even a parliament would not make a breach upon it. A written deposition was no evidence, because the person accused could not have the benefit of cross interrogating the witness, by which much false swearing was often detected: nor could the evidence given in one trial be brought against a man who was not a party in that trial: the evidence that was offered to a grand jury was to be examined all over again at the trial; till that was done, it was not evidence. It did not appear that Fenwick himself was concerned in the practice upon Porter; what his lady did could not be charged on him; no evidence was brought that Goodman was practised on; so his withdrawing himself could not be charged on Fenwick. Some very black things were proved against Goodman, which would be strong to set aside his testimony, though he were present; and that proof, which had been brought in Cook's trial against Porter's evidence, was again made use of, to prove that as he was the single witness, so he was a doubtful and suspected one: nor was it proper that a bill of this nature should begin in the house of commons, which could not take examinations upon oath. This was the substance of the arguments that were urged against the bill.

On the other hand it was said, in behalf of the bill, that the nature of government required that the legislature should be recurred to, in extraordinary cases, for which effectual provision could not be made by fixed and standing laws: our common law grew up out of the proceedings of the courts of law; afterwards, this, in cases of treason, was thought too loose: so the law in this point was limited, first by the famous statute in king Edward the Third's time, and then by the statute in king Edward the Sixth's time; the two witnesses were to be brought face to face with the person accused: and that the law, lately made, had brought the method of trials to a yet further certainty, yet in that, as well as in the statute of Edward III., parliamentary proceedings were still excepted; and indeed, though no such provision had been expressly made in the acts themselves, the nature of government puts always an exception in favour of the legislative authority. The legislature was indeed bound to observe justice and equity, as much, if not more, than the inferior courts; because the supreme court ought to set an example to all others; but they might see cause to pass over forms, as occasion should require; this was the more reasonable among us, because there was no nation in the world besides England, that had not recourse to torture, when the evidence was probable but defective; that was a mighty restraint, and struck a terror into all people; and the freest governments, both ancient and modern, thought they could not subsist without it. At present, the Venetians have their civil inquisitors, and the Grisons have their high courts of justice, which act without the forms of law, by the absolute trust that is reposed in them, such as the Romans reposed in dictators, in the time of their liberty. England had neither torture nor any unlimited magistrate in its constitution; and therefore, upon great emergencies, recourse must be had to the supreme legislature. Forms are necessary in subordinate courts, but there is no reason to tie up the supreme one by them: this method of attainder had been practised among us at all times; it is true what was done in this way at one time was often reversed at another; but that was the effect of the violence of the times, and was occasioned often by the injustice of those attainders; the judgments of the inferior courts were upon the like account often reversed; but when parliamentary attainders went upon good grounds, though without observing the forms of law, they were never blamed, not to say condemned. When poisoning was first practised in England, and put in a pot of porridge in the bishop of Rochester's house, this, which was only felony, was by a special law made to be high treason ; and a new punishment was appointed by act of parliament ; the poisoner was boiled alive. When the nun of Kent pretended to visions, to oppose king Henry the Eighth's divorce, and his second marriage, and said, if he married again, he should not live long after it, but should die a villain's death ; this was judged in parliament to be high treason ; and she and her accomplices suffered accordingly. After that, there passed many attainders in that reign, only upon depositions, that were read in both houses of parliament : it is true these were much blamed, and there was great cause for it ; there were too many of them ; for this extreme way of proceeding is to be put in practice but seldom, and upon great occasions ; whereas many of these went upon slight grounds, such as the uttering some passionate and indecent words, or the using some embroidery in garments and coats of arms, with an ill intent. But that which was indeed execrable, was, that persons in prison were attainted, without being heard in their own defence ; this was so contrary to natural justice, that it could not be enough condemned. In king Edward the Sixth's time, the lord Seymour was attainted in the same manner, only with this difference, that the witnesses were brought to the bar, and there examined ; whereas, formerly, they proceeded upon some depositions that were read to them : at the duke of Somerset's trial, which was both for high treason and for felony, in which he was acquitted of the former, but found guilty of the latter, depositions were only read against him ; but the witnesses were not brought face to face, as he pressed they might be : upon which it was, that the following parliament enacted, that the accusers (that is the witnesses) should be examined face to face, if they were alive. In queen Elizabeth's time, the parliament went out of the method of law, in all the steps of their proceedings against the queen of Scots : it is true there were no parliamentary attainders in England during that long and glorious reign, upon which those who opposed the bill insisted much ; yet that was only, because there then was no occasion here in England for any such bill ; but in Ireland, where some things were notoriously true, which yet could not be legally proved, that government was forced to have, on many different occasions, recourse to this method. In king James the First's time, those who were concerned in the gunpowder plot, and chose to be killed, rather than taken, were by act of parliament attainted after their death ; which the courts of law could not do, since by our law, a man's crimes die with himself ; for this reason, because he cannot make his own defence, nor can his children do it for him. The famous attainder of the earl of Strafford, in king Charles the First's time, has been much and justly censured ; not so much because it passed by bill, as because of the injustice of it : he was accused for having said, upon the house of commons refusing to grant the subsidies, the king had asked, " That the king was absolved from all the rules of government, and might make use of force to subdue this kingdom." These words were proved only by one witness, all the rest of the council who were present, deposing, that they remembered no such words, and were positive, that the debate ran only upon the war with Scotland ; so that though " this kingdom," singly taken, must be meant of England, yet it might well be meant of " that kingdom," which was the subject then of the debate ; since then the words were capable of that favourable sense, and that both he who spoke them, and they who heard them, affirmed that they were meant and understood in that sense, it was a most pernicious precedent, first to take them in the most odious sense possible, and then to destroy him who said them, upon the testimony of one single, exceptionable witness ; whereas, if, upon the commons refusing to grant the king's demand, he had plainly advised the king to subdue his people by force, it is hard to tell what the parliament might not justly have done, or would not do again in the like case. In king Charles the Second's time, some of the most eminent of the regicides were attainted, after they were dead ; and in king James's time, the duke of Monmouth was attainted by bill : these last attainders had their first beginning in the house of commons. Thus it appeared, that these last two hundred years, not to mention much ancienter precedents, the nation had upon extraordinary occasions proceeded in this parliamentary way by bill. There were already many precedents of this method ; and whereas it was said, that an ill parliament might carry these too far, it is certain the nation, and every person in it, must be safe, when they are in their own hands, or in those of a representative chosen by themselves ; as, on the other hand, if that be ill chosen, there is no help for it ; the nation must perish, for it is by their own fault ; they have already too many precedents for this way of proceeding, if they intend to make an ill use of them ; but a precedent is only a ground or warrant for the like proceeding, upon the like occasion.

Two rules were laid down for all bills of this nature ; first, that the matter be of a very extraordinary nature : lesser crimes had better be passed over than punished by the legislature. Of all the crimes that can be contrived against the nation, certainly the most heinous one is, that of bringing in a foreign force to conquer us ; this ruins both us and our posterity for ever : distractions at home, how fatal soever, even though they should end ever so tragically, as ours once did in the murder of the king, and in a military usurpation, yet were capable of a crisis and a cure. In the year 1660, we came again to our wits, and all was set right again ; whereas there is no prospect after a foreign conquest, but of slavery and misery ; and how black soever the assassinating the king must needs appear, yet a foreign conquest was worse, it was assassinating the kingdom ; and therefore the inviting and contriving that must be the blackest of crimes. But, as the importance of the matter ought to be equal to such an unusual way of proceeding, so the certainty of the facts ought to be such, that if the defects in legal proof are to be supplied, yet this ought to be done upon such grounds as make the fact charged appear so evidently true, that though a court of law could not proceed upon it, yet no man could raise in himself a doubt concerning it. Anciently, treason was judged, as felony still is, upon such presumptions as satisfied the jury ; the law has now limited this to two witnesses brought face to face ; but the parliament may still take that liberty which is denied to inferior courts, of judging this matter as an ordinary jury does in a case of felony. In the present case, there was one witness, vizâ voce, upon whose testimony several persons had been condemned, and had suffered ; and these neither at their trial, nor at their death, disproved, or denied, any circumstance of his depositions. If he had been too much a libertine in the course of his life, that did not destroy his credit as a witness : in the first trial this might have made him a doubtful witness, but what had happened since had destroyed the possibility even of suspecting his evidence ; a party had been in interest concerned to enquire into his whole life, and in the present case had full time for it ; and every circumstance of his deposition had been examined, and yet nothing was discovered that could so much as create a doubt ; all was still untouched, sound and true. The only circumstance in which the dying speeches of those who suffered on his evidence, seemed to contradict him, was concerning king James's commission ; yet none of them denied really what Porter had deposed, which was, that Charnock told him, that there was a commission come from king James, for attacking the prince of Orange's guards : they only denied that there was a commission for assassinating him. Sir John Friend, and sir William Perkins, were condemned for the consultation now given in evidence against Fenwick : they died, not denying it ; on the contrary, they justified all they had done. It could not be supposed that, if there had been a tittle in the evidence that was false, they should both have been so far wanting to themselves, and to their friends, who were to be tried upon the same evidence, as not to have declared it in the solemnest manner : these things were more undeniably certain than the evidence of ten witnesses could possibly be. Witnesses might conspire to swear a falsehood ; but in this case, the circumstances took away the possibility of a doubt. And therefore the parliament, without taking any notice of Goodman's evidence, might well judge Fenwick guilty, for no man could doubt of it in his own mind.

The ancient Romans were very jealous of their liberty ; but how exact soever they might be in ordinary cases, yet when any of their citizens seemed to have a design of making himself king, they either created a dictator to suppress or destroy him, or else the people proceeded against him in a summary way. By the Portian law, no citizen could be put to death for any crime whatsoever ; yet such regard did the Romans pay to justice, even above law, that, when the Campanian legion had perfidiously broken in upon Rhegium, and pillaged it, they put them all to death for it. In the famous case of Catiline's conspiracy, as the evidence was clear, and the danger extreme, the accomplices in it were executed, notwithstanding the Portian law ; and this was done by the order of the senate, without either hearing them make their own defence, or admitting them to claim the right, which the Valorian law gave them, of an appeal to the people. Yet that whole proceeding was chiefly directed by the two greatest asserters of public liberty that ever lived, Cato and Cicero; and Cæsar, who opposed it, on pretence of its being against the Portian law, was for that reason suspected of being in the conspiracy: it appeared afterwards, how little regard he had, either to law or liberty, though, upon this occasion, he made use of the one to protect those who were in a plot against the other. This expression was much resented by those who were against this bill, as carrying a bitter reflection upon them for opposing it.

In conclusion, the bill passed by a small majority of only seven in the house of lords; the royal assent was soon given to it. Fenwick then made all possible applications to the king for a reprieve; and as a main ground for that, and as an article of merit, related how he had saved the king's life, two years before, as was already told in the beginning of the year 1695. But as this fact could not be proved, so it could confer no obligation on the king, since he had given him no warning of his danger; and according to his own story, had trusted the conspirators' words very easily when they promised to pursue their design no farther, which he had no reason to do. So that this pretension was not much considered; but he was pressed to make a full discovery; and for some days he seemed to be in some suspense what course to take. He desired to be secured, that nothing which he confessed should turn to his own prejudice. The house of lords sent an address to the king, entreating that they might be at liberty to make him this promise; and that was readily granted. He then farther desired, that, upon his making a full confession, he might be assured of a pardon without being obliged to become a witness against any other person: to this the lords answered, that he had to do with men of honour, and that he must trust to their discretion; that they would mediate for him with the king, in proportion as they should find his discoveries sincere and important: his behaviour to the king hitherto had not been such as to induce the lords to trust to his candour; it was much more reasonable that he should trust to them. Upon this all hopes of any discoveries from him were laid aside: but a matter of another nature broke out, which, but for its singular circumstances, scarcely deserves to be mentioned.

There was one Smith, a nephew of sir William Perkins, who had for some time been in treaty at the duke of Shrewsbury's office, pretending that he could make great discoveries, and that he knew all the motions and designs of the jacobites: he sent many dark and ambiguous letters to that duke's under secretary, which were more properly to be called amusements than discoveries; for he only gave hints and scraps of stories; but he had got a promise not to be made a witness, and yet he never offered any other witness, nor told where any of those he informed against were lodged, or how they might be taken. He was always asking more money, and bragging what he could do, if he were well supplied, and he seemed to think he never had enough. Indeed, before the conspiracy broke out, he had given such hints, that when it was discovered, it appeared he must have known much more of it than he thought fit to tell. One letter he wrote, two days before it was intended to have been put in execution, shewed, he must have been let into the secret very far (if this was not an artifice to lay the court more asleep), for he said, that as things ripened and came near execution, he should certainly know them better. It was not improbable that he himself was one of the five, whom Perkins undertook to furnish, for assisting in the assassination; and that he hoped to have saved himself by this pretended discovery, in case the plot miscarried. The duke of Shrewsbury acquainted the king with his discoveries, but nothing could then be made either of them or of him. When the whole plot was unravelled, it then was manifest from his letters, that he must have known more of it than he would own: but he still claimed the promise before made him, that he should not be a witness. Upon the whole, therefore, he rather deserved a severe punishment than any of those rewards which he pretended to. He was accordingly dismissed by the duke of Shrewsbury, who thought that even this suspicious behaviour of his did not release him from keeping the promises he had made him. Smith, thereupon, went to the earl of Monmouth, and possessed him with bad impressions of the duke of Shrewsbury, and found him much inclined to entertain them; he told him that he had made great discoveries, of which that duke would take no notice; and because the duke's ill health had obliged him to go into the country two days before the assassination was intended, he put this construction upon it, that he was willing to be out of the way when the king was to be murdered. To fix this imputation, he shewed him the copies of all his letters, all of which, but the last more especially, had the face of a great discovery. The lord Monmouth carried this to court, and it made such an impression there, that the earl of Portland sent Smith money, and entertained him as a spy, but never could by his means learn any one real piece of intelligence. When this happened, the king was just going beyond sea; so Smith's letters were taken, and sealed up by the king's order, and left in the hands of sir William Trumball, who was the other secretary of state. This matter lay quiet till Fenwick began to make discoveries: and when lord Monmouth understood that he had not named himself (about which he expressed too vehement a concern) but that he had named lord Shrewsbury, it was said, that he entered into a negotiation with the duchess of Norfolk, that she should, by Fenwick's lady, encourage him to persist in his discoveries; and that he dictated some papers to the duchess that should be offered to him as an additional one, in which many little stories were related which had been told the king, and might be believed by him; and by these the king might have been disposed to believe the rest of Fenwick's paper: and the whole ended in some discoveries concerning Smith, which would naturally occasion his letters to be called for, and then they would probably have had great effect. The duchess of Norfolk declared, that he had dictated all these schemes of his to her, who copied them, and handed them to Fenwick; and that he had left one paper with her; it was short, but contained an abstract of the whole design, and referred to a larger one, which he had only dictated to her. The duchess said, she had placed a gentlewoman, who carried her messages to Fenwick's lady, to over-hear all that passed; so that she both had another witness to support the truth of what she related, and a paper left by him with her. She said that Fenwick would not be guided by him; and said, he would not meddle with contrived discoveries; that thereupon this lord was highly provoked: he said, if Fenwick would follow his advice, he would certainly save him; but if he would not, he would get the bill to pass. And, indeed, when that matter was depending, he spoke two full hours in the house of lords, in favour of the bill, with a peculiar vehemence. Fenwick's lady being much provoked at this, got her nephew, the earl of Carlisle, to move the lords, that Fenwick might be examined, concerning any advices that had been sent him, with relation to his discoveries: and upon this, Fenwick told what his lady had brought him, and thereupon the duchess of Norfolk and her confidant were likewise interrogated, and gave the account which I have here related: in conclusion, Smith's letters were read, and he himself was examined. This held the lords several days; for the earl of Portland, by the king's orders, produced all Smith's papers. By them it appeared, that he was a very insignificant spy, who was always insisting in his old strain of asking money, and taking no care to deserve it. The earl of Monmouth was, upon the accusation and evidence above-mentioned, sent to the Tower, and turned out of all his employments: but the court had no mind to have the matter farther examined into; for the king spoke to myself to do all I could to soften his censure, which he afterwards acknowledged I had done. I did not know what new scheme of confusion might have been opened by him in his own excuse. The house of lords was much set against him, and seemed resolved to go great lengths. To allay that heat, I put them in mind, that he set the revolution first on foot, and was a great promoter of it, coming twice over to Holland to that end: I then moved, that he should be sent to the Tower; this was agreed to, and he lay there till the end of the session, and was removed from all his places; but that loss, as was believed, was secretly made up to him, for the court was resolved not to lose him quite.

Fenwick seeing no hope was left, prepared himself to die; he desired the assistance of one of the deprived bishops, which was not easily granted; but in that, and in several other matters, I did him such service, that he wrote me a letter of thanks upon it. He was beheaded on Tower Hill, and died very composed, in a much better temper than was to be expected; for his life had been very irregular. At the place of his execution, he delivered a paper in writing, wherein he did not deny the facts that had been sworn against him; but complained of the injustice of the procedure, and left his thanks to those who had voted against the bill. He owned his loyalty to king James, and to the prince of Wales after the attempt on which they had raised great expectations, and to which many undertakers had been drawn in. Our squadron was much superior to theirs, yet never engaged them; once indeed they came up to the French, and had some advantage over them; but did not pursue it. The French sailed to the north towards Newfoundland, where we had another squadron lying, which was sent with some land forces to recover Hudson's bay. These ships might have fallen upon the French, and would probably have mastered them; but as they had no certain account of their strength, so being sent out upon another service, they did not think it proper to hazard the attacking them. So the French got safe home, and the conduct of our affairs at sea was much censured; yet our admiralty declared themselves satisfied with the account the commanders gave of their proceedings. But that board was accused of much partiality; on all such occasions, the unfortunate must expect to be blamed: and, to outward appearance, there was much room given either to censure the orders, or the execution of them. The king owned he did not understand those matters; and Russel, now made earl of Orford, had both the admiralty and the navy board in a great dependence on himself, so that he was considered almost as much as if he had been lord high admiral. He was too much in the power of those in whom he confided, and trusted them too far; and it was generally believed that there was much corruption, as it was certain there was much faction, if not treachery, in the conduct of our marine. Our miscarriages made all people cry that we must have a peace, for we could not manage the war to any good purpose; since, notwithstanding our great superiority at sea, the French conducted their matters so much better than us, that we were losers, even on that element where we used to triumph most. Our squadron, in the bay of Mexico, did very little service; they only robbed and destroyed some of the French colonies: and that sent to Hudson's bay found it quite abandoned by the French, so that both returned home inglorious.

A great change of affairs happened this year in Poland; their king, John Sobieski, after he had long outlived the fame he had got by raising the siege of Vienna, died at last under a general contempt. He was going backwards and forwards, as his queen's negotiations in the court of France were entertained, or rejected. His government was so feeble and disjointed at home, that all their diets broke up upon preliminaries, before they could, according to their forms, enter upon business: he was set on heaping up wealth, which seemed necessary to give his son an interest in the succeeding election. And, upon his death, a great party appeared for him, notwithstanding the general aversion to the mother; but the Polish nobility resolved to make no haste with their election; they plainly set the crown to sale, and encouraged all candidates that would bid for it. One party declared for the prince of Conti, of which their primate, then a cardinal, was the head. The emperor did all he could to support the late king's son; but when he saw the French party were too strong for him, he was willing to join with any other pretender.

The duke of Lorrain, the prince of Baden, and Don Livio Odeschalchi, pope Innocent's nephew, were all named; but these not being likely to succeed, a negotiation was secretly managed with the elector of Saxony, which succeeded so well, that he was prevailed on to change his religion, to advance his troops towards the frontier of Poland, to distribute eight millions of florins among the Poles, and to promise to confirm all their privileges, and in particular to undertake the siege of Caminieck. He consented to all this, and declared himself a candidate a very few days before the election: and so he was set up by the imperialists in opposition to the French party; his party became quickly so strong, that though upon the first appearance at the election, while every one of the competitors was trying his strength, the French party was the strongest, and was so declared by the cardinal; yet when the other pretenders saw that they could not carry the election for themselves, they united in opposition to the French interest, and gave over all their voices to the elector of Saxony, by which his party became much the strongest: so he was proclaimed the elected king. The cardinal gave notice to the court of France of what had been done in favour of the prince of Conti; and desired that he might be sent quickly thither, well furnished with arms and ammunition, but chiefly with money. But the party for Saxony made more dispatch; that elector lay nearer, and had both his money and troops ready, so he took the oaths that were required, and got the change of his religion to be attested by the imperial court: he made all the haste he could with his army to Cracow, and he was soon after crowned, to the great joy of the imperial party; but the inexpressible trouble of all his subjects in Saxony.

The secular men there saw, that the supporting this elective crown would ruin his hereditary dominions; and those, who laid the concerns of the protestant religion to heart, were much more troubled, when they saw that house, under whose protection their religion grew up at first, now fall off to popery. It is true, the present family, ever since Maurice's time, had showed very little zeal in that cause. The elected king had so small a share of religion in himself, that little was to be expected from him, nor was it much apprehended that he would become a bigot, or turn a persecutor; but such was the eagerness of the popish clergy towards the suppressing what they call heresy, and the perpetual jealousies with which therefore they would possess the Poles, were likely to be such, in case he used no violence towards his Saxon subjects, as possibly might have great effects on him: so that it is no wonder if they were struck with a general consternation upon his revolt. His electoress, though a very young person, descended of the house of Brandenburg, expressed so extraordinary a measure of zeal and piety upon this occasion, that it contributed much to the present quieting of their fears. The new king sent a popish stadtholder to Dresden; but so weak a man, that there was no reason to apprehend much from any conduct of his. He also sent them all the assurances that could be given in words, that he would make no change among them, nor has he hitherto made any steps towards it.

A very unusual accident happened at this time, that served not a little to his quiet establishment on the throne of Poland. The czar was so sensible of the defects of his education, that, in order to the correcting these, he resolved to go a little into the world for better information. He was forming great designs; he intended to make a navigable canal between the Volga and the Tanaïs, by which he might carry both materials and provisions for a fleet to Azoph; and when that communication was opened, he apprehended great things might be done afterwards. He therefore intended to see the fleets of Holland and England, and to make himself as much master of that matter as his genius could rise up to. He sent an embassy to Holland to regulate some matters of commerce, and to see if they would assist him in the war he was designing against the Turks. When the ambassadors were set out, he settled his affairs in such hands, as he trusted most to, and with a small retinue of two or three servants, he secretly followed his ambassadors, and quickly overtook them. He discovered himself first to the elector of Brandenburg, who was then in Prussia, looking on the dispute that was likely to arise in Poland, in which, if a war should follow, he might be forced to have a share. The czar concerned himself much in the matter, not only by reason of the neighbourhood, but because he feared that, if the French party should prevail, France being in alliance with the Turks, a king sent from thence would probably not only make a peace with the Turks, but turn his arms against himself, which would hinder all his designs for a great fleet. The French party was strongest in Lithuania; therefore the czar sent orders to his generals to bring a great army to the frontier of that duchy, to be ready to break into it, if a war should begin in Poland: and we were told that the terror of this had a great effect. From Prussia, the czar went into Holland, and thence came over to England; therefore I will refer all that I shall say concerning him to the time of his leaving England*.

A fleet was ordered, at Dunkirk, to carry the prince of Conti to Poland. A squadron of ours, that lay before that port, kept him in for some time; at last he got out, and sailed to

* This was Peter Michaelowitz, known as Peter the Great, czar of Russia. He was born in 1672, so that at the time he heroically resolved to submit to the privations he necessarily must undergo in making himself practically acquainted with naval architecture, he was but 24 years old. His whole life was spent in efforts that he considered would benefit his country. He entered the army as a common soldier, and performed the duties of every grade, until he attained the command of a body of troops, personally exhibiting his conviction of the necessity of submitting to discipline. In Holland he laboured as a common shipwright in the dockyard; and then came and worked in a similar capacity in England for four months. Called home suddenly to repress an insurrection, after effecting this, he addressed himself to national improvements, founding schools, colleges, libraries, printing-presses, an observatory, &c. He died in 1725, and was succeeded by his wife, the celebrated czarina Catherine, who had been the not very virtuous daughter of a Livonian peasant. (Voltaire's Life of Peter the Great. Touke's View of Russia, &c.)

Dantzic; but that city had declared for the new king, so they would not suffer him to land, with all those that had come with him. They only consented to suffer himself to land, with a small retinue; this he thought would not become him, so he landed at Marienbourg, where he was met by some of the chief of his party. They pressed him to distribute the money that he had brought from France, among them, and promised to return quickly to him with a great force; but he was limited by his instructions, and would see a good force before he would part with his treasure. The new king sent some troops to disperse those, who were coming together to serve him, and these had once almost seized on the prince himself; but he acted after that with great caution, and would not trust the Poles. He saw no appearance of any force likely to be brought to him equal to the undertaking, and fearing lest, if he stayed too long, he should be frozen up in the Baltic, he came back to Dunkirk. The cardinal stood out still: the court of Rome rejoiced at the pretended conversion of the new king, and owned him; but he quickly saw such a scene of difficulties, that he had reason to repent his embarking himself in such a dangerous undertaking. This may prove of such importance, both to the political and religious concerns of Europe, that I thought it deserved that a particular mention should be made of it, though it lies at a great distance from us. It had some influence in disposing the French now to be more earnest for a peace; for if they had got a king of Poland in their dependence, that would have given them a great interest in the northern parts, with an easier access, both to assist the Turks and the malcontents in Hungary.

The negotiation for a peace was held at Ryswick, a house of the king's, between the Hague and Delft. The chief of our plenipotentiaries was the earl of Pembroke, a man of eminent virtue, and of great and profound learning, particularly in the mathematics. This made him a little too speculative and abstracted in his notions: he had great application; but he lived a little too much out of the world, though in a public station: a little more practice among men would have given him the last finishing. There was somewhat in his person and manner, that created him an universal respect: for we had no man among us whom all sides loved and honoured so much as they did him: there were two others joined with him in that embassy*.

The king of Sweden was received as mediator; but he died before any progress was made in the treaty: his son, who succeeded him in his throne, was also received to succeed him in the mediation. The father was a rough and boisterous man; he loved fatigue, and was free from vice; he reduced his kingdom to a military state, and was ever going round it to see how his troops were ordered, and his discipline observed; he looked narrowly into the whole administration: he had quite altered the constitution of his kingdom. It was formerly changed from being an elective, to be an hereditary, kingdom; yet, till his time, it had continued to be rather an aristocracy than a monarchy. But he got the power of the senators to be quite taken away, so that it was left free to him to make use of such councillors as he should choose. The senators had enriched themselves, and oppressed the people;

* Thomas Herbert, earl of Pembroke, was intended to practise at the bar; but the death of his elder brother precluded the necessity. His rank and fortune gave him great advantages; but it was his merit established him. A mind well furnished is seldom confined to one kind of excellence. Lord Pembroke had many. William sent him ambassador extraordinary to the states general, named him of his privy council, made him colonel of a regiment of marines, first commissioner of the admiralty, lord privy seal, first plenipotentiary of the treaty of Ryswick, knight of the garter, lord high admiral of England and Ireland, president of the council, and seven times lord justice during his absence on the continent. Queen Anne, George the First, and George the Second, continued to employ him in various offices. By all these sovereigns he was highly valued. Able in the cabinet, circumspect in negotiations, shining in the senate, dignified as vice-regent, yet equally pre-eminent in retirement. His learning made him a fit companion for the literati; fond of ancient history, he raised a collection of antiques that were unrivalled by any private collector. Wilton will ever be a monument of his extensive knowledge, and the princely presents it contains, of the high estimation in which he was held by foreign potentates, as well as the many monarchs he saw and served at home. He lived rather as a primitive christian, in his behaviour meek, in his dress plain, rather retired, conversing but little.—(Noble's Continuation of Oranger.)

Edward Villiers, first earl of Jersey, held at several times the various appointments of master of the horse to the queen, one of the lord's justices of Ireland, ambassador to the states general and to France, and lord chamberlain of the household, dying the very day he was appointed to the office of lord privy seal in 1711. Letters of this nobleman, during the negotiation of the peace of Ryswick, are numerous in the "Shrewsbury Correspondence." Contemporary authorities agree in considering him a very cool-headed, talented, man.

they had devoured the revenues of the crown; and in two reigns, in which the sovereign was long in a state of infancy, both in queen Christina's and in this king's time, the senators had taken care of themselves, and had stripped the crown. So the king moved for a general resumption, and this he obtained easily of the states, who, as they envied the wealth of the senators, so they hoped that, by making the king rich, the people would be less charged with taxes. This was not all: he got likewise an act of revision, by which those who had grants were to account for the mean profits, and this was applied even to those who had grants upon valuable considerations; for when it appeared that the valuable consideration was satisfied, they were to account for all they had received over and above that, and to repay this, with the interest of the money at 12 per cent. for all the years they had enjoyed it. This brought a great debt on all the senators and other families of the kingdom; it did utterly ruin them, and left them at mercy: and when the king took from them all they had, he kept them still in a dependence upon him, giving them employments in the army or militia that he set up.

After that, he procured of the states of his kingdom an absolute authority to govern them as he thought fit, and according to law; but even this limitation seemed uneasy, and their slavery was finished by another act which he obtained, that he should not be obliged to govern by law, but by his mere will and pleasure. So successful was he, in the space of five years, to ruin all the families in his kingdom, and to destroy their laws and liberties, and that by their own consent. He died when his son was but fifteen years old, and gave great hopes of being an active, warlike, and indefatigable prince, which his reign ever since has demonstrated to the world*.

The first act of his reign was the mediation at Ryswick †, where the treaty went on but slowly, till Harlai, the first of the French plenipotentiaries, came to the Hague, who, as was believed, had the secret. He showed a fairer inclination than had appeared in the others, to treat frankly and honourably, and to clear all the difficulties that had been started before; but while they were negotiating, by exchanging papers, which was a slow method, subject to much delay and too many exceptions and evasions, the marshal Boufflers desired a conference with the earl of Portland, and by the order of their masters, they met four times, and were long alone. That lord told me himself, that the subject of those conferences was concerning king James. The king desired to know how the king of France intended to dispose of him, and how he could own him and yet support the other. The king of France would not renounce the protecting him, by any article of the treaty; but it was agreed between them, that the king of France should give him no assistance, nor give the king any disturbance on his account, and that he should retire from the court of France, either to Avignon, or to Italy. On the other hand, his queen should have fifty thousand pounds a year, which was her jointure, settled after his death, and that it should now be paid her, he being reckoned as dead to the nation; and in this the king very readily acquiesced: these meetings made the treaty go on with more dispatch, this tender point being once settled.

A new difficulty arose with relation to the empire. The French offered Brisach and Fribourg as an equivalent for Strasbourg: the court of Vienna consented to this, but the empire refused it. These places belonged to the emperor's hereditary dominions, whereas Strasbourg was a free city, as well as a protestant town; so the emperor was soon brought to accept of the exchange. All other matters were concerted. Spain was now as impatient of delays as France: England and the States had no other concern in the treaty but to secure their allies, and to settle a barrier in the Netherlands: so, in September, the treaty was signed by all except the German princes: but a set time was prefixed for them to come into it. The duke of Savoy was comprehended within it; and the princes of the empire, finding they could struggle no longer, did at last consent to it. A new piece of treachery against the protestant religion broke out in the conclusion of all: the French declared that that part of the palatinate which was stipulated to be restored in the state in which it was, by virtue of that article was to continue in the same state, with relation to religion, in which it was at that time : by this, several churches were to be condemned that otherwise, according to the laws of the empire, and in particular of those dominions, were to be restored to the protestants : the elector palatine accepted of the condition very willingly, being bigoted to a high degree : but some of the princes, the king of Sweden in particular, as duke of Deuxponts, refused to submit to it : but this had been secretly concerted among the whole popish party, who are always firm to the interest of their religion, and zealous for them ; whereas the protestant courts are too ready to sacrifice the common interest of their religion to their own private advantage. The king was troubled at this treacherous motion, but he saw no inclination in any of the allies to oppose it with the zeal with which it was pressed on the other hand. The importance of the thing, sixteen churches being only condemned by it, as the earl of Pembroke told me, was not such as to deserve he should venture a rupture upon it : and it was thought the elector palatine might, on other accounts, be so obnoxious to the protestants, and might need their assistance and protection so much, that he would be obliged afterwards to restore these churches thus wrested from them. So the king contented himself with ordering his plenipotentiaries to protest against this, which they did in a formal act that they passed.

The king by this peace concluded the great design of putting a stop to the progress of the French arms, which he had constantly pursued from his first appearance on the stage, in the year 1672. There was not one of the allies who complained that he had been forgotten by him, or wronged in the treaty : nor had the desire of having his title universally acknowledged raised any impatience in him, or made him run into this peace with any indecent haste. The terms of it were still too much to the advantage of France ; but the length and charge of the war had so exhausted the allies, that the king saw the necessity of accepting the best conditions that could be got. It is true, France was more harassed by the war, yet the arbitrary frame of that government made their king master of the whole wealth of his people : and the war was managed on both sides, between them and us, with this visible difference, that every man who dealt with the French king was ruined by it ; whereas, among us, every man grew rich by his dealings with the king : and it was not easy to see how this could be either prevented or punished. The regard that is shown to the members of parliament among us makes that few abuses can be enquired into or discovered : and the king found his reign grow so unacceptable to his people, by the continuance of the war, that he saw the necessity of coming to a peace. The States were under the same pressure ; they were heavier charged, and suffered more by the war than the English. The French got indeed nothing by a war which they had most perfidiously begun ; they were forced to return to the peace of Nimeguen : Pignerol and Brisach, which cardinal Richelieu had considered as the keys of Italy and Germany, were now parted with ; and all that base practice of claiming so much under the head of reunions and dependencies, was abandoned : the duchy of Lorraine was also entirely restored : it was generally thought that the king of France intended to live out the rest of his days in quiet ; for his parting with Barcelona made all people conclude that he did not intend to prosecute the dauphin's pretensions upon the crown of Spain, after that king's death, by a new war ; and that he would only try how to manage it by negotiation.

The most melancholy part of this treaty was, that no advantages were got by it in favour of the protestants in France : the French refugees made all possible applications to the king, and to the other protestant allies ; but as they were no part of the cause of the war, so it did not appear that the allies could do more for them than to recommend them, in the warmest manner, to the king of France : but he was so far engaged in a course of superstition and cruelty, that their condition became worse by the peace : the court was more at leisure to look after them, and to persecute them, than they thought fit to do during the war. The military men in France did generally complain of the peace as dishonourable and base. The jacobites among us were the more confounded at the news of it, because the court of France did, to the last minute, assure king James that they would never abandon his interests : and his queen sent over assurances to their party here, that England would be left out of the treaty, and put to maintain the war alone : of which they were so confident, that they entered into deep wagers upon it ; a practice little known among us before the war, but it was carried on, in the progress of it, to a very extravagant degree ; so that they were ruined in their fortunes, as well as sunk in their expectations, by the peace. It was said, king James's queen made a bold repartee to the French king, when he told her the peace was signed : she said she wished it might be such as should raise his glory as much as it might settle his repose*.

But while the peace was concluded in these parts, the war between the emperor and the Turks went on in Hungary. The imperial army was commanded by prince Eugene, a brother of the count of Soissons, who, apprehending that he was not likely to be so much considered as he thought he might deserve in France, went and served the emperor, and grew up in a few years to be one of the greatest generals of the age.

The grand seignior came to command his armies in person, and lay encamped on both sides of the Theisse, having laid a bridge over the river. Prince Eugene marched up to him and attacked his camp on the west side of the river, and, after a short dispute, he broke in and was master of the camp, and forced all who lay on that side over the river. In this action many were killed and drowned : he followed them across the Theisse, and gave them a total defeat : most of their janissaries were cut off, and the prince became master of all their artillery and magazines : the grand seignior himself narrowly escaped, with a body of horse, to Belgrade. This was a complete victory, and was the greatest blow the Turks had received in the whole war. At the same time the czar was very successful on his side against the Tartarians. The Venetians did little on their part, and the confusions in Poland made that republic but a feeble ally : so that the weight of the war lay wholly on the emperor. But though he, being now delivered from the war with France, was more at leisure to prosecute this, yet his revenue was so exhausted, that he was willing to suffer a treaty to be carried on by the mediation of England and Holland ; and the French, being now no longer concerned to engage the Porte to carry on the war, the grand seignior fearing a revolution upon his ill success, was very glad to hearken to a treaty, which was carried on all this winter, and was finished the next year at Carlowitz, from which place it takes its name.

By it both parties were to keep that of which they were then possessed ; and so this long war of Hungary, which had brought both sides by turns very near the last extremities, was concluded by the direction and mediation of the king of England : upon which I will add a curious observation, that though it may seem to be out of the laws of history, yet, considering my profession, will I hope be forgiven.

Dr. Lloyd, the present most learned bishop of Worcester, who has now for above twenty years been studying the Revelations with an amazing diligence and exactness, had long before this year said, the peace between the Turks and the papal Christians was certainly to be made in the year 1698, which he made out thus :—The four angels, mentioned in the fourteenth chapter of the Revelations, that were bound in the river Euphrates, which he expounds to be the captains of the Turkish forces, that till then were subject to the sultan at Babylon, were to be loosed, or freed from that yoke, and to set up for themselves : and these were prepared to slay the third part of men, for an hour, a day, a month, and a year. He reckons the year, in St. John, is the julian year of three hundred and sixty-five days, that is, in the prophetic style, each day a year ; a month is thirty of these days, and a day

* No English state measure of such importance as the peace of Ryswick was ever carried on whilst our chief officers of state were in comparative ignorance concerning the negotiations. The duke of Shrewsbury, writing to the earl of Jersey, then lord Villiers, says of the proceedings, "I am more ignorant than you can believe." The fact of so much secrecy being employed, even to those who in other respects were so much trusted, naturally causes a suspicion that some dirty, some disgraceful determinations were being concluded. It was unworthy of William and his protestant allies not to make some stipulations for the safety of the French huguenots ; it was a defalcation of honour on the part of Louis to acknowledge William as king of England, when he was pledged to support the cause of James : it was base of all parties to abandon the interests of the house of Austria. There is no doubt that the terms were in favour of France ; and were of such a nature, that the agreement was rather a cessation of hostilities than a peace. The "partition treaty," a part of this unworthy negotiation, was carried on similarly without consulting the English ministry ; and was detrimental to our interests, as well as the cause of future hostilities. By thus slighting his ministers, William incurred another annoyance, he lost their confidence, and eventually caused their secession from his service. The whole of these negotiations are unfolded and illustrated in the "Shrewsbury Correspondence." See also the article "Beutinck," in the Biographia Britannica.

makes one ; which, added to the former number, makes three hundred and ninety-six. Now he proves from historians that Ottoman came, and began his conquests at Prouse, in the 1302 ; to which the former number, in which they were to slay the third part of men, being added, it must end in the year 1698 : and though the historians do not mark the hour, or the twelfth part of the day, or year, which is a month, that is, the beginning of the destruction the Turks were to make, yet he is confident, if that is ever known, that the prophecy will be found, even in that, to be punctually accomplished. After this, he thinks their time of hurting the papal Christians is at an end ; they may indeed still do mischief to the Muscovites, or persecute their own Christian subjects, but they can do no hurt to the papalins ; and he is so positive in this, that he consents that all his scheme should be laid aside, if the Turks engage in a new war with them : and I must confess, that their refusing now, in a course of three years, to take any advantage from the troubles in Hungary, to begin the war again, though we know they have been much solicited to it, gives for the present a confirmation to this learned prelate's exposition of that part of the prophecy*.

The king came over to England about the middle of November, and was received by the city of London in a sort of triumph, with all the magnificence that he would admit. Some progress was made in preparing triumphal arches, but he put a stop to it ; he seemed, by a natural modesty, to have contracted an antipathy to all vain shows ; which was much increased in him by what he had heard of the gross excesses of flattery, to which the French have run beyond the examples of former ages, in honour of their king ; who having shown too great a pleasure in these, they have been so far pursued, that the wit of that nation has been for some years chiefly employed on these ; for they saw that men's fortunes were more certainly advanced by a new and lively invention in that way, than by any service or merit whatsoever. This, in which that king has seemed to be too much pleased, rendering him contemptible to better judges, gave the king such an aversion to every thing that looked that way, that he scarcely bore even with things that were decent and proper.

The king ordered many of his troops to be disbanded soon after the peace ; but a stop was put to that, because the French were very slow in evacuating the places that were to be restored by the treaty, and were not beginning to reduce their troops : so though the king declared what he intended to do, yet he made no haste to execute it, till it should appear how the French intended to govern themselves. The king thought it was absolutely necessary to keep up a considerable land force ; he knew the French would still maintain great armies, and that the pretended prince of Wales would certainly be assisted by them, if England should fall into a feeble and defenceless condition : the king of Spain was also in such an uncertain state of health, so weak, and so exhausted, that it seemed necessary that England should be in a condition to bar France's invading that empire, and to maintain the rights of the house of Austria. But though he explained himself thus in general to his ministers, yet he would not descend to particulars, to tell how many he thought necessary, so that they had not authority to declare what was the lowest number the king insisted on.

Papers were written on both sides, for and against a standing force ; on the one hand, it was pretended that a standing army was incompatible with public liberty, and according to the examples of former times, the one must swallow up the other. It was proposed that the militia might be better modelled, and more trained, which, with a good naval force, some thought would be an effectual security against foreign invasions, as well as it would maintain our laws and liberties at home. On the other side, it was urged, that since all our neighbours were armed, and the most formidable of them all kept up such a mighty force, nothing could give us a real security, but a good body of regular troops ; nothing could be made of the militia, chiefly of the horse, but at a vast charge ; and if it was well regulated

* Dr. Lloyd is stated by the earl of Dartmouth to have had very erroneous opinions in his old age, respecting the overthrow of papacy, and the approach of the millennium. In the year 1712, he told the queen he was convinced that within four years these events would occur. He was then more than eighty. He stated this in the presence of the lord-treasurer, Oxford, who objected different interpretations to those made by the bishop, which enraged the aged prelate extremely, he replied, with great passion and rudeness, "So says your treasurer, but God says otherwise, whether he likes it or not." So sincere was the conviction of this worthy prelate upon these points, that he told the queen, that if he was not right he did not know how to discern truth ; and requested he might be removed from his bishopric, as unfit to explain the Gospel to others.—Oxford ed. of this work.

England, his queen should enjoy her jointure, that was 50,000*l.* a year: and it was intended to settle a court about the duke of Gloucester, who was then nine years old: so, to enable the king to bear that expense, this large provision was made for the Civil List. But by some great error in the management, though the court never had so much, and never spent so little, yet payments were ill made, and, by some strange consumption, all was wasted.

While the house of commons was seeking a fund for paying the arrears of the army, and for the expense at sea and land for the next year, a proposition was made for constituting a new East India company, who should trade with a joint-stock, others being admitted in a determinate proportion to a separate trade. The old East India company opposed this, and offered to advance a sum (but far short of what the public occasions required,) for an act of parliament that should confirm their charters. The projectors of the new company offered two millions, upon the security of a good fund, to pay the interest of their money at eight per cent. Great opposition was made to this: for the king, upon an address that was made to him by the house of commons, had granted the old company a new charter, they being obliged to take in a new subscription of 700,000*l.* to increase their stock and trade. Those empowered by this new charter were not charged with any malversation; they had been trading under great disadvantages, and with great losses, by reason of the war. It is true the king had reserved a power to himself, by a clause in the charter, to dissolve them, upon warning given three years before such dissolution: so it was said that no injustice was done them, if public notice should be given of such an intended dissolution. To this it was answered, that the clause reserving that power was put in many charters, but that it was considered only as a threatening, obliging them to a good conduct; but that it was not ordinary to dissolve a company by virtue of such a clause, when no error or malversation was objected. The old company came at last to offer the whole sum that was wanted; but the party was now formed, so they came too late; and this had no other effect but to raise a clamour against this proceeding, as extremely rigorous, if not unjust. This threw the old company and all concerned in it into the hands of the tories, and made a great breach and disjoining in the city of London. And it is certain that this act, together with the inclinations which those of the whigs, who were in good posts, had expressed for keeping up a greater land force, did contribute to the blasting the reputation they had hitherto maintained of being good patriots, and was made use of over England by the tories, to disgrace both the king and them. To this another charge of a high nature was added, that they robbed the public, and applied much of the money that was given for the service of the nation both to the supporting a vast expense, and to the raising great estates to themselves. This was sensible to the people, who were uneasy under heavy taxes, and were too ready to believe that, according to the practice in king Charles's time, a great deal of the money that was given in parliament was divided among those who gave it. These clamours were raised and managed with great dexterity by those who intended to render the king, and all who were best affected to him, so odious to the nation, that by this means they might carry such an election of a new house of commons, as that by it all might be overturned. It was said that the bank of England and the new East India company, being in the hands of whigs, they would have the command of all the money, and, by consequence, of all the trade of England: so a great party was raised against the new company in both houses; but the act for it was carried. The king was very indifferent in the matter at first, but the greatness of the sum that was wanted, which could not probably be raised by any other project, prevailed on him; the interests of princes carrying them often to act against their private opinions and inclinations.

Before the king went into Holland, which was in July, news came from Spain that their king was dying. This alarm was often given before, but it came much quicker now. The French upon this sent a fleet to lie before Cadiz, which came thither at the time that the galleons were expected home from the West Indies; and it was apprehended that, if the king had died, they would have seized on all that treasure. We sent a fleet thither to secure them, but it came too late to have done any service, if it had been needed; this was much censured, but the admiralty excused themselves, by saying that the parliament was so late in fixing the funds for the fleet, that it was not possible to be ready sooner than they were. The king of Spain recovered for that time, but it was so far from any entire recovery, that a relapse was still apprehended. When the king went to Holland, he left some sealed orders behind him, of which some of his ministers told me they knew not the contents till they were opened: by these, the king ordered sixteen thousand men to be kept up: for excusing this, it was said, that though the parliament had in their votes mentioned only ten thousand land men, to whom they had afterwards added three thousand marines, and had raised only the money necessary for that number, yet no determined number was mentioned in the act itself: so, since the apprehension of the king of Spain's death made it advisable to have a greater force ready for such an accident, the king resolved to keep up a force somewhat beyond that which the house of commons had consented to: the leaving these orders sealed, made the whole blame to be cast singly on the king, as it screened the ministers from a share in this counsel. And we have more than once known ministers put the advices that they themselves gave in such a manner on their masters, that in executing them our kings have taken more care to shelter their ministers than to preserve themselves.

The king, before his leaving England, settled a household about the duke of Gloucester: the earl of Marlborough, who was restored to favour, was made his governor, and I was named by the king to be his preceptor. I used all possible endeavours to excuse myself: I had hitherto no share in the princess's favour or confidence: I was also become uneasy at some things in the king's conduct: I considered him as a glorious instrument, raised up by God, who had done great things by him: I had also such obligations to him, that I had resolved, on public as well as on private accounts, never to engage in any opposition to him, and yet I could not help thinking he might have carried matters further than he did; and that he was giving his enemies handles to weaken his government. I had tried, but with little success, to use all due freedom with him; he did not love to be found fault with; and though he bore every thing that I said very gently, yet he either discouraged me with silence, or answered in such general expressions, that they signified little or nothing. These considerations disposed me rather to retire from the court and town, than to engage deeper in such a constant attendance, for so many years as this employment might run out to. The king made it indeed easy in one respect; for, as the young prince was to be all the summer at Windsor, which was in my diocese, so he allowed me ten weeks in the year for the other parts of my diocese. All my endeavours to decline this were without effect; the king would trust that care only to me, and the princess gave me such encouragement, that I resolved not only to submit to this, which seemed to come from a direction of Providence, but to give myself wholly up to it. I took to my own province the reading and explaining the Scriptures to him, the instructing him in the principles of religion, and the rules of virtue, and the giving him a view of history, geography, politics, and government. I resolved also to look very exactly to all the masters that were appointed to teach him other things*. But now I turn to give an account of some things that more immediately belong to my own profession.

This year, Thomas Firmin, a famous citizen of London, died: he was in great esteem for promoting many charitable designs, for looking after the poor of the city, and setting them to work, for raising great sums for schools and hospitals, and indeed for charities of all sorts, private and public: he had such credit with the richest citizens, that he had the com-

* William, duke of Gloucester, was the only offspring of queen Anne that almost outlived childhood. When the king placed him under the tuition of the earl of Marlborough to learn the art of war, he complimented the earl by saying, "Teach him to be what you are, and my nephew cannot want accomplishments." His life was sacrificed, like Edward the Sixth's, to his too devoted attention to his studies. He understood the terms of fortification and navigation; would marshal a company of boys, who had voluntarily enlisted to attend him; studied history, politics, geography, and religion, assiduously; delighted in martial sports and hunting, as relaxations; and was so pious and sweetly tempered, that he was generally admired and beloved. It will be seen in a future page that he died in 1700, having just completed his eleventh year. His mother never ceased to remember or to lament him, ever after signing herself, when writing to lady, afterwards the duchess of, Marlborough, "your poor, unfortunate, faithful, Morley," the name she had adopted in her private correspondence with her confidante; who in this intercourse adopted the signature of "Fireman."—(Noble's Continuation of Grainger.) We may estimate the national sorrow upon this event by remembering how much the loss of the princess Charlotte was lamented by every Englishman.

mand of great wealth as oft as there was occasion for it : and he laid out his own time chiefly in advancing all such designs. These things gained him a great reputation. He was called a socinian, but was really an arian, which he very freely owned before the revolution ; but he gave no public vent to it, as he did afterwards. He studied to promote his opinions, after the revolution, with much heat : many books were printed against the Trinity, which he dispersed over the nation, distributing them freely to all who would accept of them : profane wits were much delighted with this : it became a common topic of discourse to treat all mysteries in religion as the contrivances of priests, to bring the world into a blind submission to them : priestcraft grew to be another word in fashion, and the enemies of religion vented all their impieties under the cover of these words ; but while these pretended much zeal for the government, those who were at work to undermine it made great use of all this : they raised a great outcry against socinianism, and gave it out that it was likely to overrun all ; for archbishop Tillotson and some of the bishops had lived in great friendship with Mr. Firmin, whose charitable temper they thought it became them to encourage. Many undertook to write in this controversy ; some of these were not fitted for handling such a nice subject. A learned deist made a severe remark on the progress of this dispute : he said, he was sure the divines would be too hard for the socinians, in proving their doctrines out of Scripture ; but if the doctrine could be once laughed at and rejected as absurd, then its being proved, how well soever out of Scripture, would turn to be an argument against the Scriptures themselves, as containing such incredible doctrines.

The divines did not go all in the same method, nor upon the same principles. Dr. Sherlock engaged in the controversy : he was a clear, a polite, and a strong writer, and had got great credit in the former reign by his writings against those of the church of Rome ; but he was apt to assume too much to himself, and to treat his adversaries with contempt ; this created him many enemies, and made him pass for an insolent, haughty man : he was at first a jacobite, and while, for not taking the oaths, he was under suspension, he wrote against the socinians, in which he took a new method of explaining the Trinity : he thought there were three eternal minds ; two of these issuing from the Father, but that these were one, by reason of a mutual consciousness in the three to every of their thoughts : this was looked on as plain tritheism ; but all the party applauded him and his book. Soon after that, an accident of an odd nature happened.

There was a book drawn up by bishop Overall, fourscore years ago, concerning government, in which its being of a divine institution was very positively asserted ; it was read in convocation, and passed by that body, in order to the publishing it in opposition to the principles laid down in that famous book of Parsons, the jesuit, published under the name of Dollman. King James the First did not like a convocation entering into such a theory of politics ; so he wrote a long letter to Abbot, who was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, but was then in the lower house. I had the original, written all in his own hand, in my possession ; by it he desired that no further progress should be made in that matter, and that this book might not be offered to him for his assent. Thus that matter slept, but Sancroft had got Overall's own book into his hands ; so in the beginning of this reign, he resolved to publish it as an authentic declaration that the church of England had made in this matter ; and it was published as well as licensed by him a very few days before he came under suspension for not taking the oaths ; but there was a paragraph or two in it that they had not considered, which was plainly calculated to justify the owning the United Provinces to be a lawful government ; for it was there laid down that when a change of government was brought to a thorough settlement, it was then to be owned and submitted to as a work of the providence of God, and a part of king James's letter to Abbot related to this. When Sherlock observed this, he had some conferences with the party in order to convince them by that, which he said had convinced himself. Soon after that he took the oaths, and was made dean of St. Paul's. He published an account of the grounds he went on, which drew out many virulent books against him. After that they pursued him with the clamour of tritheism, which was done with much malice by the very same persons who had highly magnified the performance while he was of their party ; so powerful is the bias of interest and passion in the most speculative and the most important doctrines.

Dr. South, a learned, but an ill-natured divine, who had taken the oaths, but with the reserve of an equivocal sense which he put on them, attacked Dr. Sherlock's book of the Trinity, not without wit and learning, but without any measure of Christian charity, and without any regard either to the dignity of the subject or the decencies of his profession. He explained the Trinity in the common method, that the Deity was one essence in three subsistencies*. Sherlock replied, and charged this as Sabellianism; and some others went into the dispute with some learning, but with more heat; one preached Sherlock's notion before the university of Oxford, for which he was censured; but Sherlock wrote against that censure with the highest strains of contempt. The socinians triumphed not a little upon this, and in several of their books they divided their adversaries into real and nominal trinitarians. Sherlock was put in the first class; as for the second class, they pretended it had been the doctrine of the western church ever since the time that the fourth council in the Lateran sat. Some, who took advantage from these debates to publish their impieties without fear or shame, rejoiced to see the divines engaged in such subtle questions; and they reckoned that which side soever might have the better in the turn of this controversy, yet in conclusion they alone must be the gainers by every dispute that brought such important matters to a doubtfulness, which might end in infidelity at last.

The ill effects that were like to follow on those different explanations, made the bishops move the king to set out injunctions, requiring them to see to the repressing of error and heresy with all possible zeal, more particularly in the fundamental articles of the Christian faith; and to watch against and hinder the use of new terms, or new explanations, in those matters. This put a stop to those debates, as Mr. Firmin's death put a stop to the printing and spreading of socinian books. Upon all this, some angry clergymen, who had not that share of preferment that they thought they deserved, begun to complain that no convocation was suffered to sit to whom the judging in such points seemed most properly to belong. Books were written on this head; it was said, that the law made in king Henry the Eighth's time, that limited the power of that body, so that no new canons could be attempted, or put in use without the king's licence and consent, did not disable them from sitting; on the contrary, a convocation was held to be a part of the parliament, so that it ought always to attend upon it, and to be ready, when advised with, to give their opinions chiefly in matters of religion. They had also, as these men pretended, a right to prepare articles and canons, and to lay them before the king, who might indeed deny his assent to them, as he did to bills that were offered him by both houses of parliament. This led them to strike at the king's supremacy, and to assert the intrinsic power of the church, which had been disowned by this church ever since the time of the reformation; and indeed the king's supremacy was thought to be carried formerly too high, and that by the same sort of men who were now studying to lay it as low. It seemed that some men were for maintaining it as long as it was in their management, and that it made for them; but resolved to weaken it all they could, as soon as it went out of their hands, and was no more at their discretion: such a turn do men's interests and partialities give to their opinions.

All this while it was manifest that there were two different parties among the clergy; one was firm and faithful to the present government, and served it with zeal: these did not envy the dissenters the ease that the toleration gave them; they wished for a favourable opportunity of making such alterations in some few rites and ceremonies as might bring into the church those who were not at too great a distance from it: and I do freely own that I was

* This amiable charitable man, and brilliant wit, deserves more than the above solitary notice. Dr. Robert South was born in 1633, became a scholar of Westminster and Christchurch, Oxford, seemed to make it a rule to join the triumphant party, and consequently adhered successively to Cromwell, Charles, James, and William. This pliancy did not arise from avarice; his highest preferment was a canonry, Christchurch, and a prebend stall at Westminster; and the revenues of these, as well as part of his paternal patrimony, he dispersed annually in charities. He valued an old hat and walking stick so highly, having used them many years, that no persuasions could induce him to exchange them even for the crozier and archiepiscopal mitre. He bore a long and excruciating malady with cheerfulness, and died in 1716. One specimen of his reproofing wit must be repeated.—Preaching before Charles the Second, and his equally indecorous courtiers, he perceived that the tenants of the royal pew were sleeping. He stopped, and calling thence to Lord Lauderdale, who awoke, and stood up, said to him, "My Lord, I am sorry to interrupt your repose, but I must beg that you will not snore quite so loud, lest you should awaken his majesty." (Biog. Britannica. Wood's Athenæ Oxon. Noble's Contin. of Granger.) of this number. Others took the oaths indeed, and concurred in every act of compliance with the government, but they were not only cold in serving it, but were always blaming the administration, and aggravating misfortunes: they expressed a great esteem for jacobites, and in all elections gave their votes for those who leaned that way; at the same time they shewed great resentments against the dissenters, and were enemies to the toleration, and seemed resolved never to consent to any alteration in their favour. The bulk of the clergy ran this way, so that the moderate party was far out-numbered. Profane minds had too great advantages from this, in reflecting severely on a body of men that took oaths, and performed public devotions, when the rest of their lives was too public and too visible a contradiction to such oaths and prayers.

But while we are thus unhappily disjointed in matters of religion, our neighbours are not so entirely united as they pretend to be. The quietists are said to increase not only in Italy, but in France: the persecution there began at first upon a few jansenists, but it turned soon to the protestants, on whom it has been long very heavy and bloody: this had put an end to all disputes in those matters; a new controversy has since been managed with great heat, between Bossuet, the famous bishop, first of Condom and now of Meaux, and La Motte Fenelon, who was once in high favour with Madame Maintenon, and was, by her means, made preceptor to the dauphin's children, and afterwards advanced to be archbishop of Cambray. He wrote a treatise of spiritual maxims, according to the subtilty, as well as the sublimity, of the writers called the mystics: in it he distinguished between that which was falsely charged upon them, and that which was truly their doctrine; he put the perfection of a spiritual life in the loving of God purely for himself, without any regard to ourselves, even to our own salvation; and in our being brought to such a state of indifference, as to have no will, nor desire of our own, but to be so perfectly united to the will of God as to rejoice in the hope of Heaven, only because it is the will of God to bring us thither, without any regard to our own happiness. Bossuet wrote so sharply against him, that one is tempted to think a rivalry for favour and preferment had as great a share in it as zeal for the truth. The matter was sent to Rome; Fenelon had so many authorized and canonized writers of his side, that many distinctions must be made use of to separate them from him; but the king was much set against him; he put him from his attendance on the young princess, and sent him to his diocese: his disgrace served to raise his character. Madame Maintenon's violent aversion to a man she so lately raised, was imputed to his not being so tractable as she expected, in persuading the king to own his marriage with her; but that I leave to conjecture. There is a breach running through the Lutheran churches; it appeared at first openly at Hamburgh, where many were going into stricter methods of piety, who from thence were called pietists: there is no difference of opinion between them and the rest, who are most rigid to old forms, and are jealous of all new things, especially of a stricter course of devotion, beyond what they themselves are inclined to practise. There is likewise a spirit of zeal and devotion, and of public charities, sprung at home, beyond what was known among us in former times; of which I may have a good occasion to make mention hereafter.

But to return from this digression; the company in Scotland, this year, set out a fleet, with a colony, on design to settle in America; the secret was better kept than could have been well expected, considering the many hands in which it was lodged; it appeared at last, that the true design had been guessed, from the first motion of it: they landed at Darien, which, by the report that they sent over, was capable of being made a strong place, with a good port. It was no wonder that the Spaniards complained loudly of this; it lay so near Porto-Bello and Panama on the one side, and Carthagena on the other, that they could not think they were safe when such a neighbour came so near the centre of their empire in America: the king of France complained also of this, as an invasion of the Spanish dominions, and offered the court of Madrid a fleet to dislodge them. The Spaniards pressed the king hard upon this: they said they were once possessed of that place, and though they found it too unhealthy to settle there, yet the right to it belonged still to them; so this was a breach of treaties, and a violent possession of their country. In answer to this, the Scotch pretended, that the natives of Darien were never conquered by the Spaniards, and were by consequence a free people; they said, they had purchased of them leave to possess themselves of that place, and that the Spaniards abandoned the country, because they could not reduce the natives; so the pretension of the first discovery was made void when they went off from it, not being able to hold it; and then the natives being left to themselves, it was lawful for the Scots to treat with them: it was given out that there was much gold in the country. Certainly the nation was so full of hopes from this project, that they raised a fund for carrying it on, greater than, as was thought, that kingdom could stretch to: four hundred thousand pounds sterling was subscribed, and a fourth part was paid down, and afterwards seventy thousand pounds more was brought in, and a national fury seemed to have transported the whole kingdom upon this project.

The jacobites went into the management with a particular heat: they saw the king would be much pressed from Spain; the English nation apprehending that this would be set up as a breach of treaties, and that upon a rupture their effects in Spain might be seized, grew also very uneasy at it; upon which it was thought that the king would in time be forced to disown this invasion, and to declare against it, and in that case they hoped to have inflamed the kingdom with this, that the king denied them his protection, while they were only acting according to law; and this, they would have said, was contrary to the coronation oath, and so they would have thought they were freed from their allegiance to him. The jacobites, having this prospect, did all that was possible to raise the hopes of the nation to the highest degree: our English plantations grew also very jealous of this new colony; they feared, that the double prospect of finding gold, and of robbing the Spaniards, would draw many planters from them into this new settlement; and that the buccaneers might run into them; for by the Scotch act, this place was to be made a free port; and if it was not ruined before it was well formed, they reckoned it would become a seat of piracy, and another Algiers, in those parts. Upon these grounds the English nation inclined to declare against this, and the king seemed convinced that it was an infraction of his treaties with Spain: so orders were sent, but very secretly, to the English plantations, particularly to Jamaica and the Leeward Islands, to forbid all commerce with the Scots at Darien. The Spaniards made some faint attempts on them, but without success: this was a very great difficulty on the king; he saw how much he was likely to be pressed on both hands, and he apprehended what ill consequences were likely to follow, on his declaring himself either way.

The parliament of England had now sat its period of three years, in which great things had been done: the whole money of England was recoined; the king was secured in his government, an honourable peace was made*, public credit was restored, and the payment of public debts was put on sure and good funds. The chief conduct lay now in a few hands; the lord Somers was made a baron of England; and as he was one of the ablest, and the most incorrupt judges that ever sat in Chancery, so his great capacity for all affairs made the king consider him beyond all his ministers, and he well deserved the confidence that the king expressed for him on all occasions. In the house of commons, Mr. Montague had gained such a visible ascendant over all that were zealous for the king's service, that he gave the law to the rest, which he did always with great spirit, but sometimes with too assuming an air. The fleet was in the earl of Orford's management, who was both treasurer of the navy, and was at the head of the admiralty; he had brought in many into the service, who were very zealous for the government, but a spirit of impiety and dissolution ran through too many of them, so that those who intended to cast a load upon the government had too great advantages given by some of these. The administration at home was otherwise without exception, and no grievances were complained of.

There was a new parliament called, and the elections fell generally on men who were in the interests of the government; many of them had indeed some popular notions, which they had drank in under a bad government, and thought they ought to keep them under a good one: so that those who wished well to the public did apprehend great difficulties in managing them. The king himself did not seem to lay this to heart so much as was fitting; he stayed long beyond sea; he had made a visit to the duke of Zell, where he was treated in a most magnificent manner. Cross winds hindered his coming to England so soon as he had intended; upon which the parliament was prorogued for some weeks after the members were come up; even this soured their spirits, and had too great a share in the ill humour that appeared among them.

The king's keeping up an army beyond the votes of the former parliament, was much resented, nor was the occasion for doing it enough considered; all this was increased by his own management after he came over. The ministers represented to him, that they could carry the keeping up a land force of ten or twelve thousand, but that they could not carry it further: he said so small a number was as good as none at all, therefore he would not authorize them to propose it; on the other hand, they thought they should lose their credit with their best friends, if they ventured to speak of a greater number. So, when the house of commons took up the debate, the ministry were silent, and proposed no number; upon which those who were in the contrary interest, named seven thousand men, and to this they added, that they should be all the king's natural-born subjects. Both the parts of this vote gave the king great uneasiness; he seemed not only to lay it much to heart, but to sink under it: he tried all that was possible to struggle against it, when it was too late; it not being so easy to recover things in an after-game, as it was to have prevented this misunderstanding, that was likely to arise between him and his parliament. It was surmised that he was resolved not to pass the bill, but that he would abandon the government, rather than hold it with a force that was too small to preserve and protect it; yet this was considered only as a threatening, so that little regard was had to it; the act passed with some opposition in the house of commons; a feeble attempt was made in the house of lords against it, but it was rather a reproach than a service to the government, it being faintly made and ill supported. The royal assent was given, and when it was hoped that the passing the act had softened people's minds, a new attempt was made for keeping the Dutch guards in England, but that was rejected, though the king sent a message desiring it*.

* It is easy to conceive how distressing this measure must have been to the king. His guards, as he observed with deep feeling, "had constantly attended him in all actions wherein he had been engaged."—(Chandler's Debates, House of Commons, iii. 93.) They were his companions—his children—for all history concurs in informing us that a general acquires a kind of parental regard for those soldiers that have long been under his care and command. The feeling is mutual—our soldiers during the last war in Spain used to call lord Hill "our father." When William first heard that the vote had passed which was to separate him from his Dutch guards, he paced his apartment for some time with downcast eyes, and suddenly pausing, said with more than usual passion, "If I had a son, these guards should not quit me." He made several efforts to avoid this painful separation. On the 18th of March, 1698 the journals of the house of commons inform us that the "earl of Ranelagh acquainted it, that he had, in command from his majesty, a message to deliver to this house, signed by his majesty, and all of his own hand-writing; which the said earl delivered in to Mr. Speaker, who read the same to the house, and is as followeth: viz.—

"William Rex.

"His majesty is pleased to let the house know, that the necessary preparations are made for transporting the guards, who came with him into England; and that he intends to send them away immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the house be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in his service, which his majesty would take very kindly.

"Upon which a question being proposed, that a day be appointed to consider of his majesty's said message, the question was put, that that question be now put, and it passed in the negative.

"20th of March, 1698.

"The lord Norris reported from the committee appointed on Saturday last, to draw up an humble address, to be presented to his majesty; that they had drawn up an address accordingly, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered in at the clerk's table, where the same was read, and is as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, with unfeigned zeal to your majesty's person and government (which God long preserve), most humbly represent,

"That the passing the late act for disbanding the army gave great satisfaction to your subjects; and the punctual execution thereof will prevent all occasions of distrust or jealousy between your majesty and your people.

"It is, Sir, to your loyal commons, an unspeakable grief, that anything should be asked by your majesty's message, to which they cannot consent, without doing violence to that constitution your majesty came over to restore and preserve, and did at that time, in your gracious declaration promise, that all those foreign forces which came over with you, should be sent back. In duty therefore to your majesty, and to discharge the trust reposed in us, we crave leave to lay before you, that nothing conduceth more to the happiness and welfare of this kingdom, than an entire confidence between your majesty and your people; which can no way be so firmly established as by entrusting your sacred person with your own subjects, who have so eminently signalized themselves on all occasions during the late long and expensive war."

However we may sympathize with William upon this trying occasion, at the same time we must feel that our legislators were right in their determination—even his ministers were silent, or opposed the motion without energy. They rightly felt that the guards of England should be Englishmen; not only for the sake of the national honour, but because otherwise it would be a precedent for the permanent employment of foreign troops, the most effectual mode of enslaving and enervating a nation. Rome declined from the moment she employed mercenary legions.

In the carrying these points, many hard things were said against the court, and against the king himself; it was suggested that he loved not the nation; that he was on the reserve with all Englishmen, and shewed no confidence in them; but that as soon as the session of parliament was over, he went immediately to Holland; and they said, this was not to look after the affairs of the States, which had been more excusable; but that he went thither to enjoy a lazy privacy at Loo; where, with a few favourites, he hunted and passed away the summer, in a way that did not raise his character much. It is certain the usage he had met with of late put his spirits too much on the fret; and he neither took care to disguise that, nor to overcome the ill humour, which the manner of his deportment, rather than any just occasion given by him, had raised in many against him. Some, in the house of commons, began to carry things much further, and to say, that they were not bound to maintain the votes, and to keep up the credit of the former parliament; and they tried to shake the act made in favour of the new East-India company: this was so contrary to the fundamental maxims of our constitution, that it gave cause of jealousy, since this could be intended for nothing, but to ruin the government: money raised by parliament upon bargains and conditions that were performed by those who advanced it, gave them such a purchase of those acts, and this was so sacred, that to overturn it must destroy all credit for the future, and no government could be maintained that did not preserve this religiously.

Among other complaints, one made against the court was, that the king had given grants of the confiscated estates in Ireland; it was told before, that a bill being sent up by the commons, attainting the Irish that had been in arms, and applying their estates to the paying the public debts, leaving only a power to the king to dispose of the third part of them, was likely to lie long before the lords, many petitions being offered against it; upon which the king, to bring the session to a speedy conclusion, had promised, that this matter should be kept entire till their next meeting: but the next session going over without any proceeding in it, the king granted away all those confiscations; it being an undoubted branch of the royal prerogative, that all confiscations accrued to the crown, and might be granted away at the pleasure of the king; it was pretended that those estates came to a million and a half in value. Great objections were made to the merits of some, who had the largest share in those grants; attempts had been made, in the parliament of Ireland, to obtain a confirmation of them, but that which Ginkle, who was created earl of Athlone, had, was only confirmed: now it was become a popular subject of declamation, to arraign both the grants, and those who had them; motions had been often made for a general resumption of all the grants made in this reign; but in answer to this, it was said, that since no such motion was made for a resumption of the grants made in king Charles the Second's reign, notwithstanding the extravagant profusion of them, and the ill grounds upon which they were made, it shewed both a disrespect and a black ingratitude, if, while no other grants were resumed, this king only should be called in question. The court party said often, let the retrospect go back to the year 1660, and they would consent to it, and that which might be got by it would be worth the while. It was answered, this could not be done after so long a time, that so many sales, mortgages, and settlements had been made, pursuant to those grants; so all these attempts came to nothing. But now they fell on a more effectual method. A commission was given, by act of parliament, to seven persons named by the house of commons, to enquire into the value of the confiscated estates in Ireland so granted away, and into the considerations upon which those grants were made. This passed in this session, and in the debates, a great alienation discovered itself in many from the king and his government, which had a very ill effect upon all affairs, both at home and abroad. When the time prefixed for the disbanding the army came, it was reduced to seven thousand men; of these, four thousand were horse and dragoons, the foot were three thousand; the bodies were also reduced to so small a number of soldiers, that it was said we had now an army of officers: the new method was much approved of by proper judges, as the best into which so small a number could have been brought. There was at the same time a very large provision made for the sea, greater than was thought necessary in a time of peace. Fifteen thousand seamen, with a fleet proportioned to that number, was thought a necessary security, since we were made so weak by land.

I mentioned in the relation of the former year, the czar's coming out of his own country, on which I will now enlarge: he came this winter over to England, and stayed some months among us; I waited often on him, and was ordered, both by the king, and the archbishop and bishops, to attend upon him, and to offer him such informations of our religion and constitution, as he was willing to receive: I had good interpreters, so I had much free discourse with him. He is a man of a very hot temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his passion; he raises his natural heat by drinking much brandy, which he rectifies himself with great application: he is subject to convulsive motions all over his body, and his head seems to be affected with these; he wants not capacity, and has a larger measure of knowledge than might be expected from his education, which was very indifferent: a want of judgment, with an instability of temper, appear in him too often, and too evidently; he is mechanically turned, and seems designed by nature rather to be a ship carpenter than a great prince; this was his chief study and exercise while he stayed here; he wrought much with his own hands, and made all about him work at the models of ships: he told me he designed a great fleet at Azoff, and with it to attack the Turkish empire; but he did not seem capable of conducting so great a design, though his conduct in his wars since this, has discovered a greater genius in him than appeared at that time. He was desirous to understand our doctrine, but he did not seem disposed to mend matters in Muscovy: he was indeed resolved to encourage learning, and to polish his people, by sending some of them to travel in other countries, and to draw strangers to come and live among them. He seemed apprehensive still of his sister's intrigues. There was a mixture both of passion and severity in his temper. He is resolute, but understands little of war, and seemed not at all inquisitive that way. After I had seen him often, and had conversed much with him, I could not but adore the depth of the Providence of God that had raised up such a furious man to so absolute an authority over so great a part of the world.

David, considering the great things God had made for the use of man, broke out into the meditation, "What is man, that thou art so mindful of him?" But here there is an occasion for reversing these words, since man seems a very contemptible thing in the sight of God, while such a person as the czar has such multitudes put as it were under his feet, exposed to his restless jealousy and savage temper. He went from hence to the court of Vienna, where he purposed to have stayed some time, but he was called home sooner than he had intended, upon a discovery or a suspicion of intrigues managed by his sister: the strangers to whom he trusted most were so true to him, that those designs were crushed before he came back; but on this occasion he let loose his fury on all whom he suspected; some hundreds of them were hanged all round Moscow, and it was said, that he cut off many heads with his own hand, and so far was he from relenting, or shewing any sort of tenderness, that he seemed delighted with it. How long he is to be the scourge of that nation, or of his neighbours, God only knows; so extraordinary an incident will, I hope, justify such a digression.

The king of Poland was not much better thought of by the Poles, though somewhat deeper in his designs; he had given that republic great cause of suspecting that he intended to turn that free and elective state into an hereditary and absolute dominion. Under the pretence of a civil war, like to arise at home, on the prince of Conti's account, and of the war with the Turks, he had brought in an army of Saxons, of whom the Poles were now become so jealous, that if he does not send them home again, probably that kingdom will fall into new wars.

The young king of Sweden seemed to inherit the roughness of his father's temper with the piety and the virtues of his mother; his coronation was performed in a particular manner, he took up the crown himself, and set it on his head; the design of this innovation in the ceremonial seems to be, that he will not have his subjects think that he holds his crown in any respect by their grant or consent, but that it was his own by descent; therefore no other person was to set it on his head; whereas, even absolute princes are willing to leave this poor remnant and shadow of a popular election among the ceremonies of their coronation; since they are crowned upon the desires and shoutings of their people. Thus the two northern crowns, Denmark and Sweden, that were long under great restraints by their constitution, have in our own time, emancipated themselves so entirely, that in their government they have little regard, either to the rules of law or the decencies of custom. A little time will shew, whether Poland can be brought to submit to the same absoluteness of government; they who set their crown to sale, in so bare-faced a manner, may be supposed ready likewise to sell their liberties, if they can find a merchant that will come up to their price.

The frequent relapses, and the feeble state of the king of Spain's health, gave the world great alarms. The court of Vienna trusted to their interest in the court of Spain, and in that king himself; the French court was resolved not to let go their pretensions to that succession without great advantages; the king and the States were not now strong enough to be the umpires in that matter; this made them more easily hearken to propositions that were set on foot by the court of France; the electoral prince of Bavaria was proposed, he being the only issue of the king of Spain's second sister, who was married to the emperor. Into this, the king, the States, and the elector of Bavaria entered: the court of Spain agreed to this; and that king, by his will, confirmed his father's will, by which the succession of the crown was settled on the issue of the second daughter, and it was resolved to engage all the grandees and cities of Spain to maintain the succession, according to this settlement. The house of Austria complained of this, and pretended that, by a long tract of reciprocal settlements, several mutual entails had passed between those two branches of the house of Austria; the court of France seemed also to complain of it, but they were secretly in it, upon engagements, that the dominions in Italy should fall to their share; but while these engagements, in favour of the prince electoral, were raising great apprehensions every where, that young prince, who seemed marked out for great things, and who had all the promising beginnings that could be expected in a child of seven years old, fell sick, and was carried off the third or fourth day of his illness; so uncertain are all the prospects, and all the hopes, that this world can give. Now the dauphin and the emperor were to dispute, or to divide this succession between them; so a new treaty was set on foot: it was generally given out, and too easily believed, that the king of France was grown weary of war, and was resolved to pass the rest of his days in peace and quiet; but that he could not consent to the exaltation of the house of Austria; yet if that house were set aside, he would yield up the dauphin's pretensions; and so the duke of Savoy was much talked of, but it was with the prospect of having his hereditary dominions yielded up to the crown of France; but this great matter came to another digestion a few months after.

About this time, the king set up a new favourite; Keppel, a gentleman of Guelder, was raised from being a page into the highest degree of favour that any person had ever attained about the king; he was now made earl of Albemarle, and soon after knight of the garter; and by a quick, and unaccountable progress, he seemed to have engrossed the royal favour so entirely, that he disposed of every thing that was in the king's power. He was a cheerful young man, that had the heart to please, but was so much given up to his own pleasures, that he could scarcely submit to the attendance and drudgery that was necessary to maintain his post. He never had yet distinguished himself in any thing, though the king did it in every thing. He was not cold, nor dry, as the earl of Portland was thought to be; who seemed to have the art of creating many enemies to himself, and not one friend: but the earl of Albemarle had all the arts of a court, was civil to all, and procured many favours*. The earl of Portland observed the progress of this favour with great uneasiness; they grew to be not only incompatible, as all rivals for favour must needs be, but to hate and oppose

* Arnold Joost Van Keppel came over with William as a page, and had never been employed in offices more important than copying letters, until the royal mistress, Mrs. Villiers, and the earl of Sunderland, employed and sustained him to supplant the other favourite, the earl of Portland. The design proved successful, and however we may lament that ministers of state are ever created through motives and intrigues so unworthy, yet in this instance it is consolatory to know that the instrument was virtuous and talented. He was, in 1696, created baron Ashford, viscount Bury, in England, and earl of Albemarle, in Normandy. This latter title had been borne by princes of the Plantagenet line, and by the restorer of the Stuarts, as a dukedom, so that one more honourable could not have been selected. To this the garter was appended, and the offices of master of the robes, and a lordship of the bedchamber. He was equally trusted and variously employed by Anne and George the First. He died, aged 43, in 1718. He was handsome, gay, lively, courteous, liberal; these were popular endowments, and made him idolized even by the English. He was faithful, brave, and honourable, which makes him deserving the commendation of mankind.—Noble's Contin. of Granger.

one another in every thing, by which the king's affairs suffered much ; the one had more of the confidence, and the other much more of the favour ; the king had heaped many grants on the earl of Portland, and had sent him ambassador to France, upon the peace, where he appeared with great magnificence, and at a vast expense, and had many very unusual respects put upon him by that king, and all that court ; but upon his return, he could not bear the visible superiority in favour, that the other was grown up to ; so he took occasion, from a small preference that was given him, in prejudice of his own post, as groom of the stole, and upon it withdrew from the court, and laid down all his employments. The king used all possible means to divert him from this resolution, but without prevailing on him ; he consented to serve the king still in his affairs, but he would not return to any post in the household ; and not long after that he was employed in the new negotiation, set on foot for the succession to the crown of Spain.

This year died the marquis of Winchester, whom the king had created duke of Bolton ; he was a man of a strange mixture ; he had the spleen to a high degree, and affected an extravagant behaviour : for many weeks he would take a conceit not to speak one word ; and at other times he would not open his mouth till such an hour of the day, when he thought the air was pure ; he changed the day into night, and often hunted by torchlight, and took all sorts of liberties to himself, many of which were very disagreeable to those about him. In the end of king Charles's time, and during king James's reign, he affected an appearance of folly, which afterwards he compared to Junius Brutus's behaviour under the Tarquins. With all this he was a very knowing, and a very crafty politic man ; and was an artful flatterer, when that was necessary to compass his end, in which generally he was successful : he was a man of a profuse expense, and of a most ravenous avarice to support that ; and though he was much hated, yet he carried matters before him with such authority and success, that he was in all respects the great riddle of the age.

This summer, sir Josiah Child died ; he was a man of great notions as to merchandize, which was his education, and in which he succeeded beyond any man of his time ; he applied himself chiefly to the East-India trade, which by his management was raised so high, that it drew much envy and jealousy both upon himself and upon the company ; he had a compass of knowledge and apprehension beyond any merchant I ever knew ; he was vain and covetous, and thought too cunning, though to me he seemed always sincere *.

The complaints that the court of France sent to Rome, against the archbishop of Cambray's book, procured a censure from thence ; but he gave such a ready and entire submission to it, that how much soever that may have lessened him, in some men's opinions, yet it quite defeated the designs of his enemies against him : upon this occasion, it appeared how much both the clergy of France, and the courts of parliament there, were sunk from that firmness which they had so long maintained against the encroachment of the court of Rome ; not so much as one person of those bodies has set himself to assert those liberties, upon which they had so long valued themselves ; the whole clergy submitted to the bull, the king himself received it, and the parliament registered it ; we do not yet know by what methods and practices this was obtained at the court of Rome, nor what are the distinctions, by which they save the doctrine of so many of their saints, while they condemn this archbishop's book ; for it is not easy to perceive a difference between them. From the conclusion of this process at Rome, I turn to another, against a bishop of our own church, that was brought to a sentence and conclusion this summer.

Dr. Watson † was promoted by king James to the bishopric of St. David's ; it was believed that he gave money for his advancement, and that in order to the reimbursing himself, he sold most of the spiritual preferments in his gift. By the law and custom of this church the archbishop is the only judge of a bishop, but upon such occasions he calls for the * Sir Josiah Child was the second son of sir Richard Child, a London merchant. His deep acquaintance with the principles of commerce is shown by his work, entitled "A new discourse upon trade," to which is appended a small essay on usury. It has passed through several editions. He was created a baronet in 1678. He was sixty-two when he died. His monument, with a long inscrip-

assistance of some of the bishops ; he called for six in this cause ; I was one of them. It was proved that the bishop had collated a nephew of his to a great many of the best preferments in his gift, and that for many years he had taken the whole profits of these to himself, keeping his nephew very poor, and obliging him to perform no part of his duty : it was also proved that the bishop obtained leave to keep a benefice, which he held before his promotion by a commendam, (one of the abuses which the popes brought in among us, from which we have not been able hitherto to free our church ;) that he had sold both the cure and the profits to a clergyman, for a sum of money, and had obliged himself to resign it upon demand, that is, as soon as the clergyman could, by another sum, purchase the next presentation of the patron : these things were fully proved. To these was added a charge of many oppressive fees, which being taken for benefices that were in his gift, were not only extortion but a presumptive simony. All these he had taken himself, without making use of a register or actuary ; for as he would not trust these secrets to any other, so he swallowed up the fees both of his chancellor and register ; he had also ordained many persons without tendering them the oaths enjoined by law, and yet in their letters of orders, he had certified under his hand and seal that they had taken those oaths ; this was what the law calls crimen falsi, the certifying that which he knew to be false : no exceptions lay to the witnesses by whom these things were made out, nor did the bishop bring any proofs on his side to contradict their evidence. Some affirmed that he was a sober and regular man, and that he spoke often of simony with such detestation, that they could not think him capable of committing it. The bishop of Rochester withdrew from the court on the day in which sentence was to be given ; he consented to a suspension, but he did not think that a bishop could be deprived by the archbishop. When the court sat to give judgment, the bishop resumed his privilege of peerage, and pleaded it ; but he having waived it in the house of lords, and having gone on still submitting to the court, no regard was had to this, since a plea to the jurisdiction of the court was to be offered in the first instance, but could not be kept up to the last and then be made use of. The bishops that were present agreed to a sentence of deprivation : I went further, and thought that he ought to be excommunicated. He was one of the worst men, in all respects, that I ever knew in holy orders ; passionate, covetous, and false in the blackest instances ; without any one virtue or good quality to balance his many bad ones. But as he was advanced by king James, so he stuck firm to that interest ; and the party, though ashamed of him, yet were resolved to support him with great zeal. He appealed to a court of delegates, and they, about the end of the year, confirmed the archbishop's sentence. Another prosecution followed for simony, against Jones, bishop of St. Asaph, in which, though the presumptions were very great, yet the evidence was not so clear as in the former case. The bishops in Wales give almost all the benefices in their diocese ; so this primitive constitution that is still preserved among them, was scandalously abused by some wicked men, who set holy things to sale, and thereby increased the prejudices that are but too easily received both against religion and the church.

I published this year an Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. It seemed a work much wanted, and it was justly to be wondered at, that none of our divines had attempted any such performance in a way suitable to the dignity of the subject ; for some slight analyses of them are not worth either mentioning or reading. It was a work that required study and labour, and laid a man open to many malicious attacks ; this made some of my friends advise me against publishing it : in compliance with them I kept it five years by me after I had finished it ; but I was now prevailed on by the archbishop and many of my own order, besides a great many others, to delay the publishing it no longer. It seemed a proper addition to the History of the Reformation, to explain and prove the doctrine which was then established. I was moved first by the late queen, and pressed by the late archbishop to write it. I can appeal to the Searcher of all hearts that I wrote it with great sincerity and a good intention, and with all the application and care I was capable of. I did then expect what I have since met with, that malicious men would employ both their industry and ill nature to find matter for censure and cavils ; but though there have been some books written on purpose against it, and many in sermons and other treatises have occasionally reflected with great severity upon several passages in it, yet this has been done with so little justice or reason, that I am not yet convinced that there is one single period or expression that is justly remarked on, or that can give me any occasion either to retract or so much as to explain any one part of that whole work, which I was very ready to have done if I had seen cause for it. There was another reason that seemed to determine me to the publishing it at this time*.

Upon the peace of Ryswick a great swarm of priests came over to England, not only those whom the revolution had frightened away, but many more new men, who appeared in many places with great insolence; and it was said that they boasted of the favour and protection of which they were assured. Some enemies of the government began to give it out, that the favouring that religion was a secret article of the peace; and so absurd is malice and calumny, that the jacobites began to say, that the king was either of that religion, or at least a favourer of it. Complaints of the avowed practices and insolence of the priests were brought from several places during the last session of parliament, and those were maliciously aggravated by some, who cast the blame of all on the king.

Upon this, some proposed a bill, that obliged all persons educated in that religion, or suspected to be of it, who should succeed to any estate before they were of the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the test as soon as they came to that age; and till they did it, the estate was to devolve to the next of kin, that was a protestant, but was to return back to them, upon their taking the oaths. All popish priests were also banished by the bill, and were adjudged to perpetual imprisonment if they should again return to England; and the reward of an hundred pounds was offered to every one who should discover a popish priest so as to convict him. Those who brought this into the house of commons, hoped the court would have opposed it, but the court promoted the bill; so when the party saw their mistake, they seemed willing to let the bill fall; and when that could not be done, they clogged it with many severe and some unreasonable clauses, hoping that the lords would not pass the act; and it was said that if the lords should make the least alteration in it, they in the house of commons, who had set it on, were resolved to let it lie on their table when it should be sent back to them. Many lords who secretly favoured papists on the jacobite account, did for this very reason move for several alterations, some of these importing a greater severity; but the zeal against popery was such in that house, that the bill passed without any amendment, and it had the royal assent. I was for this bill, notwithstanding my principles for toleration and against all persecution for conscience sake: I had always thought, that if a government found any sect in religion incompatible with its quiet and safety, it might, and sometimes ought to send away all of that sect with as little hardship as possible. It is certain that as all papists must at all times be ill subjects to a protestant prince, so this is much more to be apprehended when there is a pretended popish heir in the case. This act hurt no man that was in the present possession of an estate, it only incapacitated his next heir to succeed to that estate if he continued a papist; so the danger of this, in case the act should be well looked to, would put those of that religion who are men of conscience on the selling of their estates, and in the course of a few years might deliver us from having any papists left among us. But this act wanted several necessary clauses to enforce the due execution of it: the word "next of kin," was very indefinite, and the "next of kin," was not obliged to claim the benefit of this act, nor did the right descend to the remoter heirs if the more immediate ones should not take the benefit of it; the test relating to matters of doctrine and worship, did not seem a proper ground for so great a severity, so this act was not followed nor executed in any sort; but here is a scheme laid, though not fully digested, which on some great provocation given by those of that religion, may dispose a parliament to put such clauses in a new act as may make this effectual.

The king of Denmark was in a visible decline all this year, and died about the end of summer. While he was languishing, the duke of Holstein began to build some new forts in that duchy; this the Danes said was contrary to the treaties, and to the condominium which that king and the duke have in that duchy. The duke of Holstein had married the king of Sweden's sister, and depended on the assurances he had of being supported by that crown. The young king of Denmark, upon his coming to the crown, as he complained of these infractions, * This work has not been considered quite orthodox in its doctrines. Dr. South said that Burnet had served the Church of England as the Jews served St. Paul; giving it forty stripes, save one.

so he entered into an alliance with the king of Poland and the elector of Brandenburg, and, as was said, with the landgrave of Hesse and the duke of Wolfenbüttel, to attack Sweden and Holstein at once on all hands. The king of Poland was to invade Livonia; the elector of Brandenburg was to fall into the regal Pomerania, and the other princes were to keep the dukes of Zell and Hanover from assisting Holstein: the king of Denmark himself was to attack Holstein, but his father's chief minister and treasurer, the baron Plesse, did not like the concert, and apprehended it would not end well; so he withdrew from his post which he had maintained long with a high reputation, both for his capacity and integrity; which appeared in this, that though that king's power is now carried to be absolute, yet he never stretched it to new or oppressive taxes; and therefore seeing things were like to take another ply in a new reign, he resigned his employment. He was the ablest and the worthiest man that I ever knew belonging to those parts; he was much trusted and employed by prince George, so that I had great opportunities to know him.

The king of Sweden, seeing such a storm coming upon him from so many hands, claimed the effects of his alliance with England and Holland, who were guarantees of the several treaties made in the North, particularly of the last made at Altena but ten years before. The house of Lunenburg was also engaged in interest to preserve Holstein as a barrier between them and Denmark. The king of Poland thought the invasion of Livonia, which was to be begun with the siege of Riga, would prove both easy and of great advantage to him. Livonia was anciently a fief of the crown of Poland, and delivered itself for protection to the crown of Sweden by a capitulation: by that they were still to enjoy their ancient liberties; afterwards the pretension of the crown of Poland was yielded up about threescore years ago, so that Livonia was an absolute but legal government: yet the king of Sweden had treated that principality in the same rough manner in which he had oppressed his other dominions; so it was thought that the Livonians were disposed (as soon as they saw a power ready to protect them, and to restore them to their former liberties) to shake off the Swedish yoke; especially if they saw the king attacked in so many different places at once.

The king of Poland had a farther design in this invasion; he had an army of Saxons in Poland, to whom he chiefly trusted in carrying on his designs there; the Poles were become so jealous, both of him and of his Saxons, that in a general diet they had come to very severe resolutions, in case the Saxons were not sent out of the kingdom by a prefixed day; that king therefore reckoned, that as the reduction of Livonia had the fair appearance of recovering the ancient inheritance of the crown, so by this means he would carry the Saxons out of Poland, as was decreed, and yet have them within call; he likewise studied to engage those of Lithuania to join with him in the attempt. His chief dependence was on the czar, who had assured him, that if he could make peace with the Turk, and keep Azoph, he would assist him powerfully against the Swedes; his design being to recover Narva, which is capable of being made a good port. By this means he hoped to get into the Baltic, where if he could once settle, he would soon become an uneasy neighbour to all the northern princes. The king of Poland went into Saxony to mortgage and sell his lands there, and to raise as much money as was possible for carrying on this war; and he brought the electorate to so low a state, that if his designs in Poland miscarry, and if he is driven back into Saxony, he who was the richest prince of the empire will become one of the poorest. But the amusements of balls and operas consumed so much, both of his time and treasure, that whereas the design was laid to surprise Riga in the middle of the winter, he did not begin his attempt upon it before the end of February, and these designs went no farther this year.

While the king was at Loo this summer, a new treaty was set on foot, concerning the succession to the crown of Spain; the king and the states of the United Provinces saw the danger to which they would be exposed if they should engage in a new war, while we were yet under the vast debts that the former had brought upon us; the king's ministers in the house of commons assured him, that it would be a very difficult thing to bring them to enter into a new war for maintaining the rights of the house of Austria. During the debates concerning the army, when some mentioned the danger of that monarchy falling into the hands of a prince of the house of Bourbon, it was set up for a maxim, that it would be of no consequence to the affairs of Europe who was king of Spain, whether a Frenchman, or a German ; and that as soon as the successor should come within Spain, he would become a true Spaniard, and be governed by the maxims and interests of that crown ; so that there was no prospect of being able to infuse into the nation an apprehension of the consequence of that succession. The emperor had a very good claim ; but as he had little strength to support it by land, so he had none at all by sea ; and his treasure was quite exhausted by his long war with the Turks : the French drew a great force towards the frontiers of Spain, and they were resolved to march into it upon that king's death ; there was no strength ready to oppose them, yet they seemed willing to compound the matter ; but they said, the consideration must be very valuable that could make them desist from so great a pretension : and both the king and the States thought it was a good bargain, if, by yielding up some of the less important branches of that monarchy, they could save those in which they were most concerned, which were Spain itself, the West-Indies, and the Netherlands. The French seemed willing to accept of the dominions in and about Italy, with a part of the kingdom of Navarre, and to yield up the rest to the emperor's second son, the archduke Charles : the emperor entered into the treaty, for he saw he could not hope to carry the whole succession entire ; but he pressed to have the duchy of Milan added to his hereditary dominions in Germany ; the expedient that the king proposed was, that the duke of Lorraine should have the duchy of Milan, and that France should accept of Lorraine instead of it ; he was the emperor's nephew, and would be entirely in his interests. The emperor did not agree to this, but yet he pressed the king not to give over the treaty, and to try if he could make a better bargain for him ; above all things he recommended secrecy, for he well knew how much the Spaniards would be offended, if any treaty should be owned, that might bring on a dismembering of their monarchy ; for though they were taking no care to preserve it, in the whole, or in part, yet they could not bear the having any branch torn from it. The king reckoned that the emperor, with the other princes of Italy, might have so much interest in Rome, as to stop the pope's giving the investiture of the kingdom of Naples ; and which way soever that matter might end, it would oblige the pope to shew great partiality, either to the house of Austria, or the house of Bourbon ; which might occasion a breach among them, with other consequences, that might be very happy to the whole protestant interest ; any war that might follow in Italy, would be at great distance from us, and in a country that we had no reason to regard much ; besides, that the fleets of England and Holland must come, in conclusion, to be the arbiters of the matter.

These were the king's secret motives ; for I had most of them from his own mouth ; the French consented to this scheme, and if the emperor would have agreed to it, his son the archduke was immediately to go to Spain, to be considered as the heir of that crown ; by these articles, signed both by the king of France and the dauphin, they bound themselves not to accept of any will, testament, or donation, contrary to this treaty, which came to be called the partition treaty. I had the original in my hands, which the dauphin signed : the French and the emperor tried their strength in the court of Spain ; it is plain the emperor trusted too much to his interest in that court, and in that king himself ; and he refused to accept of the partition, merely to ingratiate himself with them ; otherwise it was not doubted but that, seeing the impossibility of mending matters, he would have yielded to the necessity of his affairs. The French did, in a most perfidious manner, study to alienate the Spaniards from their allies, by shewing them to how great a diminution of their monarchy they had consented ; so that no way possible was left for them to keep those dominions still united to their crown, but by accepting the duke of Anjou to be their king, with whom all should be again restored. The Spaniards complained in the courts of their allies, in ours in particular, of this partition, as a detestable project, which was to rob them of those dominions that belonged to their crown, and ought not to be torn from it. No mention was made of this during the session of parliament, for though the thing was generally believed, yet it not being publicly owned, no notice could be taken of bare reports, and nothing was to be done, in pursuance of this treaty, during the king of Spain's life.

In Scotland, all men were full of hopes that their new colony should bring them home mountains of gold ; the proclamations sent to Jamaica, and to the other English plantations, were much complained of as acts of hostility and a violation of the common rights of humanity ; these had a great effect on them, though without these, that colony was too weak and too ill supplied, as well as too much divided within itself, to have subsisted long ; those who had first possessed themselves of it, were forced to abandon it : soon after they had gone from it, a second recruit of men and provisions was sent thither from Scotland ; but one of their ships unhappily took fire, in which they had the greatest stock of provisions ; and so these likewise went off ; and though the third reinforcement, that soon followed this, was both stronger and better furnished, yet they fell into such factions among themselves, that they were too weak to resist the Spaniards, who feeble as they were, yet saw the necessity of attacking them ; and they finding themselves unable to resist the force which was brought against them, capitulated ; and with that the whole design fell to the ground, partly for want of stock and skill in those who managed it, and partly by the baseness and treachery of those whom they employed.

The conduct of the king's ministers in Scotland was much censured, in the whole progress of this affair, for they had connived at it, if not encouraged it, in hopes that the design would fall of itself ; but now it was not so easy to cure the universal discontent, which the miscarriage of this design, to the impoverishing the whole kingdom, had raised, and which now began to spread, like a contagion, among all sorts of people. A petition for a present session of parliament was immediately sent about the kingdom, and was signed by many thousands : this was sent up by some of the chief of their nobility, whom the king received very coldly. Yet a session of parliament was granted them, to which the duke of Queensbury was sent down commissioner. Great pains were taken, by all sorts of practices, to be sure of a majority ; great offers were made them in order to lay the discontents, which ran then very high ; a law for a habeas corpus, with a great freedom for trade, and every thing that they could demand, was offered, to persuade them to desist from pursuing the design upon Darien. The court had tried to get the parliament of England to interpose in that matter, and to declare themselves against that undertaking. The house of lords was prevailed on to make an address to the king, representing the ill effects that they apprehended from that settlement ; but this did not signify much, for as it was carried in that house by a small majority of seven or eight, so it was laid aside by the house of commons. Some were not ill pleased to see the king's affairs run into an embroilment ; and others did apprehend, that there was a design to involve the two kingdoms in a national quarrel, that by such an artifice, a greater army might be raised, and kept up on both sides : so they let that matter fall, nor would they give any entertainment to a bill that was sent them by the lords, in order to a treaty for the union of both kingdoms. The managers in the house of commons who opposed the court, resolved to do nothing that should provoke Scotland, or that should take any part of the blame and general discontent, that soured that nation, off from the king. It was further given out, to raise the national disgust yet higher, that the opposition the king gave to the Scotch colony, flowed neither from a regard to the interests of England, nor to the treaties with Spain ; but from a care of the Dutch, who from Curaçoa drove a coasting trade among the Spanish plantations, with great advantage, which they said the Scotch colony, if once well settled, would draw wholly from them. These things were set about that nation with great industry ; the management was chiefly in the hands of jacobites : neither the king nor his ministers were treated with the decencies that are sometimes observed, even after subjects have run to arms. The keenest of their rage was plainly pointed at the king himself ; next him, the earl of Portland, who had still the direction of their affairs, had a large share of it. In the session of parliament, it was carried, by a vote, to make the affair of Darien a national concern : upon that the session was for some time discontinued. When the news of the total abandoning of Darien was brought over, it cannot be well expressed into how bad a temper this cast the body of that people ; they had now lost almost two hundred thousand pounds sterling upon this project, besides all the imaginary treasure they had promised themselves from it : so the nation was raised into a sort of fury upon it, and in the first heat of that, a remonstrance was sent about the kingdom for hands, representing to the king the necessity of a present sitting of the parliament, which was drawn in so high a strain as if they had resolved to pursue the effects of it by an armed force. It was signed by a great majority of the members of parliament ; and the ferment in men's spirits was raised so high, that few thought it could have been long curbed, without breaking forth into great extremities.

The king stayed beyond sea till November : many expected to see a new parliament ; for the king's speech, at the end of the former session, looked like a complaint, and an appeal to the nation against them : he seemed inclined to it, but his ministers would not venture on it. The dissolving a parliament in anger has always cast such a load on those who were thought to have advised it, that few have been able to stand it ; besides, the disbanding the army had rendered the members, who promoted it, very popular to the nation : so that they would have sent up the same men, and it was thought that there was little occasion for heat in another session. But those who opposed the king, resolved to force a change of the ministry upon him ; they were seeking colours for this, and thought they had found one, with which they had made much noise : it was this.

Some pirates had got together in the Indian seas, and robbed some of the Mogul's ships, in particular one, that he was sending with presents to Mecca ; most of them were English. The East India company having represented the danger of the Mogul's taking reprisals of them for these losses, it appeared that there was a necessity of destroying those pirates, who were harbouring themselves in some creeks in Madagascar. So a man of war was to be set out to destroy them, and one Kid was pitched upon, who knew their haunts, and was thought a proper man for the service ; but there was not a fund to bear the charge of this, for the parliament had so appropriated the money given for the sea, that no part of it could be applied to this expedition. The king proposed the managing it by a private undertaking, and said he would lay down three thousand pounds himself, and recommended it to his ministers to find out the rest. In compliance with this, the lord Somers, the earls of Orford, Rumney, Bellamont, and some others, contributed the whole expense ; for the king excused himself, by reason of other accidents, and did not advance the sum that he had promised. Lord Somers understood nothing of the matter, and left it wholly to the management of others, so that he never saw Kid, only he thought it became the post he was in to concur in such a public service. A grant was made to the undertakers, of all that should be taken from those pirates by their ship. Here was a handle for complaint, for as it was against law to take a grant of the goods of any offenders before conviction, so a parity between that and this case was urged ; but without any reason : the provisions of law being very different, in the case of pirates and that of other criminals. The former cannot be attacked, but in the way of war ; and therefore, since those who undertook this must run a great risk in executing it, it was reasonable, and according to the law of war, that they should have a right to all that they found in the enemies' hands ; whereas those who seize common offenders, have such a strength by the law to assist them, and incur so little danger in doing it, that no just inference can be drawn from the one case to the other. When this Kid was thus set out, he turned pirate himself : so a heavy load was cast on the ministry, chiefly on him who was at the head of the justice of the nation. It was said he ought not to have engaged in such a project ; and it was maliciously insinuated, that the privateer turned pirate, in confidence of the protection of those who employed him, if he had not secret orders from them for what he did. Such black constructions are men, who are engaged in parties, apt to make of the actions of those whom they intend to disgrace, even against their own consciences ; so that an undertaking, that was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a design for robbery and piracy. This was urged in the house of commons as highly criminal, for which all who were concerned in it ought to be turned out of their employments ; and a question was put upon it, but it was rejected by a great majority*. The next attempt was to turn me out from the trust of educating the duke of Gloucester. Some objected my being a Scotchman, others remembered the book that was ordered to be burnt ; so they pressed an address to the king for removing me from that post ; but this was likewise lost by the same majority that had carried the former vote. The pay for the small army, and the expense of the fleet, were settled, and a fund was given for it : yet those who had reduced the army, thought it needless to have so great a force at sea ; they provided only for eight thousand men. This was moved by the tories, and the whigs readily gave way to this reduction, because the fleet was now in another management; Russel (now earl of Orford), with his friends, being laid aside, and a set of tories being brought into their places.

The great business of this session was the report brought from Ireland by four of the seven commissioners, that were sent by parliament to examine into the confiscations and the grants made of them. Three of the seven refused to sign it, because they thought it false and ill grounded in many particulars, of which they sent over an account to both houses; but no regard was had to that, nor was any enquiry made into their objections to the report. These three were looked on as men gained by the court; and the rest were magnified, as men that could not be wrought on nor frightened from their duty. They had proceeded like inquisitors, and did readily believe every thing that was offered to them that tended to inflame the report; as they suppressed all that was laid before them that contradicted their design of representing the value of the grants as very high, and of showing how undeserving those were who had obtained them. There was so much truth in the main of this, that no complaints against their proceedings could be hearkened to; and indeed all the methods that were taken to disgrace the report had the quite contrary effect: they represented the confiscated estates to be such, that, out of the sale of them, a million and a half might be raised: so this specious proposition, for discharging so great a part of the public debt, took with the house. The hatred into which the favourites were fallen, among whom and their creatures the grants were chiefly distributed, made the motion go the quicker. All the opposition that was made in the whole progress of this matter, was looked on as a courting the men in favour; nor was any regard paid to the reserve of a third part, to be disposed of by the king, which had been in the bill that was sent up eight years before to the lords. When this was mentioned, it was answered, that the grantees had enjoyed those estates so many years, that the mean profits did arise to more than a third part of their value: little regard also was shown to the purchases made under those grants, and to the great improvements made by the purchasers, or tenants, which were said to have doubled the value of those estates. All that was said on that head made no impression, and was scarcely heard with patience: yet, that some justice might be done both to purchasers and creditors, a number of trustees were named, in whom all the confiscated estates were vested, and they had a very great and uncontrollable authority lodged with them, of hearing and determining all just claims relating to those estates, and of selling them to the best purchasers; and the money to be raised by this sale was appropriated to pay the arrears of the army. When all this was digested into a bill, the party apprehended that many petitions would be offered to the house, which the court would probably encourage on design at least to retard their proceedings: so, to prevent this, and that they might not lose too much time, nor clog the bill with too many clauses and provisos, they passed a vote of a very extraordinary nature; that they would receive no petitions relating to the matter of this bill. The case of the earl of Athlone's grant was very singular: the house of commons had been so sensible of his good service, in reducing Ireland, that they had made an address to the king, to give him a recompense suitable to his services: and the parliament of Ireland was so sensible of their obligations to him, that they, as was formerly told, confirmed his grant of between 2000*l.* and 3000*l.* a-year. He had sold it to those who thought they purchased under an unquestionable title, yet all that was now set aside, no regard being had to it; so that this estate was thrown into the heap. Some exceptions were made in the bill in favour of some grants, and provision was made for rewarding others, whom the king, as they thought, had not enough considered. Great opposition was made to this by some, who thought that all favours and grants ought to be given by the king, and not originally by a house of parliament; and this was managed with great heat, even by some of those who concurred in carrying on the bill: in conclusion it was, by a new term as well as a new invention, consolidated with the money bill that was to go for the pay of the fleet and army, and so it came up to the house of Lords; which by consequence they must either pass or reject. The method that the court took in that house to oppose it, was to offer some alterations that were indeed very just and reasonable; but since the house of commons would not suffer the lords to alter money bills, this was in effect to lose it. The court, upon some previous votes, found they had a majority among the lords: so, for some days, it seemed to be designed to lose the bill, and to venture on a prorogation, or a dissolution, rather than pass it. Upon the apprehensions of this, the commons were beginning to fly out into high votes, both against the ministers and the favourites. The lord Somers was attacked a second time, but was brought off by a greater majority than had appeared for him at the beginning of the session. During the debates about the bill he was ill; and the worst construction possible was put on that: it was said he advised all the opposition that was made to it in the house of lords, but that, to keep himself out of it, he feigned that he was ill; though his great attendance in the court of chancery, the house of lords, and at the council table, had so impaired his health, that every year, about that time, he used to be brought very low, and disabled from business. The king seemed resolved to venture on all the ill consequences that might follow the losing this bill; though those would probably have been fatal. As far as we could judge, either another session of that parliament, or a new one, would have banished the favourites, and begun the bill anew, with the addition of obliging the grantees to refund all the mean profits. Many in the house of lords, that in all other things were very firm to the king, were for passing this bill, notwithstanding the king's earnestness against it, since they apprehended the ill consequences that were likely to follow if it was lost. I was one of these, and the king was much displeased with me for it. I said I would venture his displeasure rather than please him in that, which I feared would be the ruin of his government. I confess I did not at that time apprehend what injustice lay under many of the clauses in the bill, which appeared afterwards so evidently, that the very same persons who drove on the bill were convinced of them, and redressed some of them in acts that passed in subsequent sessions. If I had understood that matter aright, and in time, I had never given my vote for so unjust a bill. I only considered it as a hardship put on the king, many of his grants being thus made void; some of which had not been made on good and reasonable considerations, so that they could hardly be excused, much less justified. I thought the thing was a sort of force, to which it seemed reasonable to give way at that time, since we were not furnished with an equal strength to withstand it: but when I saw afterwards, what the consequences of this act proved to be, I did firmly resolve never to consent again to any tack to a money bill as long as I lived. The king became sullen upon all this, and upon the many incidents that are apt to fall in upon debates of this nature: he either did not apprehend in what such things might end, or he was not much concerned at it: his resentment, which was much provoked, broke out into some instances, which gave such handles to his enemies as they wished for; and they improved those advantages, which his ill conduct gave them, with much spite and industry, so as to alienate the nation from him. It was once in agitation among the party to make an address to him against going beyond sea, but even that was diverted with a malicious design. Hitherto the body of the nation retained a great measure of affection to him: this was beginning to diminish, by his going so constantly beyond sea as soon as the session of parliament was ended; though the war was now over. Upon this it grew to be publicly said, that he loved no Englishman's face, nor his company. So his enemies reckoned it was fit for their ends to let that prejudice go on and increase in the minds of the people, till they might find a proper occasion to graft some bad designs upon it. The session ended in April; men of all sides being put into a very ill humour by the proceedings in it*.

The leaders of the tories began to insinuate to the favourites, the necessity of the king's

* The commissioners, who had been sent to inquire concerning the grants of the Irish forfeited estates, were the earl of Drogheda, sir Richard Leving, sir Francis Brewster, Mr. Annesley, Mr. Trenchard, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Langford. The three first were whigs, and had refused to sign the report; the others were zealous tories. There is no doubt that a large portion of the forfeitures had been given to the king's Dutch supporters, and a large part of the ex king's estates had been bestowed upon William's mistress. This was ill-judged, and offensive to the nation. The debates upon the bill of resumption were violent and lengthy in both houses, and it was not until the king directed his friends not to persist in their opposition, that it was passed in the house of lords. When he gave the royal assent to it, and put an end to the session, with becoming dignity he did not accompany the dismissal with the usual speech.—Shrewsbury Correspondence; Smollett's Hist. of England; Journals of the houses.

changing his ministry, in particular of removing the lord Somers, who, as he was now considered as the head of the whigs, so his wise counsels, and his modest way of laying them before the king had gained him a great share of his esteem and confidence; and it was reckoned that the chief strength of the party lay in his credit with the king, and in the prudent methods he took to govern the party, and to moderate that heat and those jealousies, with which the king had been so long disgusted in the first years of his reign. In the house of commons he had been particularly charged for turning many gentlemen out of the commission of the peace: this was much aggravated, and raised a very high complaint against him; but there was no just cause for it. When the design of the assassination and invasion, in the years 1695 and 1696, was discovered, a voluntary association was entered into by both houses of parliament, and that was set round the nation. In such a time of danger, it was thought that those who did not enter voluntarily into it, were so ill affected, or at least so little zealous for the king, that it was not fit they should continue justices of peace: so an order passed in council, that all those who had so refused should be turned out of the commission: he had obeyed this order, upon the representations made to him by the lords-lieutenants and the custodes rotulorum of the several counties, who were not all equally discreet: yet he laid those representations before the council, and had a special order for every person that was so turned out. All this was now magnified, and it was charged on him that he had advised and procured these orders; yet this could not be made so much as a colour to proceed against him, a clamour and murmuring was all that could be raised from it. But now the tories studied to get it infused into the king, that all the hard things that had been of late put on him by the parliament, were occasioned by the hatred that was borne to his ministers; and that, if he would change hands and employ others, matters might be softened and mended in another parliament: with this the earl of Jersey studied to possess the earl of Albermarle; and the uneasiness the king was in, disposed him to think, that if he should bring in a set of tories into his business, they would serve him with the same zeal, and with better success than the whigs had done; and he hoped to throw all upon the ministers that were now to be dismissed.

The first time that the lord Somers had recovered so much health as to come to court, the king told him it seemed necessary for his service that he should part with the seals, and he wished that he would make the delivering them up his own act. He excused himself in this: all his friends had pressed him not to offer them, since that seemed to show fear or guilt; so he begged the king's pardon if in this he followed their advice; but he told the king, that whensoever he should send a warrant under his hand, commanding him to deliver them up, he would immediately obey it. The order was brought by lord Jersey, and upon it the seals were sent to the king. Thus the lord Somers was discharged from this great office, which he had held seven years, with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, and diligence; he was in all respects the greatest man I had ever known in that post: his being thus removed was much censured by all but those who had procured it. Our princes used not to dismiss ministers who served them well, unless they were pressed to it by a house of commons, that refused to give money till they were laid aside. But here a minister (who was always vindicated by a great majority in the house of commons when he was charged there, and who had served both with fidelity and success, and was indeed censured for nothing so much as for his being too compliant with the king's humour and notions, or at least for being too soft or too feeble in representing his errors to him,) was removed without a shadow of complaint against him. This was done with so much haste, that those who had prevailed with the king to do it, had not yet concerted who should succeed him: they thought that all the great men of the law were aspiring to that high post, so that any one to whom it should be offered would certainly accept of it: but they soon found they were mistaken; for, what by reason of the instability of the court, what by reason of the just apprehensions men might have of succeeding so great a man, both Holt and Trevor, to whom the seals were offered, excused themselves. It was term time, so a vacancy in that post put things in some confusion. A temporary commission was granted to the three chief judges, to judge in the court of chancery; and after a few days the seals were given to sir Nathan Wright, in whom there was nothing equal to the post, much less to him who had lately filled it*. The king's inclinations seemed now turned to the tories, and to a new parliament: it was for some time in the dark who had the confidence, and gave directions to affairs: we who looked on were often disposed to think that there was no direction at all, but that every thing was left to take its course, and that all was given up to hazard.

The king, that he might give some content to the nation, stayed at Hampton Court till July, and then went to Holland: but, before he went, the minister of Sweden pressed him to make good his engagements with that crown. Riga was now besieged by the king of Poland: the first attempt of carrying the place by surprise miscarried; those of Riga were either overawed by the Swedish garrison that commanded there, or they apprehended that the change of masters would not change their condition, unless it were for the worse. So they made a greater stand than was expected; and in a siege of above eight months very little progress was made: the firmness of that place made the rest of Livonia continue fixed to the Swedes. The Saxons made great waste in the country, and ruined the trade of Riga. The king of Sweden, being obliged to employ his main force elsewhere, was not able to send them any considerable assistance. The elector of Brandenburg lay quiet without making any attempt: so did the prince of Hesse and Wolfembüttel. The two scenes of action were in Holstein and before Copenhagen. The king of Denmark found the taking the forts that had been raised by the duke of Holstein an easy work: they were soon carried and demolished: he besieged Toninghen next, which held him longer. Upon the Swedes' demand of the auxiliary fleets, that were stipulated both by the king and the States, orders were given for equipping them here, and likewise in Holland. The king was not willing to communicate this design to the two houses, and try if the house of commons would take upon themselves the expense of the fleet: they were in so bad a humour, that the king apprehended that some of them might endeavour to put an affront upon him, and oppose the sending a fleet into the Sound: though others advised the venturing on this, for no nation can subsist without alliances sacredly observed: and this was an ancient one, lately renewed by the king; so that an opposition in such a point, must have turned to the prejudice of those who should move it. Soon after the session, a fleet of thirty ships, English and Dutch, was sent to the Baltic, commanded by Rook. The Danes had a good fleet at sea, much superior to the Swedes, and almost equal to the fleet sent from hence; but it was their whole strength, so they would not run the hazard of losing it. They kept at sea for some time, having got between the Swedes and the fleet of their allies, and studied to hinder their conjunction. When they saw that could not be done, they retired, and secured themselves within the port of Copenhagen, which is a very strong one. The Swedes, with their allies, came before that town and bombarded it for some days, but with little damage to the place, and none to the fleet. The dukes of Luncenburg, together with the forces that the Swedes had at Bremen, passed the Elbe, and marched to the assistance of the duke of Holstein. This obliged the Danes to raise the siege of Toninghen, and the two armies lay in view of one another for some weeks, without coming to any action. Another design of the Danes did also miscarry. A body of Saxons broke into the territories of the duke of Brunswick, in hopes to force their army to come back to the defence of their own country: but the duke of Zell had left things in so good order, that the Saxons were beat back, and all the booty that they had taken was recovered.

* Sir Nathan Wright would never have attained the high office to which he was promoted, by his own merits. He was thrown and left upon an elevation by the tide of fortune; and preceded by Somers, as he was followed by Cowper, was a most striking foil to two of the most talented holders of our chancery seals. He rested on a seat not too elevated for his ambition, but it was an imperium far beyond the compass of his mind. He has been succinctly described as "a good common lawyer, a slow chancellor, and a civilian; plain both in person and conversation." In another part of this work, with the excessive prejudice of a political adversary, Burnet has also impugned sir Nathan's honesty and integrity. This is not supported by any known facts, and one contradictory narrative deserves to be recited. A watchmaker, having a cause depending in chancery, sent to the lord-keeper a very fine timepiece some few days before the case came to be heard; but sir Nathan returned it with the admonitory message, "I have no doubt of the goodness of the piece, but it has one motion in it too much for me." He was turned out of office in 1705, and died almost forgotten at Cancot Hall, Warwickshire, in 1721. He was promoted at the suggestion of the earl of Rochester.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger; Shrewsbury Correspondence.

In the meantime, the king offered his mediation, and a treaty was set on foot. The two young kings were so much sharpened against one another, that it was not easy to bring them to hearken to terms of peace. The king of Denmark proposed that the king of Poland might be included in the treaty, but the Swedes refused it: and the king was not guarantee of the treaties between Sweden and Poland, so he was not obliged to take care of the king of Poland. The treaty went on but slowly: this made the king of Sweden apprehend that he should lose the season, and be forced to abandon Riga, which began to be straitened: so to quicken the treaty he resolved on a descent in Zealand. This was executed without any opposition, the king of Sweden conducting it in person, and being the first that landed: he showed such spirit and courage in his whole conduct as raised his character very high: it struck a terror through all Denmark: for now the Swedes resolved to besiege Copenhagen. This did so quicken the treaty, that, by the middle of August, it was brought to a full end: old treaties were renewed, and a liberty of fortifying was reserved for Holstein, under some limitations: and the king of Denmark paid the duke of Holstein two hundred and sixty thousand rix-dollars for the charge of the war. The peace being thus made, the Swedes retired back to Schonen, and the fleets of England and Holland returned home. The king's conduct in this whole matter was highly applauded; he effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reasonable terms of peace. The king of Denmark suffered most in honour and interest. It was a great happiness that this war was so soon at an end; for, if it had continued, all the North must have engaged in it, and there the chief strength of the protestant religion lay: so that interest must have suffered much, which side soever had come by the worst, in the progress of the war; and it is already so weak, that it needed not a new diminution.

The secret of the partition treaty was now published, and the project was to be offered jointly, by the ministers of France, England, and the States, to all the princes of Europe; but particularly to those who were most concerned in it: and an answer was to be demanded by a day limited for it. The emperor refused to declare himself till he knew the king of Spain's mind concerning it. The duke of Savoy and the princes of Italy were very apprehensive of the neighbourhood of France. The pope was extremely old, and declined very fast. The treaty was variously censured: some thought it would deliver up the Mediterranean sea and all our trade there, into the hands of France: others thought that the treaties of princes were (according to the pattern that the court of France had set now for almost half an age,) only artifices to bring matters to a present quiet, and that they would be afterwards observed as princes found their account in them. The present good understanding that was between our court and the court of France, made that the party of our malcontents at home, having no support from thence, sunk much in their heat, and they had now no prospect; for it seemed as if the king of France had set his heart on the partition treaty, and it was necessary for him, in order to the obtaining his ends in it, to live in a good correspondence with England and the States. All our hopes were that the king of Spain might yet live a few years longer, till the great mortgages that were on the revenue might be cleared, and then it would be more easy for us to engage in a new war, and to be the arbiters of Europe.

But while we were under the apprehension of his death, we were surprised by an unlooked-for and sudden death of our young prince at home, which brought a great change on the face of affairs. I had been trusted with his education now for two years, and he had made an amazing progress. I had read over the Psalms, Proverbs, and Gospels, with him, and had explained things that fell in my way very copiously; and was often surprised with the questions that he put me, and the reflections that he made. He came to understand things relating to religion beyond imagination. I went through geography so often with him, that he knew all the maps very particularly. I explained to him the forms of government in every country, with the interests and trade of that country, and what was both good and bad in it: I acquainted him with all the great revolutions that had been in the world, and gave him a copious account of the Greek and Roman Histories, and of Plutarch's Lives: the last thing I explained to him was the Gothic constitution, and the beneficiary and fœdal laws. I talked of these things at different times nearly three hours a day: this was both easy and delighting to him. The king ordered five of his chief ministers to come once a quarter, and examine the progress he made: they seemed amazed both at his knowledge and the good understanding that appeared in him. He had a wonderful memory, and a very good judgment. He had gone through much weakness and some years of ill health. The princess was with child of him during all the disorder we were in at the revolution, though she did not know it herself at the time when she left the court: this probably had given him so weak a constitution, but we hoped the dangerous time was over. His birthday was the 24th of July, and he was then eleven years old: he complained a little the next day, but we imputed that to the fatigues of a birthday; so that he was too much neglected. The day after, he grew much worse, and it proved to be a malignant fever. He died the fourth day of his illness, to the great grief of all who were concerned in him. He was the only remaining child of seventeen that the princess had borne, some to the full time, and the rest before it. She attended on him, during his sickness, with great tenderness, but with a grave composedness that amazed all who saw it: she bore his death with a resignation and piety that were indeed very singular. His death gave a great alarm to the whole nation: the jacobites grew insolent upon it, and said, now the chief difficulty was removed out of the way of the prince of Wales's succession. Soon after this, the house of Brunswick returned the visit that the king had made them last year, and the eyes of all the protestants in the nation turned towards the electress of Brunswick, who was daughter to the queen of Bohemia, and was the next protestant heir; all papists being already excluded from the succession. Thus, of the four lives that we had in view as our chief security, the two that we depended most on, the queen and the duke of Gloucester, were carried off on the sudden, before we were aware of it; and of the two that remained (the king and the princess), as there was no issue, and little hopes of any by either of them; so the king, who at best was a man of a feeble constitution, was now falling under an ill habit of body: his legs were much swelled, which some thought was the beginning of a dropsy, while others thought it was only a scorbutic distemper.

Thus God was giving us great alarms as well as many mercies. He bears long with us, but we are become very corrupt in all respects: so that the state of things among us gives a melancholy prospect. The nation was falling under a general discontent, and a dislike of the king's person and government: and the king, on his part, seemed to grow weary of us and of our affairs; and partly by the fret, from the opposition he had of late met with, partly from his ill health, he was falling as it were into a lethargy of mind. We were, upon the matter, become already more than half a commonwealth; since the government was plainly in the hands of the house of commons, who must sit once a year, and as long as they thought fit, while the king had only the civil list for life, so that the whole administration of the government was under their inspection; the act for triennial parliaments kept up a standing faction in every county and town of England: but, though we were falling insensibly into a democracy, we had not learned the virtues that are necessary for that sort of government: luxury, vanity, and ambition, increased daily, and our animosities were come to a great height, and gave us dismal apprehensions. Few among us seemed to have a right notion of the love of their country, and of a zeal for the good of the public. The house of commons, how much soever its power was advanced, yet was much sunk in its credit; very little of gravity, order, or common decency, appeared among them: the balance lay chiefly in the house of lords, who had no natural strength to resist the commons. The toleration of all the sects among us had made us live more quietly together of late than could be expected, when severe laws were rigorously executed against dissenters. No tumults or disorders had been heard of in any part of the kingdom these eleven years since that act passed: and yet the much greater part of the clergy studied to blow up this fire again, which seemed to be now as it were covered over with ashes.

The dissenters behaved themselves more quietly with relation to the church, they having quarrels and disputes among themselves: the independents were raising the old antinomian tenets, as if men, by believing in Christ, were so united to him, that his righteousness became theirs, without any other condition besides that of their faith: so that, though they acknowledged the obedience of his laws to be necessary, they did not call it a condition, but only a consequence, of justification. In this they were opposed by most of the presbyterians, who seemed to be sensible that this struck at the root of all religion, as it weakened the obligation to a holy life: this year had produced a new extravagance in that matter. One Asgil, a member of parliament, had published a book grounded on their notions, on which he had grafted a new and wild inference of his own, that since true believers recovered in Christ all that they lost in Adam, and our natural death was the effect of Adam's sin, he inferred that believers were rendered immortal by Christ, and not liable to death; and that those who believed with a true and firm faith could not die. This was a strain beyond all that ever went before it; and, since we see that all men die, the natural consequence that resulted from this was, that there neither are, nor ever were, any true believers. The presbyterians had been also engaged in disputes with the anabaptists. They complained that they saw too great a giddiness in their people, and seemed so sensible of this, and so desirous to be brought into the church, that a few inconsiderable concessions would very probably have brought the bulk of them into our communion: but the greater part of the clergy were so far from any disposition this way, that they seemed to be more prejudiced against them than ever.

The quakers have had a great breach made among them by one George Keith, a Scotchman, with whom I had my first education at Aberdeen: he had been thirty-six years among them: he was esteemed the most learned man that ever was in that sect: he was well versed both in the oriental tongues, in philosophy, and mathematics: after he had been above thirty years in high esteem among them, he was sent to Pennsylvania (a colony set up by Penn, where they are very numerous), to have the chief direction of the education of their youth. In those parts, he said, he first discovered that which had been always either denied to him, or so disguised that he did not suspect it: but being far out of reach, and in a place where they were masters, they spoke out their mind plainer; and it appeared to him that they were deists, and that they turned the whole doctrine of the Christian religion into allegories; chiefly those which relate to the death and resurrection of Christ, and the reconciliation of sinners to God by virtue of his cross. He, being a true Christian, set himself with great zeal against this, upon which they grew weary of him, and sent him back to England. At his return, he set himself to read many of their books, and then he discovered the mystery which was formerly so hid from him that he had not observed it. Upon this he opened a new meeting, and by a printed summons he called the whole party to come and see the proof that he had to offer, to convince them of these errors: few quakers came to his meetings, but great multitudes of other people flocked about him: he brought the quakers' books with him, and read such passages out of them as convinced his hearers that he had not charged them falsely. He continued these meetings, being still in outward appearance a quaker, for some years; till having prevailed as far as he saw any probability of success, he laid aside their exterior, and was reconciled to the church, and is now in holy orders among us, and likely to do good service in undeceiving and reclaiming some of those misled enthusiasts*.

The clergy continued to be much divided: all moderate divines were looked upon by some hot men with an evil eye, as persons who were cold and indifferent in the matters of the church: that which flowed from a gentleness, both of temper and principle, was represented as an inclination to favour dissenters, which passed among many for a more heinous thing than leaning to popery itself. Those men, who began now to be called the high church party, had all along expressed a coldness, if not an opposition, to the present settlement. Soon after the revolution some great preferments had been given among them, to try if it was possible to bring them to be hearty for the government; but it appearing that they were soured with a leaven, that had gone too deep to be wrought out, a stop was put to the courting them any more. When they saw preferments went in another channel, they set up a complaint over England of the want of convocations, that they were not allowed to sit, nor act, with a free liberty, to consider of the grievances of the clergy, and of the danger the church was in. This was a new pretension, never thought of since the Reformation. Some books were written to justify it, with great acrimony of style and a strain of insolence that was peculiar to one Atterbury, who had indeed very good parts, great learning, and was an excellent preacher, and had many extraordinary things in him; but was both ambitious and virulent out of measure; and had a singular talent in asserting paradoxes with a great air of assurance, showing no shame when he was detected in them, though this was done in many instances: but he let all these pass, without either confessing his errors or pretending to justify himself: he went on still venting new falsehoods in so barefaced a manner, that he seemed to have outdone the Jesuits themselves. He thought the government had so little strength or credit, that any claim against it would be well received; he attacked the supremacy of the crown, with relation to ecclesiastical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our divines with great zeal. But now the hot men of the clergy did so readily entertain his notions, that in them it appeared, that those who are the most earnest in the defence of certain points, when these seem to be for them, can very nimbly change their minds upon a change of circumstances*.

An eminent instance of this had appeared in the house of lords, in the former session, where the deprived bishop of St. David's complained of the archbishop of Canterbury: first, for breach of privilege, since sentence was passed upon him, though he had in court claimed privilege of parliament, to which no regard had been paid; but as he had waived his privilege in the house of lords, it was carried, after a long debate, and by no great majority, that in that case he could not resume his privilege. He excepted next to the archbishop's jurisdiction, and pretended that he could not judge a bishop but in a synod of the bishops of the province, according to the rules of the primitive times: in opposition to this, it was shown that, from the ninth and tenth century downward, both popes and kings had concurred to bring this power singly into the hands of the metropolitans; that this was the constant practice in England before the Reformation; that by the provisional clause in the act passed in the twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, that empowered thirty-two persons to draw a new body of church laws, all former laws or customs were to continue in force till that new body was prepared: so that the power the metropolitan then was possessed of stood confirmed by that clause: it is true, during the high commission, all proceedings against bishops were brought before that court, which proceeded in a summary way, and against whose sentence no appeal lay: but, after that court was taken away, a full declaration was made, by an act of parliament, for continuing the power that was lodged with the metropolitan. It was also urged, that if the bishop had any exception to the archbishop's jurisdiction, that ought to have been pleaded in the first instance, and not reserved to the conclusion of all: nor could the archbishop erect a new court, or proceed in the trial of a bishop in any other way than in that which was warranted by law or precedent. To all this no answer was given, but the business was kept up, and put off by many delays. It was said, the thing was * Sterne, the sentimentalist, treated his wife with unmerited unkindness; Sheridan wrote in favour of morality, and spoke vehemently against turpitude; Atterbury, mentioned in the text, declares in his letters that he was devoted to a few friends and literary leisure, when it is certain that a more bigoted theologian, or more ambitious statesman, never lived. To the praise given him by Burnet, confined to his talents, may be added, that he was a kind father, and an attached friend. Francis Atterbury, born at Middleton, or Milton-keynes, Buckinghamshire, in 1662, proceeded in his course of education to Westminster school, and Christchurch college, Oxford. From his youth he was distinguished for his literary excellence, and this never deteriorated, any more than his proneness to controversy, which appeared when he was twenty-four. His defence of Luther was the only instance in which, as a disputant, he was triumphant. His polemical opinions were too narrow, his political tenets too slavish, for him to stand firm against Dr. Hoadley, the champion of Christian and civil liberty. Atterbury dazzled by his wit, but Hoadley plainly stated the truth—so the first gained applause, and the other secured conviction. The most lengthy of his controversies was with Dr. Wake, concerning the rights, &c. of convocations, a subject which has now little interest; but those who would engage in the enquiry will find an ample reference to authorities in Dr. Kippis's edition of the Biographia Britannica, article "Atterbury." When the extreme tory party came into power, during the reign of Anne, Atterbury was made bishop of Rochester. This was in 1713. But when other counsels were adopted at the accession of George the First, he shewed his disaffection by refusing to join in signing the declaration against the claims of the pretender. He also persuaded Dr. Smallridge, bishop of Bristol, not to subscribe. In 1722 he was apprehended on a charge of being concerned in a plot to restore the Stuarts to the throne. The evidence did not sufficiently substantiate the charge of high treason, so a bill was passed by the parliament to visit him with the punishment of banishment. The chief opposition to this was founded upon its being an extraordinary mode of proceeding, and upon the want of full evidence. The latter deficiency is now removed, for testimony has since been brought to light that proves the bishop's disloyalty to the house of Hanover beyond a doubt. He retired to France, where he died in 1731. His sermons and letters are excellent—Stackhouse's Memoirs of Atterbury; Wood's Athenæ Oxon; Boyer's Hist. of Queen Anne.

new, and the house was not yet well apprised of it; and the last time in which the debate was taken up in the house, it ended in an intimation that it was hoped the king would not fill that see, till the house should be better satisfied in the point of the archbishop's authority. So the bishopric was not disposed of for some years: and this uncertainty put a great delay to the process against the other Welch bishops accused of the same crime.

In October, the pope died; and at the same time all Europe was alarmed with the desperate state of the king of Spain's health. When the news came to the court of France that he was in the last agony, the earl of Manchester, who was then our ambassador at that court, told me that M. Torey, the French secretary of state, was sent to him by the king of France, desiring him to let the king, his master, know the news, and to signify to him that the French king hoped that he would put things in readiness to execute the treaty, in case any opposition should be made to it: and in his whole discourse he expressed a fixed resolution in the French councils to adhere to it. A few days after that, the news came of his death and of his will, declaring the duke of Anjou the universal heir of the whole Spanish monarchy. It is not yet certainly known by what means this was brought about, nor how the king of Spain was drawn to consent to it, or whether it was a mere forgery, made by cardinal Portocarrero and some of the grandees, who, partly by practice and corruption, and partly for safety, and that their monarchy might be kept entire (they imagining that the power of France was far superior to all that the house of Austria would be able to engage in its interests), had been prevailed on to prepare and publish this will; and, to make it more acceptable to the Spaniards, among other forfeitures of the crown, not only the successor's departing from what they call the catholic faith, but even his not maintaining the immaculate conception of the Virgin, was one.

As soon as the news came to Rome, it quickened the intrigues of the conclave, so they set up Albano, a man of fifty-two years of age, who, beyond all men's expectations, was chosen pope, and took the name of Clement the Eleventh: he had little practice in affairs, but was very learned; and, in so critical a time, it seems, a pope of courage and spirit, not sunk with age into covetousness or peevishness, was thought the fittest person for that see. France had sent no exclusion to bar him, not imagining that he could be thought on: at first they did not seem pleased with the choice, but it was too late to oppose it: so they resolved to gain him to their interests, in which they have succeeded beyond what they then hoped for. When the court of France had notice sent them of the late king of Spain's will, real or pretended, they seemed to be at a stand for some days; and the letters written from the secretary's office, gave it out for certain that the king would stick to the partition treaty. Madame de Maintenon had an unspeakable fondness for the duke of Anjou; so she prevailed with the dauphin to accept of the will, and set aside the treaty: she also engaged Pontchartrain to second this.

They being thus prepared, when the news of the king of Spain's death came to Fontainebleau, where the court was at that time, M. Spanheim, who was then there as ambassador of Prussia, told me, that a cabinet council was called within two hours after the news came; it met in Madame de Maintenon's lodgings, and sat about four hours; Pontchartrain was for accepting the will, and the rest of the ministry were for adhering to the treaty; but the dauphin joined for accepting the will, with an air of positiveness, that he had never assumed before: so it was believed to be done by concert with the king, who was reserved, and seemed more inclined to the treaty: in conclusion, madame de Maintenon said, what had the duke of Anjou done to provoke the king, to bar him of his right to that succession? and upon this all submitted to the dauphin's opinion, and the king seemed overcome with their reasons.

This was on Monday; but though the matter was resolved on, yet it was not published till Thursday; for then, at the king's levee, he declared, that he accepted of the will, and the duke of Anjou was now treated as king of Spain. Notice of this being sent to Spain, an ambassador came in form to signify the will, and to desire that their king might go and live among them. Upon which he was sent thither, accompanied by his two brothers, who went with him to the frontiers of Spain. When the court of France published this resolution, and sent it to all the courts of Europe, they added a most infamous excuse for this notorious breach of faith. they said, the king of France considered chiefly what was the main design of the treaty, which was to maintain the peace of Europe; and therefore to pursue this, he departed from the words of the treaty, but he adhered to the spirit and the chief intent of it. This seemed to be an equivocation of so gross a nature, that it looked like the invention of a jesuit confessor, adding impudence to perjury. The king and the States were struck with this; the king was full of indignation to find himself so much abused; so he came over to England to see what was to be done upon so great an emergency. The Spaniards, seeing themselves threatened with a war from the emperor, and apprehending that the empire, together with England and the United Provinces, might be engaged to join in the war, and being unable to defend themselves, delivered all into the hands of France: and upon that, both the Spanish Netherlands and the duchy of Milan received French garrisons: the French fleet came to Cadiz; a squadron was also sent to the West Indies; so that the whole Spanish empire fell now, without a stroke of the sword, into the French power. All this was the more formidable, because the duke of Burgundy had then no children, and by this means, the king of Spain was in time likely to succeed to the crown of France; and thus the world saw the appearance of a new universal monarchy, likely to arise out of this conjunction.

It might have been expected that, when such a new unlooked-for scene was opened, the king should have lost no time in bringing his parliament together as soon as possible; it was prorogued to the 20th of November, and the king had sent orders from Holland to signify his resolution for their meeting on that day; but the ministers, whom he was then bringing into his business, had other views; they thought they were not sure of a majority in parliament for their purposes, so they prevailed with the king to dissolve the parliament, and after a set of sheriffs were pricked, fit for the turn, a new parliament was summoned, to meet on the sixth day of February, but it was not opened till the tenth.

And now I am come to the end of this century, in which there was a black appearance of a new and dismal scene; France was now in possession of a great empire, for a small part of which they had been in wars (broken off indeed in some intervals) for above two hundred years; while we in England, who were to protect and defend the rest, were, by wretched factions and violent animosities, running into a feeble and disjointed state: the king's cold and reserved manner, upon so high a provocation, made some conclude, that he was in secret engagements with France; that he was resolved to own the new king of Spain, and not to engage in a new war: this seemed so different from his own inclinations, and from all the former parts of his life, that it made many conclude that he found himself in an ill state of health, the swelling of his legs being much increased, and that this might have such effects on his mind, as to make him less warm and active, less disposed to involve himself in new troubles; and that he might think it too inconsiderate a thing to enter on a new war that was not likely to end soon, when he felt himself in a declining state of health; but the true secret of this unaccountable behaviour in the king was soon discovered.

The earl of Rochester was now set at the head of his business, and was to bring the tories into his service: they had continued, from his first accession to the throne, in a constant opposition to his interests; many of them were believed to be jacobites in their hearts, and they were generally much against the toleration, and violent enemies to the dissenters; they had been backward in every thing that was necessary for carrying on the former war; they had opposed taxes as much as they could, and were against all such as were easily levied and less sensibly felt by the people; and were always for those that were most grievous to the nation, hoping that by those heavy burdens the people would grow weary of the war and of the government: on the contrary, the whigs, by supporting both, were become less acceptable to the nation: in elections their interest was much sunk; every new parliament was a new discovery that they were become less popular, and the others, who were always opposing and complaining, were now cried up as the patriots. In the three last sessions, the whigs had showed such a readiness to give the king more force, together with a management to preserve the grants of Ireland, that they were publicly charged as betrayers of their country, and as men that were for trusting the king with an army; in a word, they were accused of too ready a compliance with the humours and interests of courts and favourites, so they were generally censured and decried: and now, since they had not succeeded to the king's mind, some about him possessed him with this, that either they would not, or could not serve him. In some of them indeed, their principles lay against those things, whereas the tories' principles did naturally lead them to make the crown great and powerful; it was also said, that the great opposition made to every thing the king desired, and the difficulties that had been of late put upon him, flowed chiefly from the hatred borne to those who were employed by him, and who had brought in their friends and creatures into the best posts, and they were now studying to recover their lost popularity, which would make them cold, if not backward, in complying with what the king might desire for the future: the whigs did also begin to complain of the king's conduct, of his minding affairs so little, of his being so much out of the kingdom, and of his ill choice of favourites; and they imputed the late miscarriages to errors in conduct, which they could neither prevent nor redress: the favourites, who thought of nothing but to continue in favour, and to be still safe and secure in their credit, concurred to press the king to take other measures, and to turn to another set of men, who would be no longer his enemies, if they had some of the best places shared among them; and though this method had been almost fatal when the king had followed it, soon after his first accession to the crown, yet there seemed to be less danger in trying it now than was formerly. We were in full peace; and it was commonly said, that nobody thought any more of king James, and therefore it was fit, for the king's service, to encourage all his people to come into his interests, by letting them see how soon he could forget all that was past. These considerations had so far prevailed with him, that before he went out of England, he had engaged himself secretly to them; it is true, the death, first of the duke of Gloucester, and now of the king of Spain, had very much changed the face of affairs, both at home and abroad; yet the king would not break off from his engagements.

Soon after his return to England, the earl of Rochester was declared lord lieutenant of Ireland, and he had the chief direction of affairs*. And that the most eminent man of the whigs might not oppose them in the new parliament, they got Mr. Montague to be made a baron, who took the title of Halifax, which was sunk by the death of that marquis, without issue male. The man on whose management of the house of commons this new set depended, was Mr. Harley, the heir of a family which had been hitherto the most eminent of the presbyterian party; his education was in that way; but he, not being considered at the revolution as he thought he deserved, had set himself to oppose the court in every thing, and to find fault with the whole administration. He had the chief hand, both in the reduction of the army, and in the matter of the Irish grants: the high party trusted him, though he still kept up an interest among the presbyterians; and he had so particular a dexterity, that he made both the high church party and the dissenters depend upon him; so it was agreed that he should be speaker†. All this while, the new ministers talked of nothing but negotiations, and gave it out, that the king of France was ready to give all the security that could be desired, for maintaining the peace of Europe. At this time the emperor sent over * Rochester, we have seen, was reconciled to queen Mary by the influence of Burnet; he was restored to the favour of the king by Mr. Harley.—Clarendon Correspondence.

† It will be only necessary to detail in this note the early and concluding events of Mr. Harley's life. Those which marked his mid-career are related by Burnet. Robert Harley, born in Bow-street, Covent Garden, during 1661, was the son of sir Edward Harley. Being destined for the army, it does not appear to have been thought requisite to send him to an university, and his education ceased at a private school in Oxfordshire. He is thus an instance that a man's fondness for, and excellence in literary attainments, depend chiefly upon himself; for he not only is the still remembered patron of learning, but excelled as a writer. Upon the landing of William, he, in common with his father and brothers, made exertions in his favour; but from some disgust did not obtain employment under William and Mary, though he came into favour at the closing of the former's life. No one understood better the duties of the speaker of the house of commons. His eloquence was artificial: he never made confidants, so his plans as a statesman were rarely discovered before his own appointed time. Sanguine in his temperament, yet he had a perfect command over his passion. Abounding in wit and humour, he justly applauded it when even employed upon himself, and rebuked those who resented such playful freedoms. He was a strict dissenter, though a leader of the tories; and although among his chaplains he always had one of the established church. Although he cherished the dissenters, yet churchmen admired and supported him. Just before the death of queen Anne, in 1714, he retired from office, and the next year afforded another instance of popular fickleness, being impeached by the house of commons, and confined two years in the Tower, though eventually acquitted. He died in 1724. His books, the catalogue of which fills four octavo volumes, were sold by auction; but his collection of MSS. fortunately are preserved entire in the British Museum.—Collins's Peerage; Noble's Contin. of Grainger; Boyer's Queen Anne; Coxe's Memoirs of Marlborough, &c.

to England a minister to set forth his title to the Spanish monarchy, settled on his house by ancient entails, often repeated, and now devolving on him by an undoubted right, since by the renunciation made by the late queen of France, (as was stipulated by the treaty of the Pyrenees, and then made by her in due form) this could not be called in question. Our new ministers were scarcely civil to the emperor's envoy, and would not enter into any consultations with him: but the Dutch who were about the king, and all the foreign ministers, spoke in another style; they said that nothing but a general union of all the powers in Europe, could hinder the conjunction of the two monarchies; so, by what those who talked often with the king gave out, it came to be soon known that the king saw the necessity of a new war, but that he kept himself in a great reserve that he might manage his new ministers and their party, and see if he could engage them to concur with him.

But before I conclude the relation of this year, at which the century ends, I must close it with an account of the king of Sweden's glorious campaign; he made all the haste he could to relieve Livonia, where not only Riga was for some months besieged by the king of Poland, but Narva was also attacked by the czar, who hoped by taking it to get an entrance into the Baltic: the czar came in person against it with an army of one hundred thousand men: Narva was not provided for a siege; it had a small garrison, and had very poor magazines, yet the Muscovites attacked it so feebly, that it held out beyond all expectation till the end of the year. Upon the king of Sweden's landing at Revel, the Saxons drew off from Riga, after a long siege at a vast charge; this being done, and Riga both opened and supplied, that king marched next to Narva. The czar, upon his march towards him, left his army in such a manner as made all people conclude he had no mind to hazard his person; the king marched through ways that were thought so impracticable, that little care had been taken to secure them; so he surprised the Muscovites, and broke into their camp before they apprehended he was near them; he totally routed their army, took many prisoners, with all their artillery and baggage, and so made a glorious entry into Narva*. This is the noblest campaign that we find in any history, in which a king about eighteen years of age led an army himself against three kings, who had confederated against him, and was successful in every one of his attempts, giving great marks both of personal courage and good conduct in them all; and which is more extraordinary, an eminent measure both of virtue and piety appeared in his whole behaviour. In him the world hoped to see another Gustavus Adolphus, who conquered, or rather possessed himself of Livonia, in the same year of his age, in which this king did now so gloriously recover it, when almost lost by the invasion of two powerful neighbours. There were great disorders at this time in Lithuania, occasioned by the factions there, which were set on and fomented by the king, who seemed to aspire to be the hereditary king of Poland. But as these things are at a great distance from us, so since we have no public minister in those parts, I cannot give an account of them, nor form a true judgment thereupon. The eighteenth century began with a great scene, that opened with it.

The new king of Spain wrote to all the courts of Europe, giving notice of his accession to that crown, only he forgot England: and it was publicly given out that he had promised the pretended prince of Wales, that in due time he would take care of his interests: the king and the States were much alarmed when they beheld the French possessed of the Spanish Netherlands: a great part of the Dutch army lay scattered up and down in those garrisons, more particularly in Luxemburg, Namur, and Mons, and these were now made prisoners of war: neither officers nor soldiers could own the king of Spain, for their masters had not yet done it: at this time the French pressed the States very hard to declare themselves; a great party in the States were for owning him, at least in form, till they could get their troops again into their own hands, according to capitulation; nor were they then in a condition to resist the impression that might have been made upon them from the garrisons in the Spanish Guelder, who could have attacked them before they were able to make head: so the States consented to own the king of Spain. That being done, their battalions were sent back, but they were ill used, contrary to capitulation, and the soldiers were tempted to desert their service, yet very few could be prevailed on to do it.

As soon as our parliament was opened, it appeared that the French had a great party in it ; it is certain great sums came over this winter from France ; the packet-boat came seldom without 10,000 louis-d'or ; it brought often more : the nation was filled with them, and in six months' time, a million of guineas were coined out of them : the merchants indeed said, that the balance of trade was then so much turned to our side, that, whereas we were wont to carry over a million of our money in specie, we then sent no money to France ; and had at least half that sum sent over to balance the trade ; yet this did not account for that vast flood of French gold that was visible amongst us : and, upon the French ambassador's going away, a very sensible alteration was found in the bills of exchange : so it was concluded that great remittances were made to him, and that these were distributed among those who resolved to merit a share in that wealth, which came over now so copiously beyond the example of former times. The king, in his speech to the parliament, in the most effectual manner possible, recommended the settling the succession of the crown, in the protestant line ; and with relation to foreign affairs, he laid them before the two houses that they might offer him such advices as the state of the nation and her alliances required ; but he did not so much as intimate to them his own thoughts concerning them. A design was laid in the house of commons, to open the session with an address to the king, that he would own the king of Spain : the matter was so far concerted, that they had agreed on the words of the vote, and seemed not to doubt of the concurrence of the house ; but Mr. Monkton opposed it with great heat, and among other things said, that if that vote was carried, he should expect that the next vote to be put, would be for owning the pretended prince of Wales : upon this occasion it appeared, how much popular assemblies are apt to be turned by a thing boldly said, though the consequence is ever so remote ; since the connection of these two points lay at some distance, yet the issue of the debate was quite contrary to that which was designed ; it ended in an address to the king, to enter into new alliances with the States for our mutual defence, and for preserving the liberty and peace of Europe : these last words were not carried without much difficulty ; they were considered, as they were indeed, an insinuation towards a war.

Upon the view of the house, it appeared very evidently, that the tories were a great majority ; yet they, to make the matter sure, resolved to clear the house of a great many that were engaged in another interest : reports were brought to them of elections that had been scandalously purchased, by some who were concerned in the new East-India company. Instead of drinking and entertainments, by which elections were formerly managed, now a most scandalous practice was brought in of buying votes with so little decency, that the electors engaged themselves by subscription to choose a blank person before they were trusted with the name of their candidate. The old East-India company had driven a course of corruption within doors with so little shame, that the new company intended to follow their example, but with this difference, that, whereas the former had bought the persons who were elected, they resolved to buy elections. Sir Edward Seymour, who had dealt in this corruption his whole life-time, and whom the old company was said to have bought before, at a very high price, brought before the house of commons the discovery of some of the practices of the new company ; the examining into these took up many days. In conclusion, the matter was so well proved, that several elections were declared void ; and some of the persons so chosen were for some time kept in prison ; after that they were expelled the house. In these proceedings great partiality appeared ; for when in some cases corruption was proved clearly against some of the tory party, and but doubtfully against some of the contrary side, that, which was voted corruption in the latter, was called the giving alms in those of the former sort. Thus, for some weeks, the house seemed to have forgotten all the concerns of Europe, and was wholly employed in the weakening of one side, and in fortifying the other. To make some show of zeal for the public safety, they voted thirty thousand men for the fleet ; but they would allow no marines, though they were told that a fleet without these was only a good security for our own defence, but could have no influence on the affairs of Europe, either to frighten, or to encourage those abroad ; such a fleet, as it could not offend, so it was much too strong if it was intended only for a defence, and it looked like a needless wasting the treasure of the nation to employ so much of it to so little purpose, and only to make a show.

While the house of commons was going on, minding only party matters, a design was laid in the house of lords to attack the Partition Treaty, and some of those who were concerned in it. They began with an address to the king, that he would order all the treaties made since the peace of Ryswick, to be laid before them. This was complied with so slowly, that they were not brought to the house till the 26th of February, and no notice was taken of them till the 10th of March. It soon appeared that this was done by a French direction. The court of France (perceiving that the Dutch were alarmed at their neighbourhood, and were increasing their force, both by sea and land, and were calling upon their allies to furnish their quotas, which they were bound by treaties to send to their defence) entered upon a negotiation with them at the Hague, to try what would lay these fears. Upon this, in the beginning of March, the States, in conjunction with Mr. Stanhope, the English envoy at the Hague, gave in memorials, in which they insisted on the violation of the Partition Treaty, and particularly on the French possessing themselves of the Spanish Netherlands; they also desired, that the emperor might have just satisfaction in his pretensions, and that in the mean while, Luxemburg, Namur, Mons, and Ath, might be put in their hands; and Ostend and Newport into the hands of the English, and both they and the Dutch might have a free trade, as before, to all the Spanish dominions. The French seeing these demands run so high, and being resolved to offer no other security for the peace of Europe, but the renewing the treaty of Ryswick, set all their engines at work in England, to involve us into such contentions at home as should both disable us from taking any care of foreign affairs, and make the rest of Europe conclude, that nothing considerable was to be expected from England. As soon as the news of those memorials could come to England, the marquis of Normanby and the rest of the tories took up the debate concerning the Partition Treaty; this they managed with great dexterity, while the matter was as much neglected by the king, who went that day to Hampton-court, where he stayed some time; by this means, no directions were given, and we were involved in great difficulties before the court was aware of it; the king either could not prevail with his new ministers, to excuse the treaty, if they would not justify it, or he neglected them so far, as not to speak to them at all about it. Those who attacked it, said, they meant nothing in that but to offer the king advices for the future, to prevent such errors as had been committed in that treaty, both as to matter and form. They blamed the giving such territories to the crown of France, and the forsaking the emperor; they also complained of the secrecy in which the treaty was carried on, it not being communicated to the English council, or ministry, but privately transacted by the earls of Portland and Jersey: they also blamed the putting the great seal, first to blank powers, and then to the treaty itself, which, the king's new ministers said, was unjust in the contrivance and ridiculous in the execution. To all this, it was answered, that there not being a force ready and sufficient to hinder the French from possessing themselves of the Spanish monarchy, which they were prepared for, the emperor had desired the king to enter into a treaty of partition, and had consented to every article of it, except that which related to the duchy of Milan; but the king, not thinking that worth the engaging in a new war, had obtained an exchange of it for the duchy of Lorrain: the emperor did not agree to this, yet he pressed the king not to break off the treaty, but to get the best terms he could for him, and above all things, he recommended secrecy, that so he might not lose his interest in Spain, by seeming to consent to this partition. It is certain that, by our constitution, all foreign negotiations were trusted entirely to the crown; that the king was under no obligation by law, to communicate such secrets to his council, or to hear, much less was he obliged to follow, their advices: in particular it was said, that the keeper of the great seal had no sort of authority to deny the putting it, either to powers for a treaty, or to any treaty which the king should agree to; the law gives no direction in such matters, and he could not refuse to put the great seal to any thing, for which he had an order from the king, unless the matter was contrary to law, which had made no provision in this case: they insisted most, on the other side, upon the concluding a treaty of this importance, without communicating it first to the privy council; so the first day of the debate ended with this.

The earl of Portland apprehending that this might fall too heavy on him, got the king's leave to communicate the whole matter next day to the house; so he told them that he had not concluded the treaty alone, but had, by the king's order, acquainted six of his chief ministers with it, who were, the earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the viscount Lonsdale, the lords Somers and Halifax, and secretary Vernon; upon which those lords, being likewise freed by the king from the oath of secrecy, told the house, that the earl of Jersey, having in the king's name called them together, the treaty was read to them, and that they excepted to several things in it, but they were told that the king had carried the matter as far as was possible, and that he could obtain no better terms: so when they were told, that no alterations could be made, but that every thing was settled, they gave over insisting on particulars; they only advised that the king might not engage himself in any thing that would bring on a new war, since the nation had been so uneasy under the last. This was carried to the king, and a few days after that, he told some of them that he was made acquainted with their exceptions, but how reasonable soever they were, he had driven the matter as far as he could: the earl of Pembroke said to the house of lords, he had offered the king those advices that he thought were most for his service, and for the good of the nation; but that he did not think himself bound to give an account of that to any other persons: he was not the man struck at, so there was nothing said, either against him, or the earls of Marlborough or Jersey; upon this the debate went on; some said this was a mockery to ask advice when there was no room for it: it was answered, the king had asked the advice of his privy council, and they had given it; but that such was the regal prerogative, that it was still free to him to follow it or not, as he saw cause.

In conclusion, the house of lords resolved to set out this whole matter in an address to the king, complaining both of the Partition Treaty, and of the method in which it had been carried on: the lord Wharton moved an addition to the address, that, whereas the French king had broken that treaty, they should advise the king to treat no more with him, or rely on his word without further security: this was much opposed by all those who were against the engaging in a new war; they said all motions of that kind ought to come from the house of commons, who only could support such an advice, that did upon the matter engage us into a new war; nor would they lay any blame on the breaking of a treaty which they were resolved to condemn; they also excepted to the words "further security" as ambiguous; yet the majority of the house agreed to it; for there was such treachery in the French negotiations, that they could not be relied on without a good guarantee and the pledge of some strong places. It now plainly appeared, that the design was, to set on the house of commons to impeach some of the lords who had been concerned in the Partition Treaty, for it was moved to send the address to the house of commons for their concurrence; but that was not carried. The king seemed to bear all this with his usual coldness; and the new ministers continued still in his confidence, but he laid the matter much to heart; now he saw the error he had fallen into by the change he had made in the ministry: it was plain they resolved to govern him in every thing, and not to be governed by him in any one thing.

As soon as this was over, the earl of Jersey did, by the king's order, bring to the house of lords the memorials that had been given in at the Hague, and then by comparing dates, it was easy to conjecture why the Partition Treaty had been let lie so long on the table, and it seemed as if it was taken up at last only to blast this negotiation; a French management appearing very plainly in the whole steps that had been made. The house of commons began, at the same time, not only to complain of the Partition Treaty, but likewise of the demand of Ostend and Newport, nor would they show any concern for the emperor's pretensions; the Dutch demanded the execution of the treaty that king Charles had made with them, in the year 1677, by which England was bound to assist them with ten thousand men and twenty ships of war, if they were attacked; some endeavoured all that was possible to put this off for the present, pretending that they were not yet attacked; others moved that the pay of ten thousand men might be given to them, with the twenty ships, as a full equivalent to the treaty; yet they not liking this, it was in conclusion agreed to send the ten thousand men; five thousand of these were to be drawn out of the army in Ireland, and five thousand of them were to be new levied; but they took care that Ireland should not be provided with any new forces in their stead, so jealous were they of trusting the king with an army. The representation sent over by the States, setting forth the danger they were in, and desiring the assistance of England, was penned with great spirit, and in a very moving strain: the house of lords did, upon a debate on that subject, make an address to the king to enter into leagues offensive and defensive with the emperor and other princes and States, who were interested against the conjunction of the French and Spanish monarchies; but the house of commons could not, upon this occasion, be carried further than to advise the king, to enter into such alliances as should be necessary for our common security, and for the peace of Europe. This coldness and uncertainty in our councils gave the French great advantages in their negotiations, both in Germany and in Portugal. They tried the courts of Italy, but without success; only the duke of Mantua consented that they should make a show, as if they had surprised him, and so force him to put Mantua in their hands: the pope and the Venetians would not declare themselves; the pope favoured the French, as the Venetians did the emperor, who began the war with a pretension on the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire that devolved on him; and he was making magazines, both in Tyrol and at Trent: the French seemed to despise all he could do, and did not apprehend that it was possible for him to march an army into Italy; both the king and the States pressed him to make that attempt. The elector of Bavaria, and some of the circles, had agreed to a neutrality this year; so there was no hope of doing much upon the Rhine, and the French were making the Italians feel what insolent masters they were likely to prove; so a general uneasiness among them, determined the emperor to send an army into Italy under the command of prince Eugene. England was all this while very unwilling to engage; yet for fear we should at last have seen our interest so clearly that we must have fallen into it, those who were practised on to embroil us, so that we might not be in a condition to mind foreign affairs, set on foot a design to impeach the former ministry.

The handle that brought this about was given by the earl of Portland; when he was excusing his own part in the Partition Treaty, he said, that having withdrawn himself from business, and being at his country-house in Holland, the king sent to him, desiring him to enter upon that negotiation; upon that he wrote to secretary Vernon*, to ask his advice and the advice of his other friends, whether it was fit for him to meddle in that matter, since his being by birth a foreigner, seemed a just excuse for not engaging in a thing of such consequence: to this secretary Vernon answered, that all his friends thought he was a very proper person to be employed in that treaty, since he had known the progress of all those treaties, and the persons who were employed on that occasion; and he named the lord Somers among those who had advised this. The earl of Portland had mistaken this circumstance, which did not belong to the last partition treaty, but to that of the year before, in favour of the prince electoral of Bavaria. The house of commons hearing of this, required secretary Vernon to lay before them that letter, with his answer to it; for the earl of Portland said, that he had left all papers relating to that matter in Holland. Vernon said he had received no such letter in the year 1699; so that led them to enquire farther, and they required him to lay before them all the letters he had relating to both treaties: he said, those were the king's secrets, written in confidence by the persons he employed. But in such a case, a house of commons will not be put off; a denial rather raises in them more earnestness in following their point: it was said, the king had dispensed with the oath of secrecy when he ordered * James Vernon descended from a respectable family, seated at Haslington, in Cheshire. Early in life he was initiated in official business, being placed in the secretary of state's office. Afterwards he enjoyed the duke of Shrewsbury's entire confidence as his private secretary, and under secretary of state. There are three quarto volumes of his letters to this nobleman in the possession of the Buccleugh family. When lords justices presided during the absence of king William, he acted as secretary of state, and in 1697, upon sir W. Trumbull's resignation, he was permanently appointed to this office. Upon queen Anne's accession, he made way for the earl of Nottingham, but was appointed to the sinecure of a teller of the exchequer. He died in 1727, aged eighty-three, and is buried at Watford, in Hertfordshire. In Mackay's "Characters of the Court of Great Britain," a contemporary work, said to have been written by a Mr. Davis, an officer of the customs, he is thus mentioned. "No man understands all parts of that great office (of secretary) better than he, nor could manage it with more prudence at so intricate a time as the last two years of his administration. He is indefatigable in business, and may be called a drudge in office. An ill wife hath much soured his temper, which makes him rougher in business than could be expected from one of his sense and experience; but that roughness is attended with so much candour, and is distributed equally to all who have business with him, that makes it easier borne. Never any secretary wrote so many letters with his own hand, or in a better style."—Clarendon Correspondence; Shrewsbury Correspondence.

all matters to be laid before them, and they would admit of no excuse. Vernon upon this went to the king, and told him, since these were his secrets, he was ready to expose himself to the indignation of the house, and to refuse to show his letters: but the king said, his refusing to do it would not only raise a storm against himself, from which the king could not protect him, but it would occasion an address to the king, to order him to lay every thing before the house, which in the state that things were in then, he could not deny: Vernon, upon these orders given him, at two different times, carried all the letters, and laid them before the house of commons: it appeared by these, that he had communicated the treaty to the king's ministers, who were in town, about the end of August, 1698: that lord Somers being then at Tunbridge, he went to him, and that he had communicated the project, both to the earl of Orford and the lord Halifax; several objections were made by them to many parts of the treaty, which were mentioned in Vernon's letters, but, if better terms could not be had, they thought it was better to conclude the treaty, than to leave the Spanish monarchy to be overrun by France, or to involve Europe in a new war. Lord Somers had also put the seals to blank powers for concluding this treaty. When all this was read, those who were set on to blow up the flame, moved the house to impeach some of the ministers who had been concerned in this transaction; yet in this they proceeded with so visible a partiality, that though the earl of Jersey had signed the treaty, had been plenipotentiary at Ryswick, ambassador in France, and secretary of state, while the Partition Treaty was negotiating; yet he, having joined himself to the new ministry, was not questioned about it: the party said, he had been too easily drawn into it, but that he was not in the secret, and had no share in the councils that projected it.

On the first of April, the house of commons brought up a general impeachment of the earl of Portland, for high crimes and misdemeanors; but the chief design was against the earl of Orford, and the lords Somers and Halifax. Their enemies tried again what use could be made of Kid's business, for he was taken in our northern plantations in America, and brought over: he was examined by the house, but either he could not lay a probable story together, or some remnants of honesty raised in him by the near prospect of death, restrained him; he accused no person of having advised, or encouraged, his turning pirate; he had never talked alone with any of the lords, and never at all with lord Somers; he said he had no orders from them, but to pursue his voyage against the pirates in Madagascar. All endeavours were used to persuade him to accuse the lords; he was assured that, if he did it, he should be preserved; and if he did it not, he should certainly die for his piracy; yet this could not prevail on him to charge them: so he, with some of his crew, were hanged, there appearing not so much as a colour to fasten any imputation on those lords; yet their enemies tried what use could be made of the grant of all that Kid might recover from the pirates, which some bold and ignorant lawyers affirmed to be against law*. So this matter was for the fourth time debated in the house of commons, and the behaviour of those peers in it appeared to be so innocent, so legal, and, in truth, so meritorious, that it was again let fall. The insisting so much on it served to convince all people, that the enemies of these lords wanted not inclinations, but only matter to charge them, since they made so much use of this: but so partial was a great part of the house, that the dropping this was carried only by a small majority: when one design failed, another was set up.

It was pretended, that by secretary Vernon's letters it was clearly proved, that the lord Somers had consented to the Partition Treaty; so a debate coming on concerning that, lord Somers desired that he might be admitted to give an account of his share in it to the house of commons; some opposition was made to this, but it had been always granted, so it could not be denied him: he had obtained the king's leave to tell every thing; so that when he appeared before the house, he told them, the king had written to him, that the state of the king of Spain's health was desperate, and that he saw no way to prevent a new war, but to accept of the proposition the French made for a partition; the king sent him the scheme of this, and ordered him to communicate it to some others, and to give him both his own opinion, and theirs, concerning it, and to send him over powers for a treaty, but in the most secret manner that was possible ; yet the king added, that, if he and his other ministers thought that a treaty ought not to be made upon such a project, then the whole matter must be let fall, for he could not bring the French to better terms. Lord Somers upon this said, that he thought it was the taking too much upon himself, if he should have put a stop to a treaty of such consequence : if the king of Spain had died before it was finished, and the blame had been cast on him for not sending the necessary powers, because he was not ordered to do it by a warrant in full form, he could not have justified that, since the king's letter was really a warrant, and therefore he thought he was bound to send the powers that were called for, which he had done ; but at the same time he wrote his own opinion very fully to the king, objecting to many particulars, if there was room for it, and proposing several things, which, as he thought, were for the good and interest of England. Soon after the powers were sent over by him, the treaty was concluded, to which he put the great seal, as he thought he was bound to do : in this, as he was a privy councillor, he had offered the king his best advice ; and, as he was chancellor, he had executed his office according to his duty. As for putting the seal to the powers, he had done it upon the king's letter, which was a real warrant, though not a formal one. He had indeed desired, that a warrant in due form might be sent him for his own security ; but he did not think it became him to endanger the public only for want of a point of form, in so critical a time, where great dispatch was requisite. He spoke so fully and so clearly, that upon his withdrawing, it was believed, if the question had been quickly put, the whole matter had been soon at an end, and that the prosecution would have been let fall ; but his enemies drew out the debate to such a length, that the impression which his speech had made, was much worn out ; and the house sitting till it was past midnight, they at last carried it, by a majority of seven or eight, to impeach him and the earl of Orford and the lord Halifax of high crimes and misdemeanors : the general impeachment was brought up the next day to the lords' bar.

The commons were very sensible that those impeachments must come to nothing, and that they had not a majority in the house of lords to judge in them as they should direct ; so they resolved on a shorter way to fix a severe censure on the lords, whom they had thus impeached : they voted an address to the king for excluding them from his presence, and councils, for ever. This had never gone along with an impeachment before ; the house of commons had indeed begun such a practice in king Charles the Second's time : when they disliked a minister, but had not matter to ground an impeachment on, they had taken this method of making an address against him, but it was a new attempt to come with an address after an impeachment. This was punishing before trial, contrary to an indispensable rule of justice, of not judging before the parties were heard : the lords saw that this made their judicature ridiculous, when, in the first instance of an accusation, application was made to the king for a censure, and a very severe one ; since few misdemeanors could deserve a harder sentence. Upon these grounds, the lords prevented the commons, and sent some of their body to the king, with an address, praying him, that he would not proceed to any censure of these lords till they had undergone their trial. The king received these addresses, so contrary one to another, from both houses, but made no answer to either of them ; unless the letting the names of these lords continue still in the council books, might be taken as a refusing to grant what the commons had desired. They renewed their address, but had no direct answer from the king ; this, though a piece of common justice, was complained of, and it was said, that these lords had still great credit with the king : the commons had, for form's sake, ordered a committee to prepare articles of impeachment, but they intended to let the matter sleep ; thinking that, what they had already done had so marked those lords, that the king could not employ them any more, for that was the main thing they drove at.

While this was in agitation, a letter came to the king from the king of Spain, giving notice of his accession to that crown ; it was dated the day after he entered into Spain, but the date and the letter were visibly written at different times : the king ordered the letter to be read in the cabinet council ; there was some short debate concerning it, but it was never brought into any further deliberation there. The earl of Rochester saw the king seemed distrustful of him, and reserved to him in that matter, and was highly offended at it : he and the rest of the new ministry pressed the king to own the king of Spain, and to answer his letter ; and since the Dutch had done it, it seemed reasonable that the king should likewise do it : they prevailed at last, but with much difficulty ; the thing was kept secret, and was not communicated to the privy council, or to the two houses, nor did the king speak of it to any of the foreign ministers : the Paris Gazette gave the world the first notice of it. This being carried in such a manner seemed the more strange, because his ministry had so lately condemned a former one, for not communicating the Partition Treaty to the council before it was concluded ; and yet had, in a matter of great consequence, so soon forgotten the censures they had thrown out so liberally upon the secrecy with which that matter had been transacted. While things were moving in such a slow, and uncertain, pace in England, the Dutch had daily new alarms brought them, of the forces that the French were pouring into their neighbourhood ; into the Spanish Guelder on the one hand, and into Antwerp on the other ; so that they were apprehensive of a design both upon Nimeguen, and Bergen-op-zoom : they took the best care they could to secure their frontier : the negotiations went on slowly at the Hague ; the French rejected all their demands, and offered nothing but to renew the peace of Ryswick : this the Dutch laid again before the king, in a very awakening strain ; and he sent all to the house of commons, but they could not be brought to declare that the offers made by the French were not sufficient. D'Avaux, seeing this coldness in our counsels, refused to treat any more with the Dutch, in conjunction with the envoy of England, and said his powers directed him only to them : this put a full stop to all further treaty ; for the States said, they were engaged in such a close conjunction with England, that they could not enter on a separate treaty. In the mean while they armed powerfully ; and our fleet, in conjunction with theirs, were masters of the sea ; but for want of marines, they were in no condition to make any impression on the enemy. The emperor went on with his preparation for a campaign in Italy : the French sent an army into the Milanese, that they reckoned would be much superior to any force the emperor could send thither : the duke of Savoy was engaged in the interest of France by king Philip's marrying his second daughter : the pope still refused to give the investiture of Naples, or to accept the annual present, for he would not quite break with the emperor.

The French practices were every where the more prevalent, because they gave out that England would not engage in a war, and the face of our affairs looked but dark at home. The emperor's ministers had an uneasy time among us ; the king encouraged them, but the new ministers were scarcely civil to them, and studied to put them quite out of hope. The king of Denmark entered into a treaty with the emperor and the States. Great pains were taken to mediate a peace between Sweden and Poland. The court of France, as well as that of Vienna, tried it ; both sides hoping that Sweden, if not Poland, might enter into their interests : the French reckoned that Denmark and Sweden could never be on the same side ; so, when they found they could not gain Denmark, they tried a mediation, hoping to get Sweden into an alliance with them, but all attempts for a mediation proved unsuccessful. The diet of Poland was put off, and their king, being delivered from them, resolved to carry on the war. The Spaniards, and the subjects of their other dominions, began to feel the insolence of the French very sensibly ; but nothing was more uneasy to them than the new regulations they were endeavouring to bring in, to lessen the expense of the court of Spain. So they seemed well disposed to entertain a new pretender.

While all these things were in a ferment all Europe over, the declaring a protestant successor, after the princess and such issue as she might have, seemed to be forgotten by our parliament, though the king had begun his speech with it. The new ministers spoke of it with much zeal ; from this their friends made inferences in their favour, that certainly men, in the interests of France, would not promote a design so destructive of all they drove at. This was so little of a piece with the rest of their conduct, that those who were still jealous of their sincerity looked on it as a blind, to cover their ill designs, and to gain them some credit ; for they could not but see that if France was once possessed of the power and wealth of Spain, our laws, and every thing that we could do to support them, would prove but feeble defences. The manner in which this motion of the succession was managed did not carry in it great marks of sincerity : it was often put off from one day to another, and it gave place to the most trifling matters. At last, when a day was solemnly set for it, and all people expected that it should pass without any difficulty, Harley moved that some things previous to that might be first considered. He observed that the haste the nation was in, when the present government was settled, had made us go too fast and overlook many securities, which might have prevented much mischief, and therefore he hoped they would not now fall into the same error. Nothing pressed them at present, so he moved they would settle some conditions of government, as preliminaries, before they should proceed to the nomination of the person; that so we might fix every thing that was wanting to make our security complete. This was popular and took with many, and it had so fair an appearance that indeed none could oppose it; some weeks were spent upon it. Suspicious people thought this was done on design to blast the motion, and to offer such extravagant limitations as should quite change the form of our government, and render the crown titular and precarious. The king was alarmed at it, for almost every particular that was proposed implied a reflection on him and his administration, chiefly that of not employing strangers, and not going too often out of the kingdom: it was proposed that every thing should be done with the advice of the privy council, and every privy councillor was to sign his advice. All men who had places or pensions were made incapable of sitting in the house of commons. All this was unacceptable to the king, so, many who had an ill opinion of the design of those who were now at the helm, began to conclude that the delays were affected, and that these limitations were designed to raise disputes between the two houses, by which the bill might be lost. When some time had been spent in those preliminaries, it came to the nomination of the person. Sir John Bowles, who was then disordered in his senses, and soon after quite lost them, was set on by the party to be the first that should name the electress dowager of Brunswick, which seemed done to make it less serious when moved by such a person: he was, by the forms of the house, put in the chair of the committee, to whom the bill was committed. The thing was still put off for many weeks; at every time that it was called for, the motion was entertained with coldness, which served to heighten the jealousy: the committee once or twice sat upon it, but all the members ran out of the house with so much indecency, that the contrivers seemed ashamed of this management: there were seldom fifty or sixty at the committee: yet in conclusion it passed, and was sent up to the lords, where we expected great opposition would be made to it: some imagined the act was only an artifice, designed to gain credit to those who, at this time, were so ill thought of over the nation, that they wanted some colourable thing to excuse their other proceedings. Many of the lords absented themselves on design. Some little opposition was made by the marquis of Normanby*; and four lords, the earls of Huntington and Plymouth and the lords Guilford and Jefferies, protested against it. Those who wished well to the act were glad to have it passed any way, and so would not examine the limitations that were in it: they thought it

* Of the public career of John Sheffield, successively known by the titles of earl Mulgrave, marquis Normanby, and duke of Buckinghamshire, little need be said in addition to that which is scattered through the pages of Burnet. He was born in 1649, the son of Edmund, earl of Mulgrave. His youth is remarkable for an effort, which Dr. Johnson justly observes "delights as it is strange, and instructs as it is real." His father dying while he was a child, he was placed under so distasteful a tutor, that, although only twelve years old, he resolved to educate himself. "His literary acquisitions are more wonderful, as those years in which they are commonly made were spent by him in the tumult of a military life, or the gaiety of a court." He served against the Dutch, in the fleet commanded by prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle; had the command of a troop of horse, and received a summons to parliament when but eighteen; but this being censured by the duke of Newcastle as improper, his objection was successful. He opposed the duke of Monmouth, and was recompensed with the lieutenancy of Yorkshire, and the governorship of Hull. In 1680 he successfully conducted an expedition for the relief of Tangier. On the succession of James he was made lord chamberlain: yet, at the revolution, he submitted to king

William, though he did not invite him over. It was proposed that he should be asked to sign the invitation, but the earl of Shrewsbury opposed it, on the ground that Mulgrave would never concur. William asked him what he would have done, if the proposal had been made? To which he replied, "Sir, I would have discovered it to the king whom I then served." William answered, "I cannot blame you." After queen Anne's death he was a fixed opponent of the court; and, having no public employment, is supposed to have amused himself by writing his two tragedies. He died in 1721. In early life, it is said, he presumed to address princess Anne as a lover; but, subsequently, courted and married three widows. In Mackay's "Characters," he is described as "a nobleman of learning and good natural parts, but of no principles. Violent for the high church, yet seldom goes to it; very proud, insolent, and covetous, and takes all advantages. In paying his debts, unwilling; and is neither esteemed nor beloved." He is said, however, to have had much tenderness, and to have been very ready to apologize for his violences of passion.—(Johnson's Lives of the Poets; Clarendon Correspondence.) He was the builder of Buckingham house, now the royal palace, at Piccadilly.

of great importance to carry the act, and that at another time those limitations might be better considered: so the act passed, and the king sent it over by the earl of Macclesfield to the electoress, together with the garter to the elector. We reckoned it a great point carried that we had now a law on our side for a protestant successor; for we plainly saw a great party formed against it, in favour of the pretended prince of Wales. He was now past thirteen, bred up with a hatred both of our religion and our constitution, in an admiration of the French government; and yet many who called themselves protestants seemed fond of such a successor: a degree of infatuation that might justly amaze all who observed it, and saw the fury with which it was promoted.

Another very good act passed this session, concerning the privilege of parliament. Peers had, by law or custom, a privilege for themselves and their servants during the session, and at least twenty days before and after. Of late they have reckoned forty days before and after, in which neither they nor their servants could be sued in any court, unless for treason, felony, or breach of the peace: the house of commons had also possessed themselves of the same privilege; but with this difference, that the lords pretended theirs was a right not subject to the order of the house of lords; whereas the commons held that their privilege was subject to the authority of their house. Of late years, sessions were long and continued by intermediate prorogations, so that the whole year round was a time of privilege: this made a great obstruction in the course of justice, and none who were so protected could be sued for debt. The abuse was carried further by the protections which some lords gave, or rather sold, to persons who were no way concerned in their affairs; but when they needed this shelter, they had a pretended office given them, that was a bar to all arrests. After many fruitless attempts to regulate these abuses, a bill was brought into the house of commons that took away all privilege against legal prosecutions in intermediate prorogations; and did so regulate it during the sitting of parliament, that an effectual remedy was provided for a grievance that had been long and much complained of. These were the only popular things that were done by this parliament, the rest of their proceedings showed both the madness and fury of parties.

The impeachments lay long neglected in the house of commons, and probably they would have been let sleep, if the lords concerned had not moved for a trial: on their motion, messages were sent to the commons to quicken their proceedings. At last, articles were framed and brought up, first, against the earl of Orford: he was charged for taking great grants from the king. Kid's business was objected to him. He was also charged for abuses in managing the fleet, and victualling it, when it lay on the coast of Spain, and for some orders he had given, during his command; and, in conclusion, for his advising the Partition Treaty. And, in setting this out, the commons urged that the king, by the alliance made with the emperor in the year 1689, was bound to maintain his succession to the crown of Spain, which they said was still in force: so the Partition Treaty was a breach of faith, contrary to that alliance, and this passed current in the house of commons, without any debate or enquiry into it; for everything was acceptable there that loaded that treaty and these lords: but they did not consider, that by this they declared they thought the king was bound to maintain the emperor's right to that succession; yet this was not intended by those who managed the party, who had not hitherto given any countenance to the emperor's pretensions. So apt are parties to make use of any thing that may serve a turn, without considering the consequences of it.

The earl of Orford put in his answer in four days. He said he had no grant of the king, but a reversion at a great distance, and a gift of ten thousand pounds, after he had defeated the French at La Hogue, which he thought he might lawfully accept of, as all others before him had done: he opened Kid's matter, in which he had acted legally, with good intentions to the public, and to his own loss: his accounts, while he commanded the fleet, had been all examined and were passed; but he was ready to waive that, and to justify himself in every particular, and he denied his having given any advice about the Partition Treaty: this was immediately sent down to the commons; but they let it lie before them without coming to a replication; which is only a piece of form by which they undertake to make good their charge.

Articles were next sent up against the lord Somers. In these, the two Partition Treaties were copiously set forth, and it was laid down for a foundation, that the king was bound to maintain the emperor's right of succession to the crown of Spain. Lord Somers was charged for setting the seals, first to the powers, and then to the treaties themselves: he was also charged for accepting some grants; and the manner of taking them was represented as fraudulent, he seeming to buy them of the king, and then getting himself discharged of the price contracted for. Kid's business was also mentioned, and dilatory and partial proceedings in chancery were objected to him. He put in his answer in a very few days: in the Partition Treaty, he said, he had offered the king very faithful advice as a councillor, and had acted according to the duty of his post as chancellor; so he had nothing more to answer for: as for his grants, the king designed him a grant to such a value; the king was not deceived in the value; the manner of passing it was according to the usual methods of the treasury, in order to make a grant sure, and out of the danger of being avoided. Kid's business was opened as was formerly set forth; and, as to the court of chancery, he had applied himself wholly to the dispatch of business in it, with little regard to his own health or quiet, and had acted according to the best of his judgment, without fear or favour. This was presently sent down to the house of commons, and upon that they were at a full stand: they framed no articles against the earl of Portland, which was represented to the king as an expression of their respect to him.

Some time after this, near the end of the session, they sent up articles against the lord Halifax, which I mention here that I may end this matter all at once. They charged him for a grant that he had in Ireland, and that he had not paid in the produce of it, as the act concerning those grants had enacted: they charged him for another grant, out of the forest of Dean, to the waste of the timber and prejudice of the navy of England: they charged him for holding places that were incompatible, being at the same time both a commissioner of the treasury and auditor of the exchequer: and, in conclusion, he was charged for advising the two Partition Treaties. He was as quick with his answer as the other lords had been. He said, his grant in Ireland was of some debts and sums of money, and so was not thought to be within the act concerning confiscated estates. All he had ever received of it was 400*l*. If he was bound to repay it, he was liable to an action for it; but every man was not to be impeached who did not pay his debts at the day of payment. His grant in the forest of Dean was only of the weedings; so it could be no waste of timber, nor a prejudice to the navy: the auditor's place was held by another, till he obtained the king's leave to withdraw from the treasury: as for the first Partition Treaty, he never once saw it, nor was he ever advised with in it: as for the second, he gave his advice very freely about it, at the single time in which he had ever heard any thing concerning it. This was sent down to the commons, but was never so much as once read by them. When, by these articles, and the answers to them, it appeared, that after all the noise and clamour that had been raised against the former ministry (more particularly against the lord Halifax) for the great waste of treasure during their administration, that now, upon the strictest search, all ended in such poor accusations; it turned the minds of many that had been formerly prejudiced against them. It appeared that it was the animosity of a party at best, if it was not a French practice, to ruin men who had served the king faithfully, and to discourage others from engaging themselves so far in his interests as these lords had done. They saw the effect that must follow on this; and that the king could not enter upon a new war, if they could discourage from his service all the men of lively and active tempers, that would raise a spirit in the nation for supporting such an important and dangerous war, as this now in prospect was likely to prove.

This gave a general disgust to all England, more particularly to the city of London, where foreign affairs and the interest of trade were generally better understood. The old East India company, though they hated the ministry that set up the new, and studied to support this house of commons, from whom they expected much favour; yet they, as well as the rest of the city, saw visibly that first the ruin of trade, and then, as a consequence of that, the ruin of the nation must certainly ensue, if France and Spain were once firmly united: so they began openly to condemn the proceedings of the commons, and to own a jealousy, that the louis-d'or sent hither of late had not come over to England for nothing. This disposition to blame the slowness in which the house of commons proceeded with relation to foreign affairs, and the heat with which private quarrels were pursued, began to spread itself through the whole nation. Those of the county of Kent sent up a petition to the house, desiring them to mind the public more and their private heats less, and to turn their addresses to the king to bills of supplies, to enable him both to protect the nation and to defend our allies. This was brought up by some persons of quality, and was presented by them to the house: but it was looked on as a libel on their proceedings; and the gentlemen who brought it up were sent to prison, where they lay till the prorogation; but they were much visited, and treated as confessors*. This was highly censured: it was said the commons were the creatures of the people, and upon all other occasions they used to favour and encourage petitions: this severity was condemned therefore as unnatural, and without a precedent: it was much questioned, whether they had really an authority to imprison any except their own members, or such as had violated the privilege of their house: but the party thought it was convenient, by such an unusual severity, to discourage others from following the example set them by those of Kent; for a design was laid to get addresses of the same nature from all parts of the kingdom, chiefly from the city of London. The ministers represented to the king what an indignity this would be to the house of commons; and that, if he did not discourage it, he might look for unacceptable things from them. It might rather discourage than give heart to our allies, if they should see such a disjointing, and both city and country in an opposition to the house of commons. Some went, in his name, to the eminent men of the city to divert it, yet with all this it came so near for such an address in a common council, that the lord mayor's vote turned it for the negative, so that fell. But a disposition to a war, and to a more hearty concurrence with the king, appeared to be the general sense of the nation, and this had a great effect on the house of commons: they began to talk of a war as unavoidable; and when the session drew near an end, they, by an address, desired the king to enter into such alliances with the emperor, and other states and princes, as were necessary for the support of us and our allies, and to bring down the exorbitant power of France. This was opposed with great zeal by those who were looked on as the chief conductors of the jacobite party, though many, who had in other things gone along with them, thought this was the only means that were left to recover their credit with the people; for the current ran so strong for a war, that those who struggled against it, were looked on as little better than public enemies. They had found good funds for a million and a half. It is true one of these was very unacceptable to the king: it was observed that the allotment for the civil list did far exceed the sum that was designed, which was only 600,000*l.*, and that as king James's queen would not take her jointure, so, by the duke of Gloucester's death, the charge on it was now less than when it was granted: so they took almost 4000*l.* a-week out of the excise, and, upon an assignation made of that for some years, a great sum was raised. This was very sensible to the court, and the new ministers found it no easy thing to maintain, at the same time, their interest both with the king and their party: this matter was at last yielded to by the king. All the remainder of this session relates to the impeachments.

The lords had resolved to begin with the trial of the earl of Orford, because the articles against him were the first that were brought up; and since the commons made no replication, the lords, according to clear precedents, named a day for his trial, and gave notice of it to the house of commons. Upon this, the commons moved the lords to agree to name a committee of both houses for settling the preliminaries of the trial, and they named two preliminaries: one was, that the lord who was to be tried should not sit as a peer; the other was, that those lords who were impeached for the same matter, might not vote in the trial of one another: they also acquainted the lords that the course of their evidence led them to begin with the lord Somers. The lords judged their last demand reasonable, and agreed to it, but disagreed to the others. They considered themselves as a court of justice, and how great soever the regard due to the house of commons might be in all other respects, yet in matters of justice, where they were the accusers, they could only be considered as parties. The king, when he had a suit with a subject, submitted to the equality of justice; so the commons ought to pretend to no advantage over a single person in a trial: a court of justice ought to hear the demands of both parties pleaded fairly, and then to judge impartially: a committee named by one of the parties, to sit in an equality with the judges, and to settle matters relating to the trial, was a thing practised in no court or nation, and seemed contrary to the principles of law, or rules of justice: by these means they could at least delay trials as long as they pleased, and all delays of justice are real and great injustices. This had never been demanded but once, in the case of the popish plot; then it was often refused: it is true it was at last yielded to by the lords, though with great opposition; that was a case of treason, in which the king's life and the safety of the nation were concerned; there was then a great jealousy of the court, and of the lords that belonged to it; and the nation was in so great a ferment, that the lords might at that time yield to such a motion, though it derogated from their judicature: that ought not to be set up for a precedent for a quiet time, and in a case pretended to be no more than a misdemeanor: so the lords resolved not to admit of this, but to hear whatsoever should be proposed by the commons, and to give them all just and reasonable satisfaction in it. The chief point in question, in the year 1679, was, how far the bishops might sit and vote in trials of treason; but without all dispute, they were to vote in trials for misdemeanors. It was also settled in the case of the lord Mordaunt, that a lord tried for a misdemeanor was to sit within the bar. In all other courts men tried for such offences came within the bar. This was stronger in the case of a peer, who, by his patent, had a seat in that house, from which nothing but a judgment of the house for some offence could remove him: they indeed found that, in king James the First's time, the earl of Middlesex, being accused of misdemeanors, was brought to the bar; but as that prosecution was violent, so there had been no later precedent of that kind to govern proceedings by it: there had been many since that time, and it had been settled, as a rule for future times, that peers tried for such offences were to sit within the bar. The other preliminary was, that peers, accused for the same offence, might not vote in the trials of the others: the lords found that a right of voting was so inherent in every peer in all causes, except where himself was a party, that it could not be taken from him but by a sentence of the house; a vote of the house could not deprive him of it: otherwise, a majority might upon any pretence deny some peers their right of voting, and the commons, by impeaching many peers at once for the same offence, might exclude as many lords as they pleased from judging: it was also observed that a man might be a judge in any cause in which he might be a witness: and it was a common practice to bring persons charged with the same offence, if they were not in the same indictment, to witness the facts with which they themselves were charged in another indictment; and a parity of reason appeared in the case of lords, who were charged in different impeachments, for the same facts, that they might be judges in one another's trials. Upon these points many messages passed between the two houses with so much precipitation, that it was not easy to distinguish between the answers and the replies: the commons still kept off the trial by affected delays. It was visible, that when a trial should come on, they had nothing to charge these lords with: so the leaders of the party showed their skill in finding out excuses to keep up the clamour, and to hinder the matters from being brought to an issue: the main point that was still insisted on was a committee of both houses; so, according to the forms of the house, it was brought to a free conference.

In it the lord Haversham, speaking to the point of lords being partial in their own cases, and therefore not proper judges, said that the house of commons had plainly showed their partiality in impeaching some lords for facts in which others were equally concerned with them, who yet were not impeached by them, though they were still in credit and about the king; which showed that they thought neither the one nor the other were guilty*. The commons thought that they had now found an occasion of quarrelling with the lords, which they were looking for: so they immediately withdrew from the conference, though they were told that the lord Haversham spoke only his own private sense, and not by any direction from the house. The house of commons sent up a complaint to the lords of this reflection on their proceedings, as an indignity done them, for which they expected reparation: upon this the lord Haversham offered himself to a trial, and submitted to any censure that the lords should think he had deserved; but insisted that the words must first be proved, and he must be allowed to put his own sense on them: the lords sent this to the commons, but they seemed to think that the lords ought to have proceeded to censure him in a summary way, which the lords thought, being a court of judicature, they could not do till the words were proved, and the importance of them discussed.

The house of commons had now got a pretence to justify their not going further in these trials, and they resolved to insist upon it: they said they could expect no justice, and therefore they could not go on with the prosecutions of their impeachments: and a day being set for the lord Somers's trial, they excepting still, it was put off for some time; at last a peremptory day was fixed for it; but the commons refused to appear, and said they were the only judges, when they were ready with their evidence, and that it was a mockery to go to a trial when they were not ready to appear at it. There were great and long debates upon this in the house of lords: the new ministry and all the jacobites joined to support the pretensions of the commons: every step was to be made by a vote, against which many lords protested; and the reasons given, in some of their protestations, were thought to be so injurious to the house, that they were by a vote ordered to be expunged; a thing that seldom happens. When the day set for the trial came, the other lords, who were also impeached, asked the leave of the house to withdraw, and not to sit and vote in it: this was granted them, though it was much opposed and protested against by the tory party, because the giving such leave supposed that they had a right to vote. The lords went down in form to Westminster Hall, where the articles against the lord Somers were first read; lord Somers's answers were next read; and none appearing to make good the charge, the lords came back to their house, where they had a long and warm debate of many hours, concerning the question that was to be put; the judges told them that, according to the forms of law, it ought to be guilty, or not guilty: but those of the party said, as it was certain that none could vote him guilty, so, since the house of commons had not come to make good the charge, they could not vote him not guilty: so, to give them some content, the question agreed on to be put was, whether he ought to be acquitted of the impeachment, or not? That being settled, the lords went again to the Hall, and, the question being put, fifty-six voted in the affirmative, and thirty-one in the negative. Upon this, the house of commons passed some high votes against the lords, as having denied them justice, and having obstructed the public proceedings; and called the trial a pretended trial. The lords went as high in their votes against the commons; and each house ordered a narrative of the proceedings to be published for satisfying the nation. A few days after this the earl of Orford's trial came on, but, all the lords of the other side withdrawing, there was no dispute; so he was acquitted by an unanimous vote. The lords did also acquit both the earl of Portland and the lord Halifax; and because the commons had never insisted on their prosecution of the duke of Leeds, which they had begun some years before, they likewise acquitted him, and so this contentious session came to an end. The two houses had gone so far in their votes against one another, that it was believed they would never meet again: the proceedings of the lords had the general approbation of the nation on their side: most of the bishops adhered to the impeached lords, and their behaviour on this occasion was much commended. I bore some share in those debates, perhaps more than became me, considering my station, and other circumstances: but as I was convinced of the innocence of the lords, the house of lords he was the undaunted declarer of his opinions. One instance is mentioned above; and when opposing the union with Scotland, he compared it to "the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's idol, which were made of iron and clay: they may cleave together, but they can never incorporate." He was an acknowledged republican in politics, and, though a discenter in religion, often acted with the tories and high church party. He died in 1710, and was buried in the church of Richmond, Surrey.—Noble's Continuation of Grainger; Extinct Peerage, &c.

so I thought the government itself was struck at; and therefore, when I apprehended all was in danger, I was willing to venture every thing in such a quarrel. The violence, as well as the folly, of the party, lost them much ground with all indifferent men; but with none more than with the king himself, who found his error in changing his ministry at so critical a time; and he now saw that the tories were at heart irreconcilable to him; in particular, he was extremely uneasy with the earl of Rochester, of whose imperious and intractable temper he complained much, and seemed resolved to disengage himself quickly from him, and never to return to him any more. He thought the party was neither solid nor sincere, and that they were actuated by passion and revenge, without any views with relation to our quiet at home, or to our affairs abroad.

But having now given an account of the session of parliament, I turn to another scene. When the new ministry undertook to serve the king, one of their demands was, that a convocation should have leave to sit, which was promised; and it sat this winter. Dr. Atterbury's book, concerning the rights of a convocation, was reprinted, with great corrections and additions. The first edition was drawn out of some imperfect and disorderly collections, and he himself soon saw that, notwithstanding the assurance and the virulence with which it was written, he had made many great mistakes in it: so, to prevent a discovery from other hands, he corrected his book in many important matters: yet he left a great deal of matter to those who answered him, and did it with such a superiority of argument and of knowledge in these matters, that his insolence in despising these answers was as extraordinary, as the parties adhering to him after such manifest discoveries. Dr. Kennet laid him so open, not only in many particulars, but in a thread of ignorance that ran through his whole book, that if he had not had a measure of confidence peculiar to himself, he must have been much humbled under it*. The clergy hoped to recover many lost privileges by the help of his performances: they fancied they had a right to be a part of the parliament: so they looked on him as their champion, and on most of the bishops as the betrayers of the rights of the church: this was encouraged by the new ministry: they were displeased with the bishops for adhering to the old ministry; and they hoped, by the terror of a convocation, to have forced them to apply to them for shelter. The jacobites intended to put us all in such a flame as they hoped would disorder the government. The things the convocation pretended to were, first, that they had a right to sit whensoever the parliament sat; so that they could not be prorogued but when the two houses were prorogued: next, they advanced that they had no need of a licence to enter upon debates, and to prepare matters, though it was confessed that the practice for a hundred years was against them: but they thought the convocation lay under no farther restraint than that the parliament was under; and as they could pass no act without the royal assent, so they confessed that they could not enact or publish a canon without the king's licence. Anciently the clergy granted their own subsidies apart, but ever since the reformation the grant of the convocation was not thought good till it was ratified in parliament: but the rule of subsidies being so high on the clergy, they had submitted to be taxed by the house of commons ever since the year 1665; though no memorials were left to inform us how that matter was consented to so generally, that no opposition of any sort was made to it. The giving of money being yielded up, which was the chief business of convocations, they had after that nothing to do; so they sat only for form's sake, and were adjourned of course; nor did they ever pretend, notwithstanding all the danger that religion was in during the former reigns, to sit and act as a synod; but now this was demanded as a right, and they complained of their being so often prorogued as a violation of their constitution, for which all the bishops, but more particularly the archbishop of Canterbury, was cried out on: they said, that he and the bishops looked so much to their own interests, that they forgot the interests of the church, or rather betrayed them. The greater part of the clergy were in no good temper; they hated the toleration, and were heavily charged with the taxes, which made them very uneasy; and this disposed them to be soon inflamed by those who were seeking out all possible methods to disorder our affairs. They hoped to have engaged them against the supremacy, and reckoned that in the feeble state to which the government was now brought, they might hope either to wrest it quite from the crown, and then it would fall into the management of the house of commons: or, if the king should proceed against them according to the statute, and sue them in a premunire, this might unite the clergy into such an opposition to the government as would probably throw us into great convulsions: but many aspiring men among them had no other design but to force themselves into preferment by the opposition they made. In the writ that the bishops had, summoning them to parliament, the clause, known by the first word of it, "Premunientea," was still continued: at first, by virtue of it, the inferior clergy were required to come to parliament, and to consent to the aids there given: but after the archbishops had the provincial writ for a convocation of the province, the other was no more executed, though it was still kept in the writ, and there did not appear the least shadow of any use that had been made of it for some hundreds of years; yet now some bishops were prevailed on to execute this clause, and to summon the clergy by virtue of it. The convocation was opened with speeches full of sharp reflections on the bishops, which they passed over, being unwilling to begin a dispute.

Dr. Hooper, dean of Canterbury, was chosen prolocutor, a man of learning and good conduct hitherto; he was reserved, crafty, and ambitious; his deanery had not softened him, for he thought he deserved to be raised higher*. The constant method of adjournments had been this; the archbishop signed a schedule for that purpose, by which the upper house was immediately adjourned, and that being sent down to the prolocutor, did also adjourn the lower house. The clergy perceiving that, by this means, the archbishop could adjourn them at pleasure, and either hinder or break off all debates, resolved to begin at disputing this point: and they brought a paper to the upper house, in which they asserted their right of adjourning themselves, and cited some precedents for it. To this the bishops drew a very copious answer, in which all their precedents were examined and answered, and the matter was so clearly stated and so fully proved, that we hoped we had put an end to the dispute. The lower house sat for some time about the reply to this; but, instead of going on with that, they desired a free conference, and began to affect, in all their proceedings, to follow the methods of the house of commons. The bishops resolved not to comply with this, which was wholly new. They had upon some occasions called up the lower house to a conference, in order to the explaining some things to them; but the clergy had never taken upon them to desire a conference with the bishops before: so they resolved not to admit of it, and told them they expected an answer to the paper they had sent them. The lower house resolved not to comply with this, but, on the contrary, to take no more notice of the archbishop's adjournments. They did indeed observe the rule of adjourning themselves to the day which the archbishop had appointed in his schedule, but they did it as their own act, and they adjourned themselves to intermediate days.

That they might express a zeal in the matters of religion, they resolved to proceed against some bad books. They began with one, entitled "Christianity not mysterious," written by one Toland, a man of a bold and petulant wit, who passed for a socinian, but was believed

* This is one of the most erroneous, party-biased, characters Burnet has given. So far was he from being ambitious, that no persuasions could induce him to accept either of the metropolitan mitres; instead of being reserved, he was good-humoured, affable, witty, yet never offending against the rules of good manners, much less against those of piety. He was the patriarch of the diocese of Bath and Wells, to which queen Anne promoted him in 1704. To his clergy he showed all the kindness of a father; and many instances were known where he had raised the deserving, but indigent, pastor to competency and independence. Such conduct gained him the esteem of the good; and his talents obtained him another large class of friends—the learned. He was "the lawyer, the casuist, the divine, the antiquary, the linguist, the philosopher, the classical scholar; yet always the refined and accomplished gentleman." Such is the concurrent testimony given in favour of Dr. George Hooper by most of his contemporaries. He was born at Grimley, in Worcestershire, during the year 1640, and educated at Westminster, and Christchurch, Oxford. At the first-named school, Dr. Busby, its master, discerned his opening excellence, observing of him, "This boy is the least favoured in features of any in the school, but he will be the most extraordinary of any of them." He at various times held the livings of Lambeth, and East Woodhay, Hampshire; was chaplain to bishop Morley, archbishop Sheldon, and princess Mary, whom he accompanied to Holland. At the revolution, he held the same office to her and king William, who, in 1691, gave him the deanery of Canterbury. In 1703 he was raised to the see of St. Asaph, and the following year translated as before mentioned. He died in 1727.—*General Biog. to be a man of no religion*. They drew some propositions out of this book, but did it with so little judgment, that they passed over the worst that were in it, and singled out some, that how ill soever they were meant, yet were capable of a good sense. They brought up the censure that they had passed on this book to the bishops, and desired them to agree to their resolutions. This struck so directly at the episcopal authority, that it seemed strange to see men who had so long asserted the divine right of episcopacy, and that presbyters were only their assistants and council (according to the language of all antiquity), now assume to themselves the most important act of church government, the judging in points of doctrine. In this it appeared how soon men's interests and passions can run them from one extreme to another. The bishops saw, that their design in this was only to gain some credit to themselves, by this show of zeal for the great articles of religion; so they took advice of men learned in the law, how far the act of submission in the Twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth did restrain them in this case. There had been the like complaint made in the convocation, 1698, of many ill books then published: and the bishops had then advised both with civilians and common lawyers in this matter. They were answered, that every bishop might proceed in his own court against the authors, or spreaders, of ill books, within his diocese; but they did not know of any power the convocation had to do it: it did not so much as appear that they could summon any to come before them: and when a book was published with the author's name to it, the condemning it, without hearing the author upon it, seemed contrary to the common rules of justice. It did not seem to be a court at all, and since no appeal lay from it, it certainly could not be a court in the first instance. When this question was now again put to lawyers, some were afraid, and others were unwilling, to answer it; but sir Edward Northey, afterwards made attorney-general, thought the condemning books was a thing of great consequence; since the doctrine of the church might be altered, by condemning explanations of one sort, and allowing those of another; and since the convocation had no licence from the king, he thought that, by meddling in that matter, they should incur the pains in the statute; so all further debate of this matter was let fall by the bishops. The lower house going on to sit in intermediate days, many of the most eminent and learned among them not only refused to sit with them on those days, but thought it was incumbent on them to protest against their proceedings; but the lower house refusing to suffer this to be entered upon their books, they signified it in a petition to the archbishop. The party sitting alone in those intermediate days, they entered into such a secrecy, that it could not be known what they sat so close upon. So the archbishop appointed five bishops, together with ten they should name, as a committee to examine their books; but though this had been often done, yet, upon this occasion, the lower house refused to comply with it, or to name a committee. This was such an unprecedented invasion of the episcopal authority, that the upper house resolved to receive nothing from them till that irregularity was set right.

Hereupon they, being highly incensed against me, censured my Exposition of the Articles, which, in imitation of the general impeachments by the house of commons, they put in three general propositions:—First, that it allowed a diversity of opinions, which the articles were framed to avoid; secondly, that it contained many passages contrary to the true meaning of the articles, and to other received doctrines of our church; thirdly, that some things in it were of dangerous consequence to the church, and derogated from the honour of the reformation. What the particulars were, to which these general heads referred, could never be learned: this was a secret lodged in confiding hands. I begged that the archbishop would dispense with the order, made against further communication with the lower house, as to this matter: but they would enter into no particulars, unless they might at the same time offer some other matters, which the bishops would not admit of.

In these proceedings the bishops were unanimous, except the bishops of London, Rochester, and Exeter (Dr. Trelawney). The bishop of London had been twice disappointed of his hopes of being advanced to the see of Canterbury; so for several years he was engaged with the tory party, and opposed the court in every thing, but with little force or authority*. The bishop of Rochester (Dr. Sprat) had been deeply engaged in the former reigns, and he stuck firm to the party, to which, by reason of the liberties of his life, he brought no sort of honour. These bishops gave no great reputation to the proceedings of the lower house, to which they adhered: they likewise entered their dissent to the resolutions taken in the upper house. From the fire raised thus in convocation a great heat was spread through the whole clergy of the kingdom: it alienated them from their bishops, and raised factions among them everywhere.

Thus ended the session of parliament and convocation, which had the worst aspect of any that had sat during this reign. The new ministers pressed the king often to dissolve the commission that recommended to ecclesiastical preferments, and to turn out some of the whigs who were in employments, the lord Haversham in particular, who was in the admiralty. But the king could not be prevailed on to do any thing; yet he kept himself so much on the reserve, that when he went out of England it was not certainly known whether he intended to dissolve the parliament or not. When the king came to the Hague, he found the negotiation with France quite at an end; the king of France had recalled his minister, the States had increased their force, and the French were very strong in their neighbourhood: so that though no war was actually declared, yet it was very near breaking out.

The emperor's army was now got into Italy. The entrance towards Verona was stopped by the French, but prince Eugene came in by Vincenza; and when the reinforcements and artillery came up to him, he made a feint of passing the Po, near Ferrara: and having thus amused the French, he passed the Adige, near Carpi, where a body of five thousand French lay: these he routed, so the French retired to the Mincio. He followed them, and passed that river in their sight, without any opposition. The French army was commanded by the duke of Savoy; with him were the mareschal Catinat, and the prince of Vaudemont, governor of Milan. These differed in opinion: the duke of Savoy was for fighting, Catinat and prince Vaudemont were against it: so the mareschal Villeroy was sent thither with orders to fight. Catinat, who was the best general the French had left, looking on this as a disgrace, retired and languished for some time; yet he recovered. There were many small engagements of parties sent out on both sides, in which the Germans had always the better; yet this did not discourage Villeroy from venturing to attack them in their camp at Chiari; but they were so well entrenched, and defended themselves with so much resolution, that the French were forced to draw off with great loss: about five thousand of them were killed, whereas the loss of the Germans was inconsiderable. Sickness likewise broke in upon the French, so that their army was much diminished; and after this, they were not in a condition to undertake any thing. Prince Eugene lay for some time in his camp at Chiari, sending out parties as far as the Adda, who, meeting often with parties of the French, had always the advantage, killing some and taking many prisoners. For several months prince Eugene had no place of defence to retire to; his camp was all: so that a blow given him there must have ruined his whole army. Towards the end of the campaign he possessed himself of all the Mantuan territory, except Mantua and Goito; he blocked them both up; and when the season obliged the French to go into quarters, he took all the places on the Oglio, and continued in motion the whole following winter. The French had no other enemy to deal with, so they poured in their whole force upon him. He was then but a young man, and had little assistance from those about him, and none at all during the summer from the princes and states of Italy: for the pope and the Venetians pretended to maintain a neutrality, though upon many occasions the pope showed great partiality to the French. The people indeed favoured him, so that he had good and seasonable intelligence brought him of all the motions of the French: and in his whole conduct he showed both a depth of contrivance and an exactness in execution, with all the courage, but without any of the rashness, of youth.

* Dr. Compton was a generous man, and if he had been told the unworthy suspicion cast upon him by Burnet, he probably would have said, as he once did on a similar occasion, "I am glad of it; for he has given me an opportunity of setting you a good example in forgiving him."

But to carry on the series of his motions as far as this period of my history goes, his attempt in January following upon Cremona had almost proved a decisive one. Mareschal Villeroy lay there with six or seven thousand men, and commanded a bridge on the Po: prince Eugene had passed that river with a part of his army: the princess of Mirandola drove out the French, and received a garrison from him. The duke of Modena put his country in his hand, and gave him Bersello, the strongest place of his dominions. The duke of Parma pretended he was the pope's vassal, and so put himself under the protection of that sec. Prince Eugene would not provoke the pope too much, so he only marched through the Parmesan: here he laid the design of surprising Cremona with so much secrecy, that the French had not the least suspicion of it. Prince Eugene went to put himself at the head of a body that he brought from the Oglio, and ordered another to come from the Parmesan at the same time, to force the bridge. He marched with all secrecy to Cremona; at the same time, through the ruins of an old aqueduct, he sent in some men, who got through and forced one of the gates, so that he was within the town before mareschal Villeroy had any apprehension of an enemy being near him. He wakened on the sudden with the noise, got out to the street, and there he was taken prisoner. But the other body did not come up critically at the time appointed, so an Irish regiment secured the bridge. And thus the design, that was so well contrived and so happily executed in one part, did fail. Prince Eugene had but four thousand men with him, so that, since the other body could not join him, he was forced to march back, which he did without any considerable loss, carrying mareschal Villeroy and some other prisoners with him. In this attempt, though he had not an entire success, yet he gained all the glory to which the ambition of a military man could aspire; so that he was looked on as the greatest and happiest general of the age. He went on enlarging his quarters, securing all his posts, and straitening the blockade of Mantua, and was in perpetual motion during the whole winter. The French were struck with this ill success; more troops were sent into Italy, and the duke of Vendome went to command the armies there.

The duke of Savoy was pressed to send his forces thither; but he grew cold and backward. He had now gained all that he could promise himself from France: his second daughter was married to king Philip and was sent to him to Barcelona, and he came and met her there: Philip fell into an ill habit of body, and had some returns of a feverish distemper: he had also great disputes with the states of Catalonia, who, before they would grant him the tax that was asked of them, proposed that all their privileges should be confirmed to them. This took up some time, and occasioned many disputes. All was settled at last; but their grant was short of what was expected, and did not defray the charges of the king's stay in the place. A great disposition to revolt appeared in the kingdom of Naples, and it broke out in some feeble attempts that were soon mastered. The leaders of these were taken and executed. They justified themselves by this apology, that till the pope granted the investiture they could not be bound to obey the new king. The duke of Medina was a severe governor, both on his master's account and on his own. Some of the Austrian party made their escape to Rome and to Vienna. They represented to the emperor that the disposition of the country was such in his favour, that a small force of ten thousand men would certainly put that kingdom wholly into his hands. Orders were upon that sent to prince Eugene to send a detachment into the kingdom of Naples. But though he believed a small force would soon reduce that kingdom, yet he judged that such a diminution of his own strength, when the French were sending so many troops into the Milanese, would so expose him, that it would not be possible to maintain a defensive with such an unequal force. Yet repeated orders came to him to the same effect; but, in opposition to those, he made such representations, that at last it was left to himself to do what he found safest, and most for the emperor's service; with that the matter was let fall, and it soon appeared that he had judged better than the court of Vienna: but this was, by his enemies, imputed to humour and obstinacy; so that, for some time after that, he was neither considered nor supported as his great services had deserved. This might flow from envy and malice, which are the ordinary growth of all courts, chiefly of feeble ones; or it might be a practice of the French, who had corrupted most courts, and that of Vienna in particular; since nothing could more advance their ends than to alienate the emperor from prince Eugene; which might so far disgust him, as to make him more remiss in his service.

Our fleets lay all this summer idle in our seas on a bare defensive, while the French had many squadrons in the Spanish ports and in the West Indies. In the North, the war went on still: the king of Sweden passed the Duna, and fell on an army of the Saxons that lay on the other side, over against Riga, and routed them so entirely, that he was master of their camp and artillery. From thence he marched into Courland, where no resistance was made. Mitau, the chief town, submitted to him. The king of Poland drew his army into Lithuania, which was much divided between the Sapichas and Oginskis: so that all those parts were breaking into much confusion. The court of Vienna pretended that they had made a great discovery of a conspiracy in Hungary. It is certain the Germans played the masters very severely in that kingdom, so that all places were full of complaints, and the emperor was so besieged by the authors of those oppressions, and the proceedings were so summary upon very slight grounds, that it was not to be wondered if the Hungarians were disposed to shake off the yoke, when a proper opportunity should offer itself. And it is not to be doubted but the French had agents among them, by the way of Poland as well as of Turkey, that so the emperor might have work enough at home.

This was the state of the affairs of Europe this summer. Several negotiations were secretly carried on: the elector of Cologne was entirely gained to the French interest, but was resolved not to declare himself till his brother thought fit likewise to do it. All the progress that the French made with the two brothers this summer was, that they declared for a neutrality, and against a war with France. The dukes of Wolfenbuttel and Saxe Gotha were also engaged in the same design: they made great levies of troops beyond what they themselves could pay, for which it was visible that they were supplied from France. Here was a formidable appearance of great distractions in the empire. An alliance was also projected with the king of Portugal. His ministers were in the French interests, but he himself inclined to the Austrian family. He for some time affected retirement, and avoided the giving audience to foreign ministers. He saw no good prospect from England; so, being pressed to an alliance with France, his ministers got leave from him to propose one on terms of such advantage to him, that as it was not expected they could be granted, so it was hoped this would run into a long negotiation. But the French were as liberal in making large promises, as they were perfidious in not observing them: so the king of France agreed to all that was proposed, and signed a treaty pursuant to it, and published it to the world. Yet the king of Portugal denied that he had consented to any such project; and he was so hardly brought to sign the treaty, that, when it was brought to him, he threw it down and kicked it about the room, as our envoy wrote over. In conclusion, however, he was prevailed on to sign it; but it was generally thought that when he should see a good fleet come from the allies, he would observe this treaty with the French as they have done their treaties with all the rest of the world. Spain grew uneasy and discontented under a French management. The grandees were little considered, and they saw great designs for the better conduct of the revenues of the crown likely to take place every where, which were very unacceptable to them, who minded nothing so much as to keep up a vast magnificence at the king's cost. They saw themselves much despised by their new masters, as there was indeed great cause for it; they had too much pride to bear this well, and too little courage to think how they should shake it off.

But now to return to our affairs at home: The duke of Queensbury was sent down to hold a parliament in Scotland, where people were in so bad a humour, that much practice was necessary to bring them into any temper. They passed many angry votes upon the business of Darien, but in conclusion the session ended well. The army was reduced one half, and the troops that were ordered to be broken were sent to the States, who were now increasing their force. This session was chiefly managed by the duke of Queensbury and the earl of Argyle; and, in reward for it, the one had the garter, and the other was made a duke.

In Ireland, the trustees went on to hear the claims of the Irish, and in many cases they gave judgment in their favour. But now it began to appear, that whereas it had been given out that the sale of the confiscated estates would amount to a million and a half, it was not likely to rise to the third part of that sum. In the meanwhile, the trustees lived in great state there, and were masters of all the affairs of that kingdom. But no propositions were yet made for the purchasing of those estates. During the king's absence, the nation was in a great ferment, which was increased by many books that were written to expose the late management in the house of commons and the new ministry, the earl of Rochester in particular, who was thought the driver of all violent motions. The few books that were published on the other side were so poorly written, that it tempted one to think they were written by men who personated the being on their side, on design to expose them. The earl of Rochester delayed his going to Ireland very long. He perceived that the king's heart was not with him, and was very uneasy at that; as on the other hand the king complained much of his intractable temper and imperious manner, and, by his intercourse with him, the king came to see that he was not the man he had taken him for; that he had no great nor clear notions of affairs abroad; and that, instead of moderating the violence of his party, he inflamed them: so that he often said, that the year in which he directed the councils was one of the uneasiest of his whole life. The earl of Rochester finding the king's coldness towards him, expostulated with him upon it, and said he could serve him no longer, since he saw he did not trust him. The king heard this with his usual phlegm, and concluded upon it that he should see him no more; but Harley made him a little more submissive and towardsly. After the king was gone beyond sea, he also went into Ireland; there he used much art in obliging people of all sorts, dissenters as well as papists; yet such confidence was put in him by the high church party, that they bore every thing at his hands. It was not easy to behave himself towards the trustees, so as not to give a general distaste to the nation, for they were much hated, and openly charged with partiality, injustice, and corruption. That which gave the greatest disgust in his administration there, was his usage of the reduced officers, who were upon half pay, a fund being settled for that by act of parliament. They were ordered to live in Ireland, and to be ready for service there. The earl of Rochester called them before him, and required them to express under their hands their readiness to go and serve in the West Indies. They did not comply with this; so he set them a day for their final answer, and threatened that they should have no more appointments if they stood out beyond that time. This was represented to the king, as a great hardship put on them, and as done on design to leave Ireland destitute of the service that might be done by so many gallant officers, who were all known to be well affected to the present government. So the king ordered a stop to be put to it.

I am now come to the last period of the life of the unfortunate king James: he had led for above ten years a very inactive life in France; after he had in so poor a manner as was told, abandoned first England, and then Ireland, he had entered into two designs, for recovering the crowns, which he may be said, more truly, to have thrown away than lost: the one was broken by the defeat of the French fleet at sea before Cherbourg, in the year 1692; the other seemed to be laid with more depth, as well as with more infamy, when an army was brought to Dunkirk, and the design of the assassination was thought sure, upon which it was reasonably hoped that we must have fallen into such convulsions, that we should have been an easy prey to an army ready to invade us. The reproach that so black a contrivance cast upon him, brought him under so much contempt, that even the absolute authority of the French court could hardly prevail so far as to have common respect paid him after that. He himself seemed to be the least concerned at all his misfortunes; and though his queen could never give over meddling, yet he was the most easy, when he was least troubled with those airy schemes, upon which she was still employing her thoughts. He went sometimes to the monastery of La Trappe, where the poor monks were much edified with his humble and pious deportment. Hunting was his chief diversion, and for the most part he led a harmless, innocent life; being still very zealous about his religion. In the opening of this year, he had been so near death, that it was generally thought the decline of it would carry him off. He went to Bourbon, but had no benefit by the waters there; in the beginning of September, he fell into such fits, that it was concluded he could not live many days: the king of France came to see him, and seemed to be much touched with the sight: he, with some difficulty, recommended his queen and son to his care and protection: the French king answered, he would reckon their concerns as his own; and when he left him, he promised those of his court that he would, upon king James's death, own the prince of Wales as king of England, and that he would take care of them all. King James died on the 6th day of September. He was a prince that seemed made for greater things than will be found in the course of his life, more particularly of his reign: he was esteemed, in the former parts of his life, a man of great courage, as he was quite through it a man of great application to business: he had no vivacity of thought, invention, or expression; but he had a good judgment, where his religion, or his education, gave him not a bias, which it did very often: he was bred with strange notions of the obedience due to princes, and came to take up as strange ones, of the submission due to priests; he was naturally a man of truth, fidelity, and justice; but his religion was so infused in him, and he was so managed in it by his priests, that the principles which nature had laid in him, had little power over him when the concerns of his church stood in the way: he was a gentle master, and was very easy to all who came near him; yet he was not so apt to pardon as one ought to be, that is the vicegerent of that God who is slow to anger, and ready to forgive. He had no personal vices but of one sort: he was still wandering from one amour to another, yet he had a real sense of sin, and was ashamed of it: but priests know how to engage princes more entirely into their interests, by making them compound for their sins by a great zeal for holy church, as they call it. In a word, if it had not been for his popery, he would have been, if not a great, yet a good, prince. By what I once knew of him, and by what I saw him afterwards carried to, I grew more confirmed in the very bad opinion which I was always apt to have, of the intrigues of the popish clergy, and of the confessors of kings: he was undone by them, and was their martyr, so that they ought to bear the chief load of all the errors of his inglorious reign, and of its fatal catastrophe. He had the funeral which he himself had desired, private, and without any sort of ceremony: as he was dying, he said nothing concerning the legitimacy of his son, on which some made severe remarks: others thought that, having spoken so often of it before, he might not reflect on the fitness of saying any thing concerning it in his last extremity. He recommended to him firmness in his religion, and justice in his government, if ever he should come to reign. He said, that by his practice he recommended Christian forgiveness to him, for he heartily forgave both the prince of Orange and the emperor. It was believed, that the naming the emperor was suggested to him by the French, to render the emperor odious to all those of that religion*.

Upon his death, it was debated in the French council what was fit to be done with relation to his pretended son: the ministry advised the king to be passive, to let him assume what title he pleased, but that, for some time at least, the king should not declare himself: this might be some restraint on the king of England, whereas a present declaration must precipitate a rupture; but the dauphin interposed with some heat, for the present owning him king; he thought the king was bound in honour to do it: he was of his blood, and was driven away on the account of his religion; so orders were given to proclaim him at St. Germain. The earl of Manchester, then the king's ambassador at Paris, told me, that his own court was going about it; but a difficulty, proposed by the earl of Middleton, put a stop to it: he apprehended that it would look very strange, and might provoke the court of France, if among his titles he should be called king of France; and it might disgust their party in England, if it was omitted: so that piece of ceremony was not performed; soon after this, the king of Spain owned him, so did the pope and the duke of Savoy; and the king of France pressed all other princes to do it, in whose courts he had ministers, and prevailed on the pope to press the emperor, and other popish princes, to own him, though without effect. The king looked upon this as an open violation of the treaty of Ryswick, and he ordered the earl of Manchester to leave that court without asking an audience. The French pretended, that the bare owning of his title, since they gave him no assistance to make good his claim, was not a breach of the treaty ; but this could not pass on the world, since the owning his right was a plain declaration that they would assist him in claiming it, whensoever the state of their affairs should allow of it.

This gave a universal distaste to the whole English nation ; all people seemed possessed with a high indignation upon it to see a foreign power that was at peace with us, pretend to declare who ought to be our king ; even those who were perhaps secretly well pleased with it, were yet, as it were forced, for their own safety, to comply with the general sense of the rest in this matter : the city of London began, and all the nation followed, in a set of addresses, wherein they expressed their abhorrence of what the French king had done, in taking upon him to declare who should be their king, and renewed their vow of fidelity to the king, and to his successors, according to the act of settlement. A great diversity of style appeared in these addresses, some avoided to name the French king, the prince of Wales, or the act of settlement, and only reflected on the transaction in France, in general and soft words ; but others carried the matter farther, encouraging the king to go on in his alliances, promising him all faithful assistance in supporting them, and assuring him that, when he should think fit to call a new parliament, they would choose such members as should concur in enabling him to maintain his alliances ; this raised the divisions of the nation higher. All this summer the king continued at Loo, in a very ill state of health ; new methods gave some relief ; but when he came to the Hague, on his way to England, he was for some time in so bad a condition, that they were in great fear of his life ; he recovered, and came over in the beginning of November.

The first thing that fell under debate upon his return was, whether the parliament should be continued, or dissolved, and a new one called ; some of the leading men of the former parliament had been secretly asked, how they thought they would proceed, if they should meet again : of these, while some answered doubtfully, others said positively, they would begin where they had left off, and would insist on their impeachments. The new ministry struggled hard against a dissolution, and when they saw the king resolved on it, some of them left his service. This convinced the nation that the king was not in a double game, which had been confidently given out before, and was too easily believed by many : the heats in elections increased with every new summons. This was thought so critical a conjuncture, that both sides exerted their full strength. Most of the great counties, and the chief cities, chose men that were zealous for the king and government, but the rotten part of our constitution, the small boroughs, were in many places wrought on to choose bad men ; upon the whole, however, it appeared, that a clear majority was in the king's interests, yet the activity of the angry side was such, that they had a majority in choosing the speaker, and in determining controverted elections ; but in matters of public concern, things went on as the king desired, and as the interest of the nation required.

The king opened the parliament with the best speech that he, or perhaps any other prince ever made to his people ; he laid the state of our affairs both at home and abroad before them in a most pathetic manner ; he pressed it upon them to consider the dangers they were in, and not to increase these by new divisions among themselves : he expressed a readiness to forgive all offences against himself, and wished they would as readily forgive one another ; so that no other division might remain but that of English and French, protestant and papist ; he had entered into some alliances, pursuant to the addresses of the last parliament, and was negotiating some others, all which should be laid before them : and this was accordingly done. Both houses began with addresses, in which they did very fully renounce the prince of Wales. The house of lords ordered that all such as were willing to do it should sign the address that was entered into their books. This was without a precedent, and yet it was promoted by those who, as was thought, hoped, by so unusual a practice, to prevent any further proceedings on that head. No exception was made to any article of the alliances ; one addition was only proposed, that no peace should be made till a full reparation was offered to the king for the indignity done him by the French king's declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England ; which was soon after proposed to the allies, and was agreed to by them all. By the alliances, the king was obliged to furnish forty thousand men to serve in the armies, besides what he was to do by sea ; all was consented to in every particular ; angry men showed much rancour against the king, and tried to cross every thing that was proposed, both as to the quotas of the troops we were to furnish, and as to the strength of our fleet. But the public interest was now so visible, and the concurrent sense of the nation ran so vehemently for a war, that even those who were most averse to it, found it convenient to put on the appearance of zeal for it. The city of London was now more united than it had been at any time during this reign, for the two companies that traded to the East-Indies, saw that their common interest required they should come to an agreement ; and though men of ill designs did all they could to obstruct it, yet in conclusion it was happily effected. This made the body of the city, which was formerly much divided between the two companies, fall now into the same measures. But those who intended to defeat all this good beginning of the session, and to raise a new flame, set on debates that must have embroiled all again, if they had succeeded in their designs : they began with complaints of some petitions and addresses that had reflected on the proceedings of the last house of commons ; but it was carried against them, that it was the right of the subjects to petition as they thought themselves aggrieved ; yet they were not discouraged by this, but went on to complain that the lords had denied justice in the matter of the impeachments. This bore a long and hot debate in a very full house ; but it was carried, though by a small majority, that justice had not been denied them ; after this, the party gave over any further struggling, and things were carried on with more unanimity.

The house of commons began a bill of attainder of the pretended prince of Wales. This could not be opposed, much less stopped ; yet many showed a coldness in it, and were absent on the days in which it was ordered to be read ; it was sent up to the lords, and it passed in that house, with an addition of an attainder of the queen, who acted as queen regent for him. This was much opposed, for no evidence could be brought to prove that allegation, yet the thing was so notorious, that it was passed, and was sent down again to the commons. It was excepted to there as not regular, since but one precedent in king Henry the Eighth's time was brought for it, and in that the commons had added some names by a clause in a bill of attainder, sent down to them by the lords ; yet as this was a single precedent, so it seemed to be a hard one : attainders by bill were the greatest rigours of the law, so stretches in them ought to be avoided ; it was therefore thought more proper to attain her by a bill apart, than by a clause in another bill ; to this the lords agreed, so the bill against the pretended prince of Wales passed. The lords also passed a new bill, attainting the queen, but that was let sleep in the house of commons.

The matter that occasioned the longest and warmest debates in both houses, was an act for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and for swearing to the king by the title of rightful and lawful king, and to his heirs, according to the act of settlement : this was begun in the house of lords, and the first design was, that it should be voluntary, it being only to be tendered to all persons, and their subscription or refusal to be recorded, without any other penalty. It was vehemently opposed by all the tory party, at the head of whom the earl of Nottingham set himself. They who argued against it, said this government was first settled with another oath, which was like an original contract, and it was unjust and unreasonable to offer a new one : there was no need of new oaths, as there was no new strength got by them : oaths, relating to men's opinions, had been always looked on as severe impositions : a voluntary oath seemed to be by its nature unlawful ; for we cannot swear lawfully unless we are required to do it. To all this it was answered, that in ancient time, the oath of allegiance was short and simple, because then it was not thought that princes had any right, other than what was conveyed to them by law ; but of late, and indeed very lately, new opinions had been started of a divine right, with which former times were not acquainted : so it was necessary to know who among us adhered to these opinions ; the present government was begun upon a comprehensive foot, it being hoped that all parties might have been brought to concur in supporting it : but the effects had not answered expectation ; distinctions had been made between a king de jure and a king de facto ; whereby these men plainly declared with whom they believed the right was lodged : this opinion must, whensoever that right comes to be claimed, oblige those who hold it to adhere to such claimers ; it seemed therefore in some sort necessary that the government should know on whom it might depend : the discrimination made, by such a test, was to be without compulsion, or penalty ; no hardship was put on any person by it : those who refused to give this security would see what just cause of jealousy they gave, and would thereby be obliged to behave themselves decently and with due caution : when a government tendered an oath, though under no penalty, that was a sufficient authority for all to take it who were satisfied with the substance of it : while, therefore, there was so great a power beyond sea, that did so openly espouse this young man's pretensions, and while there was just ground to suspect that many at home favoured him, it seemed very reasonable to offer a method, by which it should appear, who obeyed the present government from a principle, believing it lawful, and who submitted only to it, as to a prosperous usurpation. About twenty lords persisted in their opposition to this bill ; those who were for it being thrice that number ; but, in the house of commons, when it appeared how the lords were inclined, they resolved to bring in a bill that should oblige all persons to take this abjuration. It was drawn by sir Charles Hedges ; all employments in church or state were to be subject to it : some things were added to the abjuration, such as an obligation to maintain the government in king, lords, and commons, and to maintain the church of England, together with the toleration for dissenters : Finch offered an alteration to the clause, abjuring the prince of Wales, so that it imported only an obligation not to assist him ; but though he pressed this with unusual vehemence, in a debate that he resumed seventeen times in one session, against all rules, he had few to second him in it : the debate, whether the oath should be imposed, or left free, held longer ; it was carried, but by one vote, to impose it : the party chose that, rather than to have it left free ; for they reckoned the taking an oath that was imposed, was a part of their submission to the usurpation ; but the taking any oath, that strengthened the government, of their own accord, did not suit with their other principles ; but to help the matter with a show of zeal, they made the clause that imposed it very extensive, so that it comprehended all clergymen, fellows of colleges, schoolmasters, and private tutors : the clause of maintaining the government in king, lords, and commons, was rejected with great indignation ; since the government was only in the king ; the lords and commons being indeed a part of the constitution, and of the legislative body, but not of the government. This was a bare-faced republican notion, and was wont to be condemned as such by the same persons who now pressed it. It was farther said, that if it appeared that our constitution was in danger, it might be reasonable to secure it by an act and oath apart ; but since the single point, that required this abjuration, was the French king's declaring that the pretended prince of Wales was our king, it was not fit to join matters foreign to that in this oath ; upon the same reason, the clause in favour of the church, and of the toleration, were also laid aside. The design of this act was to discover to all, both at home and abroad, how unanimously the nation concurred in abjuring the pretended prince of Wales ; but here was a clause, to one part of which (the maintaining the church) the dissenters could not swear ; and even the more moderate men of the church, who did well approve of the toleration, yet might think it too much to swear to maintain it ; since it was reasonable to oblige the dissenters to use their liberty modestly, by keeping them under the apprehension of having it taken away, if it was abused by them. One addition was offered, and received without any debate about it, or the shadow of any opposition ; it was declared to be high treason to endeavour to prevent or defeat the princess's right of succession : the tories pretended great zeal for her, and gave it out that there was a design to set her aside, and to have the house of Hanover to succeed the king immediately ; though it could never be made appear that any motion of this kind had ever been either made, or debated, even in private discourse, by any of the whole whig party. Great endeavours were used, and not altogether without effect, to infuse this jealousy into the princess, and into all about her, not without insinuations, that the king himself was inclined to it. When this clause was offered, its being without a precedent, gave handle enough to oppose it, yet there was not one word said in opposition to it, in either house, all agreeing heartily in it. This ought to have put an end to the suspicion, but surmises of that kind, when raised on design, are not soon parted with.

Soon after the session was opened, the earl of Rochester wrote to the king, and asked leave to come over ; it was soon granted, but when he signified this to the council of Ireland, the whole board joined in a request to him, that he would lay before the king the great grievances under which the whole kingdom lay, by the proceedings of the trustees, who stretched the authority that the law gave them, in many instances, to the oppressing of the nation; he seemed uneasy at the motion, but promised to lay it before the king, which he did at his coming over. Soon after that, petitions were sent round all the counties of Ireland, and signed by many, representing both the hardships of the act, and the severe methods the trustees took in executing it: all this was believed to be set on secretly by the court, in hope that some temper might be found in that matter, so that the king's grants might again take place in whole, or in part. The house of commons was moved to proceed severely against the promoters of these petitions; yet the complaining of grievances had been so often asserted to be a right of the subject, that this was let fall; but since no person appeared to justify the facts set forth, and suggested in those petitions, they were voted false and scandalous, and this stopped a further progress in that method. The heat with which that act had been carried was now much qualified, and the trustees having judged for so many claims in favour of Irish papists, showing too manifest a partiality for them, and having now sat two years, in which they had consumed all the rents that arose out of the confiscated estates, the house was applied to for their interposition, by many petitions relating to that matter. This was the more necessary, because, as was formerly told, when that act was depending, they had passed a vote against receiving any petition relating to it: the thing had now lost much of the credit and value that was set upon it at first; and though the same party still opposed the receiving any petitions, yet the current was now so strong the other way, that they were all received, and in a great many cases justice was done; yet with a manifest partiality, in favour of papists; it being a maxim, among all who favoured king James's interests, to serve papists, especially those whose estates were confiscated for adhering to him. One motion was carried, not without difficulty, in favour of those who had purchased under the grantees, and had made great improvements, that they should be admitted to purchase with an abatement of two years' value of the estates: the earl of Athlone, whose case was singular, as was formerly set out, having sold his grant to men, who had reason to think they had purchased under a secure title, a special clause was offered in their favour; but the party had studied so far to inflame the nation against the Dutch, that in this the votes were equal, and the speaker's vote being to turn the matter, he gave it against the purchasers. Many bills were brought in relating to Irish forfeitures, which took up the greatest part of the session.

The commons, after a long delay, sent up the bill, abjuring the prince of Wales. In the house of lords the Tories opposed it all they possibly could: it was a new bill, so the debate was entirely open; they first moved for a clause, excusing the peers from it: if this had been received, the bill would have been certainly lost, for the commons would never have yielded to it: when this was rejected, they tried to have brought it back to be voluntary; it was a strange piece of inconsistency in men to move this, who had argued even against the lawfulness of a voluntary oath: but it was visible they intended by it only to lose, or at least to delay, the bill: when this was over-ruled by the house, not without a mixture of indignation in some against the movers, they next offered all those clauses that had been rejected in the house of commons, with some other very strange additions, by which they discovered both great weakness and an inveterate rancour against the government; but all the opposition ended in a protestation of nineteen or twenty peers against the bill.

And now I am arrived at the fatal period of this reign. The king seemed all this winter in a very fair way of recovery; he had made the royal apartments in Hampton-court very noble, and he was so much pleased with the place, that he went thither once a week, and rode often about the park: in the end of February, the horse he rode on stumbled, and he, being then very feeble, fell off and broke his collar-bone: he seemed to have no other hurt by it, and his strength was then so much impaired, that it was not thought necessary to let him bleed, no symptom appeared that required it: the bone was well set, and it was thought there was no danger; so he was brought to Kensington that night: he himself had apprehended all this winter that he was sinking; he said to the earl of Portland, both before and after this accident, that he was a dead man: it was not in his legs, nor now in his collarbone, that he felt himself ill, but all was decayed within, so that he believed he should not be able to go through the fatigue of another campaign. During his illness, he sent a message to the two houses, recommending the union of both kingdoms to them. The occasion of this, was a motion that the earl of Nottingham had made, in the house of lords, when the act of abjuration was agreed to: he said, though he had differed from the majority of the house in many particulars relating to it, yet he was such a friend to the design of the act, that in order to the securing a protestant succession, he thought an union of the whole island was very necessary; and that therefore they should consider how both kingdoms might be united; but in order to this, and previous to it, he moved, that an address should be made to the king, that he would be pleased to dissolve the parliament now sitting in Scotland, and to call a new one: since the present parliament was at first a convention, and then turned to a parliament, and was continued ever since, so that the legality of it might be called in question; and it was necessary that so important a thing as the union of both kingdoms, should be treated in a parliament against the constitution of which no exception could lie. The motion was warmly opposed; for that nation was then in such a ferment, that the calling a new parliament would have been probably attended with bad consequences; so that project was let fall, and no progress was made upon the king's message. On the third of March, the king had a short fit of an ague, which he regarded so little, that he said nothing of it: it returned on him next day: I happened to be then near him, and observed such a visible alteration, as gave me a very ill opinion of his condition; after that he kept his chamber till Friday: every day it was given out that his fits abated; on Friday, things had so melancholy a face, that his being dangerously ill was no longer concealed; there was now such a difficulty of breathing, and his pulse was so sunk, that the alarm was given out every where; he had sent the earl of Albemarle over to Holland to put things in a readiness for an early campaign. He came back on the 7th of March in the morning, with so good an account of every thing, that, if matters of that kind could have wrought on the king, it must have revived him; but the coldness with which he received it showed how little hopes were left: soon after, he said, "Je tire vers ma fin, (I draw towards my end.)" The act of abjuration, and the money bill, were now prepared for the royal assent; the council ordered all things to be in a readiness for the passing of those bills by a special commission, which according to form must be signed by the king, in the presence of the lord keeper and the clerks of the parliament: they came to the king, when his fit began, and stayed some hours before they were admitted; some in the house of commons moved for an adjournment, though the lords had sent to them not to adjourn for some time; by this means they hoped the bill of abjuration should be lost; but it was contrary to all rules to adjourn, when such a message was sent them by the lords, so they waited till the king had signed the commission and the bills, and thus those acts passed in the last day of the king's life.

The king's strength and pulse was still sinking, as the difficulty of breathing increased, so that no hope was left. The archbishop of Canterbury and I went to him on Saturday morning, and did not stir from him till he died. The archbishop prayed on Saturday some time with him, but he was then so weak that he could scarcely speak, but gave him his hand, as a sign that he firmly believed the truth of the Christian religion, and said, he intended to receive the sacrament: his reason and all his senses were entire to the last minute: about five in the morning he desired the sacrament, and went through the office with great appearance of seriousness, but could not express himself; when this was done, he called for the earl of Albemarle, and gave him a charge to take care of his papers. He thanked Mr. Auverquerque for his long and faithful services. He took leave of the duke of Ormond, and called for the earl of Portland, but before he came, his voice quite failed, so he took him by the hand, and carried it to his heart with great tenderness. He was often looking up to heaven, in many short ejaculations. Between seven and eight o'clock the rattle began, the commendatory prayer was said for him, and as it ended he died, in the fifty-second year of his age, having reigned thirteen years and a few days. When his body was opened, it appeared that, notwithstanding the swelling of his legs, he had no dropsy; his head and heart were sound; there was scarcely any blood in his body; his lungs stuck to his side, and by the fall from his horse, a part of them was torn from it, which occasioned an inflammation, that was believed to be the immediate cause of his death, which probably might have been prevented for some time, if he had been then let blood. His death would have been a great stroke at any time, but in our circumstances, as they stood at that time, it was a dreadful one. The earl of Portland told me, that when he was once encouraging him, from the good state his affairs were in, both at home and abroad, to take more heart; the king answered him, that he knew death was that which he had looked at on all occasions without any terror; sometimes he would have been glad to have been delivered out of all his troubles, but he confessed now he saw another scene, and could wish to live a little longer. He died with a clear and full presence of mind, and in a wonderful tranquillity. Those who knew it was his rule, all his life long, to hide the impressions that religion made on him as much as possible, did not wonder at his silence in his last minutes, but they lamented it much; they knew what a handle it would give to censure and obloquy.

Thus lived and died William the Third, king of Great Britain, and prince of Orange. He had a thin and weak body, was brown haired, and of a clear and delicate constitution; he had a Roman eagle nose, bright and sparkling eyes, a large front, and a countenance composed to gravity and authority: all his senses were critical and exquisite. He was always asthmatical, and the dregs of the small pox falling on his lungs, he had a constant deep cough. His behaviour was solemn and serious, seldom cheerful, and but with a few: he spoke little and very slowly, and most commonly with a disgusting dryness, which was his character at all times, except in a day of battle; for then he was all fire, though without passion: he was then every where, and looked to every thing. He had no great advantage from his education; De Wit's discourses were of great use to him, and he, being apprehensive of the observation of those who were looking narrowly into every thing he said or did, had brought himself under an habitual caution that he could never shake off, though in another scene it proved as hurtful as it was then necessary to his affairs: he spoke Dutch, French, English and German equally well; and he understood the Latin, Spanish and Italian, so that he was well fitted to command armies composed of several nations. He had a memory that amazed all about him, for it never failed him; he was an exact observer of men and things; his strength lay rather in a true discerning and a sound judgment, than in imagination, or invention: his designs were always great and good; but it was thought he trusted too much to that, and that he did not descend enough to the humours of his people to make himself, and his notions, more acceptable to them: this, in a government that has so much of freedom in it as ours, was more necessary than he was inclined to believe: his reservedness grew on him, so that it disgusted most of those who served him; but he had observed the errors of too much talking, more than those of too cold a silence. He did not like contradiction, nor to have his actions censured, but he loved to employ and favour those who had the arts of complaisance: yet he did not love flatterers. His genius lay chiefly to war, in which his courage was more admired than his conduct: great errors were often committed by him, but his heroic courage set things right, as it inflamed those who were about him: he was too lavish of money on some occasions, both in his buildings, and to his favourites, but too sparing in rewarding services, or in encouraging those who brought intelligence: he was apt to take ill impressions of people, and these stuck long with him, but he never carried them to indecent revenges; he gave too much way to his own humour almost in every thing, not excepting that which related to his own health; he knew all foreign affairs well, and understood the state of every court in Europe very particularly; he instructed his own ministers himself, but he did not apply enough to affairs at home: he tried how he could govern us by balancing the two parties one against another, but he came at last to be persuaded that the tories were irreconcilable to him, and he was resolved to try and trust them no more. He believed the truth of the Christian religion very firmly, and he expressed a horror at atheism and blasphemy; and though there was much of both in his court, yet it was always denied to him, and kept out of sight. He was most exemplarily decent and devout in the public exercises of the worship of God, only on week days he came too seldom to them: he was an attentive hearer of sermons, and was constant in his private prayers, and in reading the scriptures: and when he spoke of religious matters, which he did not often, it was with a becoming gravity. He was much possessed with the belief of absolute decrees: he said to me, he adhered to these, because he did not see how the belief of Providence could be maintained upon any other supposition; his indifference as to the forms of church government, and his being zealous for toleration, together with his cold behaviour towards the clergy, gave them generally very ill impressions of him; in his deportment towards all about him, he seemed to make little distinction between the good and the bad, and those who served well, or those who served him ill: he loved the Dutch, and was much beloved among them; but the ill returns he met from the English nation, their jealousies of him, and their perverseness towards him, had too much soured his mind, and had in a great measure alienated him from them, which he did not take care enough to conceal, though he saw the ill effects this had upon his business. He grew, in his last years, too remiss and careless as to all affairs; till the treacheries of France awakened him, and the dreadful conjunction of the monarchies gave so loud an alarm to all Europe; for a watching over that court, and a bestirring himself against their practices, was the prevailing passion of his whole life. Few men had the art of concealing and governing passion more than he had; yet few men had stronger passions, which were seldom felt but by inferior servants, to whom he usually made such recompenses, for any sudden, or indecent, vents he might give his anger, that they were glad at every time that it broke upon them: he was too easy to the faults of those about him, when they did not lie in his own way, or cross any of his designs; and he was so apt to think that his ministers might grow insolent, if they should find that they had much credit with him, that he seemed to have made it a maxim, to let them often feel how little power they had, even in small matters: his favourites had a more entire power, but he accustomed them only to inform him of things, but to be sparing in offering advice, except when it was asked; it was not easy to account for the reasons of the favour that he shewed, in the highest instances, to two persons beyond all others, the earls of Portland and Albemarle; they being in all respects men, not only of different, but of opposite characters; secrecy and fidelity were the only qualities in which it could be said, that they did in any sort agree. I have now run through the chief branches of his character; I had occasion to know him well, having observed him very carefully in a course of sixteen years: I had a large measure of his favour, and a free access to him all the while, though not at all times to the same degree: the freedom that I used with him was not always acceptable; but he saw that I served him faithfully, so, after some intervals of coldness, he always returned to a good measure of confidence in me; I was, in many great instances, much obliged by him; but that was not my chief bias towards him; I considered him as a person raised up by God to resist the power of France, and the progress of tyranny and persecution; the series of the five princes of Orange, that was now ended in him, was the noblest succession of heroes that we find in any history; and the thirty years, from the year 1672 to his death, in which he acted so great a part, carry in them so many amazing steps of a glorious and distinguishing Providence, that in the words of David, he may be called, "The man of God's right hand, whom he made strong for himself." After all the abatements that may be allowed for his errors and faults, he ought still to be reckoned among the greatest princes that our history, or indeed that any other, can afford. He died in a critical time for his own glory; since he had formed a great alliance, and had projected the whole scheme of the war; so that if it succeeds, a great part of the honour of it will be ascribed to him; and if otherwise, it will be said he was the soul of the alliance, that did both animate and knit it together, and that it was natural for that body to die and fall asunder, when he who gave it life was withdrawn. Upon his death, some moved for a magnificent funeral; but it seemed not decent to run into unnecessary expense, when we were entering on a war, that must be maintained at a vast charge; so a private funeral was resolved on. But for the honour of his memory, a noble monument and an equestrian statue were ordered. Some years must shew whether these things were really intended, or if they were only spoken of to excuse the privacy of his funeral, which was scarcely decent, so far was it from being magnificent.

BOOK VII.

OF THE LIFE AND REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE.

Y the death of king William, pursuant to the act that had settled the succession of the crown, it devolved on Anne, the youngest daughter of king James, by his first marriage; she was then entered on the thirty-eighth year of her age. Upon the king's death, the privy council came in a body to wait on the new queen: she received them with a well considered speech*. She expressed great respect to the memory of the late king, in whose steps she intended to go, for preserving both church and state, in opposition to the growing power of France, and for maintaining the succession in the protestant line: she pronounced this as she did all her other speeches, with great weight and authority, and with a softness of voice, and sweetness in the pronunciation, that added much life to all she spoke. These, her first expressions, were heard with great and just acknowledgments: both houses of parliament met that day, and made addresses to her, full of respect and duty: she answered both very favourably, and she received all that came to her in so gracious a manner, that they went from her highly satisfied with her goodness, and her obliging deportment; for she hearkened with attention to every thing that was said to her. Two days after, she went to the parliament, which, to the great happiness of the nation, and to the advantage of her government, was now continued to sit, notwithstanding the king's demise, by the act, that was made five years before, upon the discovery of the assassination plot. In her speech she repeated, but more copiously, what she had said to the council, upon her first accession to the throne. There were two passages in this speech that were thought not so well considered: she assured them her heart was "entirely English;" this was looked on as a reflection on the late king: she also added, that they might "depend on her word." Both these expressions had been in her father's first speech, how little soever they were afterwards minded by him. The city of London, and all the counties, cities, and even the subaltern bodies of cities, came up with addresses; in these a very great diversity of style was observed; some mentioned the late king in terms full of respect and gratitude; others named him very coldly; some took no notice of him, nor of his death, and simply congratulated her coming to the crown; and some insinuated reflections on his memory, as if the queen had been ill used by him. The queen received all civilly; to most she said nothing, to others she expressed herself in general words, and some things were given out in her name, which she disowned.

Within a week after her coming to the crown, she sent the earl of Marlborough to Holland, to give the States full assurances of her maintaining the alliances that had been concluded by the late king, and of doing every thing that the common concerns of Europe required. She gave notice also of her coming to the crown to all the princes and states of Europe, except France and Spain. The earl of Marlborough stayed some days in Holland, to very good purpose; the king's death had struck them all with such a damp, that they needed the encouragement of such a message, as he brought them: when they had the first news of the king's death, they assembled together immediately; they looked on one another as men amazed; they embraced one another, and promised they would stick together, and adhere to the interests of their country: they sat up most of the night, and sent out all the orders that were necessary upon so extraordinary an emergency. They were now much revived by the earl of Marlborough's presence, and by the temper that both houses of parliament were in with relation to the alliances, and the war with France; and they entered into such confidence with the earl of Marlborough, that he came back as well satisfied with them, as they were with him. The queen in her first speech had asked of the commons the continuance of that revenue, which supported the civil list, and it was granted to her for life, very unanimously, though many seemed to apprehend that so great a revenue might be applied to uses, not so profitable to the public, in a reign that was likely to be frugal, and probably would not be subject to great accidents. When the queen came to pass the act, and to thank the parliament for it, she said, she intended to apply one hundred thousand pounds of it to the public occasions of the present year: this was received with great applause, and particular notice was taken of it in all the addresses that came up afterwards.

At the same time, the queen passed a bill for receiving and examining the public accounts; and in her speech she expressed a particular approbation of that bill. A commission to the same effect had been kept up for six or seven years, during the former reign, but had been let fall for some years; since the commissioners had never been able to make any discovery whatsoever, and so had put the public to a considerable charge, without reaping any sort of fruit from it. Whether this flowed from the weakness or corruption of the commissioners, or from the integrity or cunning of those who dealt in the public money, cannot be determined. The party that had opposed the late king had made this the chief subject of their complaints all the nation over, that the public was robbed, and that private men lived high, and yet raised large estates out of the public treasure. This had a great effect over England; for all people naturally hearken to complaints of this kind, and very easily believe them: it was also said, to excuse the fruitlessness of the former commissions, that no discoveries could be made under a ministry that would surely favour their under-workmen, though they were known to be guilty. One visible cause of men's raising great estates, who were concerned in the administration, was this, that for some years the parliament laid the taxes upon very remote funds, so that, besides the distance of the term of payment, for which interest was allowed, the danger the government itself seemed to be often in (upon the continuance of which the continuance and assignment of these funds was grounded) made that some tallies were sold at a great discount, even of the one half, to those who would employ their money that way, by which great advantages were made. The gain that was made, by robbing the coin, in which many goldsmiths were believed to be deeply concerned, contributed not a little to the raising those vast estates, to which some had grown, as suddenly as unaccountably. All these complaints were easily raised, and long kept up, on design to cast the heavier load on the former ministry: this made that ministry, who were sensible of the mischief this clamour did them, and of their own innocence, promote the bill with much zeal, and put the strongest clauses in it that could be contrived to make it effectual. The commissioners named in the bill were the hottest men in the house, who had raised, as well as kept up, the clamour, with the greatest earnestness. One clause put in the act, was not very acceptable to the commissioners; for they were rendered incapable of all employments during the commission; the act carried a retrospect quite back to the revolution; it was given out that great discoveries would be made by them, and the art and industry with which this was spread over England, had a great effect in the elections to the succeeding parliament. The coronation was on the 23rd of April, on St. George's day; it was performed with the usual magnificence: the archbishop of York (Dr. Sharp) preached a good and wise sermon on the occasion; the queen immediately after that gave orders for naming the electress of Brunswick, in the collect for the royal family, as the next heir of the crown, and she formed a ministry.

The coldness had continued between the king and her, to such a degree, that though there was a reconciliation after the queen's death, yet it went not much farther, than what civility and decency required: she was not made acquainted with public affairs*. She was not encouraged to recommend any to posts of trust and advantage; nor had the ministry orders to inform her how matters went, nor to oblige those about her: only pains had been taken to please the earl of Marlborough, with which he was fully satisfied: nothing had contented him better than the command he had the former year of the troops, which were sent to the assistance of the States. The whigs had lived at a great distance with the queen all the former reign: the tories had made much noise with their zeal for her, chiefly after the death of the duke of Gloucester, though they came seldom to her: her court was then very thin, she lived in due abstraction from business, so that she neither gave jealousy, nor encouraged faction: yet these things had made those impressions on her, that had at first ill effects, which were soon observed and remedied. The late king had sent a message to the earl of Rochester some weeks before he died, letting him know that he had put an end to his commission of lord lieutenant of Ireland, but that was not executed in form; so the commission did still subsist in his person: he was upon that now declared lord lieutenant of Ireland. The lord Godolphin was made lord treasurer; this was very uneasy to himself, for he resisted the motion long; but the earl of Marlborough pressed it in so positive a manner, that he said he could not go beyond sea to command our armies, unless the treasury was put in his hands; for then he was sure that remittances would be punctually made him. He was declared captain-general, and the prince* had the title of generalissimo of all the queen's forces by sea and land. It was for some time given out, that the prince intended to go beyond sea, to command the armies of the alliance, but this report soon fell; and it was said, the Dutch were not willing to trust their armies to the command of a prince, who might think it below him to be limited by their instructions, or to be bound to obey their orders. The late king had dissolved the commission for executing the office of the lord admiral, and had committed that great trust to the earl of Pembroke: the secrets of that board were so ill kept, and there was such a faction in it, that the king resolved to put it in a single person; the earl of Pembroke was not easily brought to submit to it: he saw it would draw a heavy load on him, and he was sensible that by his ignorance of sea affairs, he might commit errors: yet he took good officers to his assistance: he resolved to command the fleet in person, and he took great pains to put things in such order that it might be soon ready. A land army was designed to go with the fleet, to the command of which the duke of Ormond had been named: but upon new measures, the earl of Pembroke was first sent to, not to go to sea in person, and soon after he was dismissed from his post, with the offer of a great pension, which he very generously refused, though the state of his affairs and family seemed to require it. The prince was made lord high admiral, which he was to govern by a council; the legality of this was much questioned, for it was a new court, which could not be authorized to act, but by an act of parliament; yet the respect paid the queen made that no public question was made of this, so that objections to it never went beyond a secret murmur. The earl of Nottingham and sir Charles Hedges were made secretaries of state: the tories would trust none but the earl of Nottingham, and he would serve with none but Hedges†: the maxim laid down at court, was, to put the direction of affairs in the hands of the tories. The earl of Marlborough assured me this was done, upon the promises they made to carry on the war, and to maintain the alliances; if they kept these, then affairs would go on smoothly in the house of commons, but if they failed in this, the queen would put her business in other hands, which at that time few could believe. The marquis of Normanby was, to the admiration of all men, made lord privy seal, and soon after duke of Buckingham‡. The earl of Abingdon, viscount Weymouth, lord Dartmouth, Seymour, Musgrave, Greenvil, How, Luçon § Gower, Harcourt, with several others, who had, during the last reign, expressed the most violent and unrelenting aversion to the whole administration, were now brought to the council board, and put in good posts.

† Sir Charles Hedges was secretary of state to king William, and lost his office a short time before this monarch's death; but was restored under queen Anne, owing to the earl of Nottingham refusing to be secretary unless he was so reinstated. This was to prevent Vernon taking the office, whom the earl did not wish to have for his colleague; although he gave out as a more honourable reason, that sir Charles ought to be restored because he had lost his place for a conscientious vote in the house of commons.—Earl of Dartmouth in Oxford edition of this work.

‡ Duke of Normanby and Buckinghamshire. There being suspected to be somewhere latent a claim to the title of Buckingham.—Johnson's Lives of the Poets.

Before the king's death, it was generally thought, that some in both houses, and many more over the nation, would refuse the abjuration: they had opposed it so vehemently, that no less could be expected from them. Some went out of town when the day came, in which the houses resolved to try all their members; but they soon came to other resolutions, and with them almost the whole party came and took the oath, and professed great zeal for the queen, and an entire satisfaction in her title. Some suspected this was treachery, on design to get the government once into their hands, that so they might deliver it up, or at least that they might carry a parliament so to their mind, that the act might be repealed; and they might think, that then the oath would fall with it. Distinctions were set about among them, which heightened these suspicions; for though in the oath they declared that the pretended prince of Wales had not any right whatsoever to the crown; yet in a paper (which I saw) that went about among them, it was said that "right" was a term of law, which had only relation to "legal rights," but not to a "divine right," or to "birth right:" so since that right was condemned by law, they, by abjuring it, did not renounce the "divine right," that he had by his birth. They also supposed that this abjuration could only bind, during the present state of things, but not in case of another revolution, or of a conquest: this was too dark a thing to be inquired after, or seen into, in the state matters were then in. The queen continued most of the great officers of the household, all the judges except two, and most of the lords lieutenants of counties; nor did she make any change in the foreign ministry. It was generally believed that the earl of Rochester and his party were for severe methods, and for a more entire change, to be carried quite through all subaltern employments; but that the lord Godolphin and the earl of Marlborough were for moderate proceedings; so that though no whigs were put into employments, yet many were kept in the posts they had been put into, during the former reign. Repeated assurances were sent to all the allies, that the queen would adhere firmly to them.

The queen in her first speech to her parliament, had renewed the motion, made by the late king, for the union of both kingdoms; many of those who seemed now to have the greatest share of her favour and confidence, opposed it with much heat, and not without indecent reflections on the Scotch nation; yet it was carried by a great majority, that the queen should be empowered to name commissioners for treating of an union; it was so visibly the interest of England, and of the present government, to shut that back door against the practices of France, and the attempts of the pretended prince of Wales, that the opposition made to this first step towards an union, and the indecent scorn with which Seymour and others treated the Scots, were clear indications that the posts they were brought into had not changed their tempers; but that, instead of healing matters, they intended to irritate them farther by their reproachful speeches. The bill went through both houses, notwithstanding the rough treatment it met with at first*.

Upon the earl of Marlborough's return from Holland, and in pursuance of the concert at the Hague, the queen communicated to both houses her design to proclaim war with France; they approving of it, war was proclaimed on the fourth day of May: the house of commons made an address to thank the queen for ordering the princess Sophia to be prayed for; and as the right, that recommended her, was in her own blood, she was designed by her Christian name, and not by her title: it came to be known that this was opposed in council by the marquis of Normanby, but that it was promoted by the lord treasurer (Godolphin).

A report was spread about town, and over the nation, with such a seeming assurance, that many were inclined to believe it, that a scheme had been found among the king's papers for setting aside the queen; some added, for imprisoning her, and for bringing the house of Hanover immediately into the succession; and that, to support this, a great change was to be made in all the employments and offices over the whole kingdom; this, many of those who were now in posts, had talked of in so public a manner, that it appeared they intended to possess the whole nation with a belief of it; hoping thereby to alienate the people from those who had been in the late king's confidence, and disgrace all that side, in order to the carrying all elections of parliament for men of their party. Five lords had been ordered by the queen to visit the late king's papers, and bring her such of them as related to the alliances, or other affairs, of the crown; these were the dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, and the earls of Marlborough, Jersey, and Albemarle: the whigs saw the design which was driven at by those false reports; so a motion was made in the house of lords by the earl of Carlisle, and seconded by the lords Wharton, Halifax, and others, that an inquiry should be made into the truth of that report, and of all other stories of that kind, that so, if there was any truth in them, such as had been concerned in those wicked designs might be punished; and if they were found to be false, that those who spread them about might be chastised. Upon this the house desired that those lords who had visited the late king's papers, would let them know if they had met with any among them relating to the queen's succession, or to the succession of the house of Hanover. Four of them were then in the house, only the earl of Marlborough was ill that day, so the four who were present said, they had found nothing that did in any sort relate to that matter, and this was confirmed by the earl of Marlborough to some peers, who were sent by the house to ask him the same question. Upon which a vote passed, that these reports were false and scandalous; and an order was made for prosecuting the spreaders of them. Some books had been published, charging the late ministry and the whole whig party with the like designs: these books were censured, and the authors of them were ordered to be prosecuted; though both the marquis of Normanby and the earl Nottingham did all they could to excuse those writers. When the falsehood of those calumnies was apparent, then it was given out, with an unusual confidence, that no such reports had been ever set about; though the contrary was evident, and the thing was boldly asserted in those books; so that a peculiar measure of assurance was necessary to face down a thing which they had taken such pains to infuse into the minds of the credulous vulgar, all England over. The earl of Nottingham, to divert this inquiry, moved, that another might be made into those books, in which the murder of king Charles the First was justified; though the provocation given to some of these, was, by a sermon preached by Dr. Binks before the convocation, on the 30th of January, in which he drew a parallel between king Charles's sufferings and those of our Saviour; and, in some very indecent expressions, gave the preference to the former. When the business of the session of parliament was all done, the queen dismissed them, with thanks for the money they had given, recommending earnestly to them a good agreement among themselves, assuring them that as on the one hand she would maintain the toleration, so on the other hand, her own principles would oblige her to have a particular regard to those who expressed the truest zeal for the church of England: thus the session ended, and the proclamation dissolving the parliament, with the writs for a new one, came out not long after.

During some part of this parliament, a convocation sat; the faction raised in the lower house had still the majority; several books were written to show that, by our constitution, the power of adjourning was wholly in the archbishop: the original book of the convocation that sat in the year 1661, being happily found, it showed the practice of that convocation agreed with the bishops in every particular; but though it was communicated to the lower house, that had no effect on them; for when parties are once formed, and a resolution is taken up on other considerations, no evidence can convince those who have beforehand resolved to stick to their point. But the prolocutor dying, and the king's death following, the convocation was by that dissolved; since in the act, that empowered the parliament to sit after the king's death, no provision was made to continue the convocation. The earl of Rochester moved in the house of lords, that it might be considered whether the convocation was not a part of the parliament, and whether it was not continued in consequence of the act that continued the parliament; but that was soon let fall, for the judges were all of opinion that it was dissolved by the king's death.

Upon the queen's accession to the crown, all these angry men that had raised this flame in the church, as they treated the memory of the late king with much indecent contempt, so they seemed very confident, that for the future all preferments should be distributed among them (the queen having superseded the commission for ecclesiastical preferments) and they thought they were full of merit, and were as full of hopes.

Such an evil spirit as is now spread among the clergy, would be a sad speculation at any time, but in our present circumstances, when we are near so great a crisis, it is a dreadful thing ; but a little to balance this, I shall give an account of more promising beginnings and appearances, which though they are of an elder date, yet of late they have been brought into a more regulated form. In king James's reign, the fear of popery was so strong, as well as just, that many, in and about London, began to meet often together, both for devotion, and for their further instruction : things of that kind had been formerly practised, only among the puritans and the dissenters ; but these were of the church, and came to their ministers to be assisted with forms of prayer and other directions : they were chiefly conducted by Dr. Beveridge and Dr. Horneck. Some disliked this, and were afraid it might be the original of new factions and parties ; but wiser and better men thought it was not fit nor decent to check a spirit of devotion, at such a time : it might have given scandal, and it seemed a discouraging of piety, and might be a mean to drive well-meaning persons over to the dissenters. After the revolution, these societies grew more numerous, and for a greater encouragement to devotion, they got such collections to be made, as maintained many clergymen to read prayers in so many places, and at so many different hours, that devout persons might have that comfort at every hour of the day : there were constant sacraments every lord's day in many churches : there were both great numbers and greater appearances of devotion at prayers and sacraments than had been observed in the memory of man *. These societies resolved to inform the magistrates of swearers, drunkards, profaners of the lord's day, and of lewd houses ; and they threw in the part of the fine, given by law to informers, into a stock of charity ; from this they were called societies of reformation : some good magistrates encouraged them, but others treated them roughly. As soon as queen Mary heard of this, she did, by her letters and proclamations, encourage these good designs, which were afterwards prosecuted by the late king. Other societies set themselves to raise charity schools for teaching poor children, for clothing them and binding them out to trades : many books were printed, and sent over the nation by them, to be freely distributed ; these were called societies for propagating Christian knowledge : by this means some thousands of children are now well educated and carefully looked after. In many places of the nation, the clergy met often together, to confer about matters of religion and learning ; and they got libraries to be raised for their common use. At last a corporation was created by the late king, for propagating the gospel among infidels, for settling schools in our plantations, for furnishing the clergy that were sent thither, and for sending missionaries among such of our plantations as were not able to provide pastors for themselves. It was a glorious conclusion of a reign that was begun with preserving our religion, thus to create a corporation for propagating it to the remoter parts of the earth, and among infidels : there were very liberal subscriptions made to it by many of the bishops and clergy, who set about it with great care and zeal ; upon the queen's accession to the crown, they had all possible assurances of her favour and protection, of which, upon every application, they received very eminent marks.

The affairs of Scotland began to be somewhat embroiled ; by an act made soon after the revolution, it was provided, that all princes succeeding to the crown should take the coronation oath before they entered upon their regal dignity ; but no direction was given concerning those who should tender it, or the manner in which it should be taken : so this being left undetermined, the queen called together all the late king's ministers for that kingdom, and in the presence of about twelve of them, she took the coronation oath ; men who were disposed to censure every thing, said, that this ought not to be done, but in the presence of some, deputed for that effect, either by the parliament, or at least by the privy council of that kingdom. Another point occasioned a more important debate.

Upon the assassination plot, an act had passed in Scotland for continuing the parliament, that should be then in being, six months after the death of the king, with two special clauses in it ; the first was, that it should meet twenty days after the death of the king ; but the queen did, by several prorogations, continue the parliament almost three months after the king's death before it was opened. Some said the parliament was by this dissolved, since it did not meet upon the day limited by the act to continue it ; but there was another proviso in the act, that saved to the crown the full prerogative of adjourning, or dissolving, it within that time ; yet in opposition to that, it was acknowledged, that as to all subsequent days of meeting, the prerogative was entire, but the day that was limited, that is the twenty-first after the king's death, seemed to be fixed for the first opening the session.

The second clause was, a limitation on the power of the parliament, during their sitting, that it should not extend to the repealing laws ; they were empowered only to maintain the protestant religion, and the public peace of the country ; it was therefore said, that the queen was peaceably obeyed, and the country now in full quiet, so there was no need of assembling the parliament : the end of the law being compassed, it was said, the law fell of itself, and therefore it was necessary to call a new parliament ; for the old one, if assembled, could have no authority but to see to the preservation of religion, and the peace of the country, their power being limited to those two heads by the act that authorized their sitting. In opposition to this, it was said, that the act which gave them authority to sit as a parliament for six months, gave them the full authority of a parliament : the directing them to take care of some more important matters, did not hinder their meddling with other matters, since no parliament can limit a subsequent one : it was also said, that, since the queen was now engaged in a war, the public peace could not be secured without such a force and such taxes to maintain it as the present state of affairs required. The duke of Queensbury, and his party, were for continuing the parliament ; but duke Hamilton, and the others, who had opposed that duke in the last parliament, complained highly of this way of proceeding : they said, they could not acknowledge this to be a legal parliament, they could not submit to it, but must protest against it ; this was ominous ; a reign was to be begun with a parliament liable to a dispute ; and from such a breach it was easy to foresee a train of mischief likely to follow. These lords came up, and represented to the queen and those in favour with her, their exceptions to all that was intended to be done ; every thing they said was heard very calmly : but the queen was a stranger to their laws, and could not take it upon her to judge of them, so she was determined by the advice of the privy council of that kingdom. The lords that came up to oppose the duke of Queensbury continued to press for a new parliament, in which they promised to give the queen all that she could ask of them, and to consent to an act of indemnity for all that was past in the former reign. But it was thought that the nation was then in too great a heat to venture on that, and that some more time was necessary to prepare matters, as well as men's minds, before a new parliament should be summoned. Both parties went down, and both being very sensible that the presbyterian interest would, with its weight, turn that scale into which it should fall, great pains were taken by both sides to gain that party. On the one hand, they were made to apprehend what a madness it would be for them to provoke the queen in the beginning of her reign, who might be enough disposed to entertain prejudices against them ; these would be much heightened, if in a point, in which conscience could not be pretended, they should engage in a faction against her, especially when they could not say that any cause of jealousy was given ; on the contrary, the queen had, in all her public letters, promised to maintain presbyterian government ; and though that gave great offence in the late king's time, when those public letters were printed, yet now this passed without censure. The other party was as busy to inflame them ; they told them the queen was certainly in her heart against them : all those who were now in her confidence, the earls of Rochester and Nottingham in particular, were enemies to presbyterian government : good words were now given them to separate them from a national interest, knowing well that if they went off from that, and so lost the hearts of the nation, they lost that in which their chief strength lay : the party that now governed, as soon as they should have carried the present point by their help, and rendered them odious by their concurring in it, would strengthen themselves at court by entering into the episcopal interest, and trying to introduce episcopacy into Scotland ; which would be soon brought about, if the presbyterians should once lose their popularity : these were the methods and reasonings that were used on both hands.

The parliament was brought together on the 9th of June ; at the opening the session duke

Hamilton read a paper, importing, that this was not a legal parliament, since the only ends for which they were impowered to meet, were already obtained; the queen was obeyed, religion was secured, and the peace of the country was settled; so there seemed to be no occasion for their continuance. Upon which he and seventy-four more withdrew; but one hundred and twelve members continued to sit, and voted themselves to be a free and legal parliament, and declared, that pursuant to their ancient laws, it was high treason to impugn their authority. They ratified all acts made in favour of presbyterian government, in which they proceeded with such violence, that sir Alexander Bruce moving, that all those acts might be read, for he believed some of them might be found inconsistent with monarchy, he was for that expelled the house. They by one act recognized the queen's title; by another, they impowered her to name commissioners to treat of the union of the two kingdoms: and by a third, they gave a tax sufficient to keep up the force that was then in Scotland for two years longer; and so the parliament was brought to a quiet conclusion.

Ireland was put under lords justices, named by the earl of Rochester, and the trustees continued still in their former authority.

While our affairs were in this posture at home, the first step that was made beyond sea, was by the house of Hanover; it had been concerted with the late king before his sickness, and was set on foot the week he died. The design was well laid, and the execution was managed with great secrecy: the old duke of Zell, and his nephew the elector of Brunswick, went in person with an army that was rather inferior in strength to that of the dukes of Wolfenbuttel; they entered their country, while their troops were dispersed in their quarters; they surprised some regiments of horse, and came and invested both Wolfenbuttel and Brunswick at once, and cut off all communication between them; having them at this disadvantage, they required them to concur in the common councils of the empire, to furnish their quota for its defence, and to keep up no more troops than were consistent with the safety of their neighbours; for it was well known, that the greatest part of their men were subsisted with French pay, and that they had engaged themselves to declare for France, as soon as it should be required. Duke Rodolph, the elder brother, was a learned and pious prince; but as he was never married, so he had turned over the government to the care of his brother duke Anthony, who was a prince of a temper very much different from his brother's: he could not bear the advancement of the house of Hanover; so in opposition to them, he went into the interests of France; but being thus surprised, he went away in discontent, and his brother broke through all those measures in which he had involved himself; in conjunction with duke Anthony, the duke of Saxe Gotha had entered into the same engagements with France; but was now forced to fall into the common interests of the empire.

Thus all the north of Germany was united, and ready to declare against France; only the war in Poland was so near them, that they were obliged to continue armed, and see the issue of that war: the king of Sweden was engaged in it, with such a determined opposition to king Augustus, that there was no hope of treating a peace, though it was endeavoured both by England and the States: the king of Sweden seemed to have accustomed himself to fatigue and danger, so that he grew to love both; and though the Muscovites had fallen upon the frontiers of Sweden, where they had gained some advantages, yet even that could not divert him from carrying on the war in Poland. A diet was summoned there, but it broke up in confusion, without coming to any conclusion, only they sent ambassadors to the king of Sweden to treat of a peace. The king of Prussia was very apprehensive of the consequences of this war, which was now in the neighbourhood of Prussia; and the king of Sweden threatened to invade Saxony with the troops that he had in Pomerania, which could not be done, but through his territories. The king of Sweden delayed giving audience to the ambassadors of Poland; and marched on to Warsaw; so the king of Poland retired to Cracow, and summoned those palatines who adhered to him, to come about him: when the king of Sweden came to Warsaw, he sent to the cardinal to summon a diet for choosing a new king; this went further than the resentments of the Poles yet carried them: but the rest of this matter will appear hereafter.

All Germany was now united, only the two brothers of Bavaria. The court of Vienna set on foot several negotiations with the elector of Bavaria, but all to no purpose: for that elector seemed only to hearken to their propositions, that he might make the better terms with France: the elector of Cologne put Liege, and all the places that he had on the Rhine, except Bonn, into the hands of the French; it was said, that he kept Bonn, hoping to be able to make his peace with the emperor, by putting that into his possession; but he was prevailed on afterwards to deliver that likewise to the French. In this the elector acted against the advice of all his council; and as the dean of Liege was making some opposition to him, he was seized on, and carried away prisoner in a barbarous manner; the elector, to excuse his letting the French into his country, pretended, he only desired the assistance of some of the troops of the circle of Burgundy to secure his dominions; for as France was not ashamed of the slightest pretences, so she taught her allies to make excuses unbecoming the dignity of princes.

The first step of this war was to be made in the name of the elector Palatine, in the siege of Keiserwert, which, whilst in the enemy's hands, exposed both the circle of Westphalia, and the States' dominions; for their places on the Waal, being in no good condition, were laid open to the excursions of that garrison. Negotiations were still carried on in several courts: Methuen was sent to try the court of Portugal; he came quickly back with full assurances of a neutrality, and a freedom of trade in their ports; insinuations were given of a disposition to go further, upon a better prospect and better terms; so he was presently sent back to drive that matter as far as it would go. The pope pretended he would keep the neutrality of a common father, but his partiality to the French appeared on many occasions; yet the court of Vienna had that veneration for the see, that they contented themselves with expostulating, without carrying their resentments further. The Venetians and the great duke followed the example set them by the pope, though the former did not escape so well, for their country suffered on both hands.

The Prince of Baden drew together the troops of the empire; he began with blocking up Landau, and that was soon turned to a siege; Catinat was sent to command the French army in Alsace, but it was so weak, that he was not able to make head with it. In the end of April, the Dutch formed three armies; one under the prince of Nassau, undertook the siege of Keiserwert; another was commanded by the earl of Athlone, and lay in the duchy of Cleve, to cover the siege; a third, commanded by Cohorn, broke into Flanders, and put a great part of that country under contribution. Mareschal Boufflers drew his army together, and having laid up great magazines in Ruremonde and Venlo, he passed the Maes with his whole army. The duke of Burgundy came down post from Paris to command it; the States apprehended that so great a prince would, at his first appearance, undertake somewhat worthy of him, and thought the design might be upon Maestricht; so they put twelve thousand men in garrison there; the auxiliary troops from Germany did not come so soon as was expected, and cross winds stopped a great part of our army; so that the earl of Athlone was not strong enough to enter into action with Mareschal Boufflers; but he lay about Cleve, watching his motions. The siege of Keiserwert went on slowly; the Rhine swelling very high, so filled their trenches, that they could not work in them. Mareschal Tallard was sent to lie on the other side of the Rhine, to cannonade the besiegers, and to send fresh men into the town: the king of Prussia came to Wezel, from whence he furnished the besiegers with all that was necessary. There was one vigorous attack made, in which many were killed on both sides: in conclusion, after a brave defence, the counterscarp was carried, and then the town capitulated, and was rased according to agreement. When the duke of Burgundy saw that the siege could not be raised, he tried to get between the earl of Athlone and Nimeguen: the design was well laid, and wanted little of being punctually executed; it must have had fatal effects had it succeeded; for the French would either have got into Nimeguen, or have forced the earl of Athlone to fight at a great disadvantage. But the earl of Athlone so carefully watched their motions, that he got before them, under the cannon of Nimeguen; yet by this means he was forced to abandon Cleve. The French discharged their fury upon that town, and on the park, and all the delicious walks of that charming place, little to the honour of the prince who commanded the army; for upon such occasions, princes are apt to be civil to one another, and not to make havoc of such embelishments as can be of no use to them. The earl of Athlone's conduct on this occasion raised his credit as much as it sunk Boufflers', who, though he had the superior army, animated by the presence of so great a prince, yet was able to do nothing, but was unsuccessful in every thing that he designed; and his parties, that at any time were engaged with those of the earl of Athlone, were beaten almost in every action*.

Soon after this the earl of Marlborough came over and took the command of the army. The earl of Athlone was set on by the other Dutch generals to insist on his quality of velt marshal, and to demand the command by turns: he was now in high reputation by his late conduct, but the States obliged him to yield this to the earl of Marlborough, who indeed used him so well that the command seemed to be equal between them. The earl of Athlone was always inclined to cautious and sure, but feeble, counsels; but the earl of Marlborough, when the army was brought together, finding his force superior to the duke of Burgundy, passed the Maes at the Grave, and marched up to the French. They retired as he advanced: this made him for venturing on a decisive action; but the Dutch apprehended the putting things to such a hazard, and would not consent to it. The pensioner, and those who ordered matters at the Hague, proceeded the more timorously, because, upon the king's death, those who had always opposed him were beginning to form parties, in several of their towns, and were designing a change of government: so that a public misfortune in their conduct, would have given great advantages to those who were watching for them. The pensioner was particularly aimed at: this made him more unwilling to run any risk. Good judges thought that if the earl of Marlborough's advices had been followed, matters might have been brought to a happy decision; but as he conducted the army prudently, so he was careful not to take too much upon him. The duke of Burgundy finding himself obliged to retreat as the confederate army advanced, thought this was not suitable to his dignity; so he left the army, and ended his first campaign very ingloriously: and it seems the king was not satisfied with mareschal Boufflers, for he never commanded their armies since that time†. The earl of Marlborough went on, taking several places, which made little or no resistance; and seeing that mareschal Boufflers kept at a safe distance, so that there was no hope of an engagement with him, he resolved to fall into the Spanish Guelder: he began with Venlo. There was a fort on the other side of the river that commanded it, which was taken by the lord Cutts in so gallant a manner, that it deserved to be much commended by every body but himself: but he lost the honour that was due to many brave actions of his, by talking too much of them. The young earl of Huntington showed upon this, as upon many other occasions, an extraordinary heat of courage. He called to the soldiers, who had got over the pallisades, to help him over, and promised them all the money he had about him, which he performed very generously, and led them on with much bravery and success. Upon the fort being taken, the town capitulated. Ruremonde and Stevenzwert were taken in a few days after; for mareschal Boufflers did not come to their relief. Upon these successes, that came quicker than was expected, the earl of Marlborough advanced to Liege, which was a place of more importance, in which he might put a great part of his army in winter quarters. The town quickly capitulated, the citadel was carried by storm, and another fort in the town likewise surrendered. Here was a very prosperous campaign: many places were taken with little resistance, and an inconsiderable loss, either of time or of men. The earl of Marl-

* Louis Francis, duc de Boufflers, is so frequently mentioned in this work, that some notice of the dates of his life is required. He was born in 1644, and was a soldier from boyhood. Before he was twenty-five, he was a colonel of dragoons, under Crequi and Turenne. His exploits as commander-in-chief were worthy of a great general, and drew forth appropriate compliments from his opponents. It has been stated in a previous part of this work, that when king William took Namur, he detained Boufflers in retaliation for the French having detained the garrison of Dixmude. "Then," said Boufflers, "my garrison, not myself, should be detained." "Sir," it was answered, "you are of more value than 10,000 soldiers." He defended Lille for four months against prince Eugene, and the latter told him, "I am vain of taking the town, but I would rather have the glory of defending it as you have." For this service it was that Boufflers was raised to the peerage; and on entering the parliament, surrounded by his officers, he turned and said to them, "It is to you I am indebted for all these favours; I have nothing to glory in but the honour of having commanded so many heroes." He died in 1711.—Moreri's Hist. Dictionary.

† He did subsequently, as is noticed in the previous note, and, with M. Villars at the battle of Malp'aquet, in 1709.

engaged, and continued firm to the interests of France. Mareschal Villars*, who commanded the French army in Alsace, had orders to break through the Black Forest, and join the Bavarians. His army was much superior to the prince of Baden, but the latter had so posted himself that, after an unsuccessful attempt, Villars was forced to return to Strasburg.

In Italy the duke of Vendome began with the relief of Mantua, which was reduced to great extremities by the long blockade prince Eugene had kept about it. He had so fortified the Oglio, that the duke of Vendome†, apprehending the difficulty of forcing his posts, marched through the Venetian territories (notwithstanding the protestations of the republic against it), and came to Goito, with a great convoy for Mantua. Prince Eugene drew his army all along the Mantuan Fossa, down to Borgofortes: he was forced to abandon a great many places; but apprehending that Bresello might be besieged, and considering the importance of that place, he put a strong garrison in it. He complained much that the court of Vienna seemed to forget him, and did not send him the reinforcements they had promised. It was thought that his enemies at that court, under colour of supporting the king of the Romans in his first campaign, were willing to neglect every thing that related to him; by this means the best army the emperor ever had was left to moulder away to nothing.

King Philip took a very extraordinary resolution of going over to Italy, to possess himself of the kingdom of Naples, and to put an end to the war in Lombardy: he was received at Naples with outward splendour, but he made little progress in quieting the minds of that unruly kingdom. He did not obtain the investiture of it from the pope, though he sent him a cardinal legate with a high compliment. The Germans thought this was too much, while the French thought it was not enough; yet upon it the emperor's ambassador left Rome. King Philip was conducted from Naples to Final by the French fleet that had carried him from Barcelona to Naples. As he was going to command the duke of Vendome's army, he was met by the duke of Savoy, of whom there was some jealousy, that, having married his two daughters so greatly, he began now to discern his own distinct interest, which called upon him to hinder the French from being masters of the Milanese. King Philip wrote to the duke of Vendome not to fight prince Eugene till he could join him. He seemed jealous lest that prince should be driven out of Italy before he could come to share in the honour of it; yet, when he came, he could do nothing, though prince Eugene was miserably abandoned by the court of Vienna. Count Mansfield, president of the council of war, was much suspected as corrupted by France. The supplies promised were not sent into Italy. The apprehensions they were under of the elector of Bavaria's declaring, some time before he did it, gave a colour to those who were jealous of prince Eugene's glory, to detain the recruits and troops that had been promised him for the emperor's own defence. But though he was thus forsaken, yet he managed the force he had about him with great skill and conduct. When he saw Luzara was in danger, he marched up to the king of Spain, and, as that king very oddly expressed it, in a letter to the king of France, he had the boldness (audace) to attack him; but, which was worse, he had the boldness likewise to beat him; and, if he had not been shut in by rivers, and the narrowness of the ground, very probably he would have carried the advantage he had in that engagement much further. The ill state of his affairs forced him upon that desperate action in which he succeeded beyond expectation. It put the French to such a stand, that all they could do after this was only to take Luzara, and some other considerable places; but prince Eugene still kept his posts. King Philip left the army and returned, after an inglorious campaign, into Spain, where the grandees were much disgusted to see themselves so much despised, and their affairs wholly conducted by French councils. The French tried, by all possible methods, to engage the Turks in a new war with the emperor: and it was believed that the grand vizier was entirely gained, though the mufti, * Louis Hector, duc de Villars, was born in 1653, and died in 1734. He wrote his own "Memoirs," which have been published with a continuation, and give much information concerning this continental war.

† Of Lewis Joseph, duc de Vendome, there is a good memoir in the Dictionnaire Historique. He was born in 1654, and died in 1712.

and all who had any credit in that court, were against it. The grand vizier was strangled, and so this design was prevented.

The court of France was in a management with the cardinal primate of Poland to keep that kingdom still embroiled. The king of Sweden marched on to Cracow, which was much censured as a desperate attempt, since a defeat there must have destroyed him and his army entirely, being so far from home. He attacked the king of Poland, and gave him such an overthrow, that, though the army got off, he carried both their camp and artillery. He possessed himself of Cracow, where he stayed some months, till he had raised all the money they could produce; and though the Muscovites with the Lithuanians destroyed Livonia, and broke into Sweden, yet that could not call him back. The duke of Holstein, who had married his eldest sister, was thought to be gained by the French to push on this young king to prosecute the war with such an unrelenting fury, in which he might have a design for himself, since the king of Sweden's venturing his own person so freely might make way for his duchess to succeed to the crown. That duke was killed in the battle of Cracow. There was some hopes of peace this winter, but the two princes were so exasperated against one another, that it seemed impossible to compose that animosity. This was very unacceptable to the allies; for both kings were well inclined to support the confederacy, and to engage in the war against France, if their own quarrels could have been made up. The king of Sweden continued still so virtuous and pious in his whole deportment, that he seemed formed to be one of the heroes of the Reformation. This was the state of affairs on the continent during this campaign.

One unlooked for accident sprung up in France. An insurrection happened in the Cevennes in Languedoc; of which I can say nothing that is very particular, or well assured. When it first broke out, it was looked on as the effect of oppression and despair, which would quickly end in a scene of blood; but it had a much longer continuance than was expected; and it had a considerable effect on the affairs of France: for an army of ten or twelve thousand men, who were designed either for Italy or Spain, was employed without any immediate success in reducing them.

I now change the element, to give an account of our operations at sea. Rook had the command. The fleet put to sea much later than we hoped for. The Dutch fleet came over about a month before ours was ready: the whole consisted of fifty ships of the line, and a land army was put on board, of twelve thousand men, seven thousand English and five thousand Dutch. Rook spoke so coldly of the design he went upon before he sailed, that those who conversed with him were apt to infer that he intended to do the enemy as little harm as possible. Advice was sent over from Holland of a fleet that sailed from France, and was ordered to call in at the Groyne. Munden was recommended by Rook to be sent against this fleet; but, though he came up to them with a superior force, yet he behaved himself so ill, and so unsuccessfully, that a council of war was ordered to sit on him. They indeed acquitted him, some excusing themselves, by saying, that if they had condemned him, the punishment was death; whereas they thought his errors flowed from a want of sense: so that it would have been hard to condemn him for a defect in that which nature had not given him. Those who recommended him to the employment seemed to be more in fault. This acquittal raised such an outcry that the queen ordered him to be broke. Rook, to divert the design that he himself was to go upon, wrote from St. Helen's that the Dutch fleet was victualled only to the middle of September. So that, being then in July, no great design could be undertaken, when so large a part of the fleet was so ill provided. When the Dutch admiral heard of this, he sent to their ambassador, to complain to the queen of this misinformation; for he was victualled till the middle of December. They were for some time stopped by contrary winds, accidents, and pretences, many of which were thought to be strained and sought for; but the wind being turned wholly favourable after some cross winds, which had rendered their passage slow and tedious, they came, on the 12th of August, into the bay of Cadiz. Rook had laid no disposition beforehand how to proceed upon his coming thither. Some days were lost on pretence of seeking for intelligence. It is certain our court had false accounts of the state the place was in, both with relation to the garrison and the fortifications: the garrison was much stronger, and the fortifications were in a better condition, than was represented. The French men of war and the galleys that lay in the bay retired within the puntals. In the first surprise it had been easy to have followed them, and to have taken or burnt them, which Fairborn offered to execute, but Rook and the rest of his creatures did not approve of this. Some days were lost before a council of war was called. In the meanwhile the duke of Ormond sent some engineers and pilots to sound the south side of Cadiz, near the island of St. Pedro; but while this was doing, the officers, by the taking of some boats, came to know that those of Cadiz had sent over the best of their goods and other effects to the port of St. Maries, an open village over against it, on the continent of Spain; so that here was good plunder to be had easily, whereas the landing on the isle of Cadiz was likely to prove dangerous, and, as some made them believe, impracticable. In the council of war, in which their instructions were read, it was proposed to consider how they should put them in execution. O'Haro, one of the general officers, made a long speech against landing: he showed how desperate an attempt it would prove, and how different they found the state of the place from the representation made of it in England. The greater number agreed with him; and all that the duke of Ormond could say to the contrary was of no effect. Rook seemed to be of the same mind with the duke, but all his dependents were of another opinion, so this was thought to be a piece of craft in him. In conclusion, the council of war came to a resolution not to make a descent on the island of Cadiz; but, before they broke up, those whom the duke had sent to sound the landing places on the south side came and told them that, as they might land safely, so the ships might ride securely on that side: yet they had no regard to this, but adhered to their former resolution: nor were there any orders given for bombarding the town. The sea was for the most part very high while they lay there, but it was so calm for one day, that the engineers believed they could have done much mischief, but they had no orders for it; and indeed it appeared very evidently that they intended to do nothing but rob St. Maries.

A landing on the continent was resolved on, and though the sea was high, and the danger great, yet the hope of spoil made them venture on it. They landed at Rota: a party of Spanish horse seemed to threaten some resistance, but they retired, and so our men came to St. Maries, which they found deserted, but full of riches. Both officers and soldiers set themselves with great courage against this tempting but harmless enemy. Some of the general officers set a very ill example to all the rest, chiefly O'Haro and Bellasis. The duke of Ormond tried to hinder it, but did not exert his authority; for, if he had made some examples at first, he might have prevented the mischief that was done. But the whole army running so violently on the spoil, he either was not able, or, through a gentleness of temper, was not willing, to proceed to extremities. He had published a manifesto, according to his instructions, by which the Spaniards were invited to submit to the emperor; and he offered his protection to all that came in to him: but the spoil of St. Maries was thought an ill commentary on that text. After some days of unfruitful trials on the forts of that side it appeared that nothing could be done; so about the middle of September they all embarked. Some of the ships' crews were so employed, in bringing and bestowing the plunder, that they took not the necessary care to furnish themselves with fresh water. Rook, without prosecuting his other instructions, in case the design on Cadiz miscarried, gave orders only for a squadron to sail to the West Indies with some land forces; and though he had a fleet of victuallers that had provisions to the middle of December, he ordered them to sail home: by this means the men of war were so scantily furnished, that they were soon forced to be put on short allowance. Nor did Rook send advice boats, either to the ports of Algarve or to Lisbon, to see what orders or advices might be lying for him, but sailed in a direct course for England; but some ships, not being provided with water for the voyage to England, touched on the coast of Algarve to take in water.

They met with intelligence there that the Spanish plate fleet, with a good convoy of French men of war, had put in at Vigo, a port in Galicia, not far from Portugal, where the entrance was narrow and capable of a good defence. It widened within land into a bay or mouth of a river, where the ships lay very conveniently. He who commanded the French fleet ordered a boom to be laid across the entrance, and forts to be raised on both sides: he had not time to finish what he designed, otherwise the place had been inaccessible; but, as it was, the difficulty in forcing this port was believed to be greater than any they would have met with if they had landed on the isle of Cadiz. As soon as this fleet had put in at Vigo, Methuen, the queen's minister at Lisbon, sent advertisements of it to all the places where he thought our advice-boats might be ordered to call. Rook had given no orders for any to call, and so held on his course towards Cape Finisterre. But one of his captains, Hardy, whilst he watered in Algarve, heard the news there; upon which he made all the sail he could after Rook, and overtook him. Rook, upon that, turned his course towards Vigo, very unwillingly as was said, and, finding the advice was true, he resolved to force his way in.

The duke of Ormond landed with a body of the army, and attacked the forts with great bravery, while the ships broke the boom and forced the port. When the French saw what was done, they left their ships, and set some of the men-of-war and some of the galleons on fire. Our men came up with such diligence that they stopped the progress of the fire; yet fifteen men-of-war and eight galleons were burnt or sunk: but our men were in time to save five men-of-war and five galleons, which they took. Here was a great destruction made, and a great booty taken, with very little loss on our side. One of our ships was set on fire by a fire-ship, but she too was saved, though with the loss of some men, which was all the loss we sustained in this important action. The duke of Ormond marched into the country and took some forts, and the town of Ritondella, where much plunder was found: the French seamen and soldiers escaped, for we, having no horse, were not in a condition to pursue them. The Spaniards appeared at some distance in a great body, but they did not offer to enter into any action with the duke of Ormond. It appeared that the resentments of that proud nation, which was now governed by French councils, were so high, that they would not put themselves in any danger, or to any trouble, even to save their own fleet, when it was in such hands.

After this great success, it came under consultation, whether it was not advisable to leave a good squadron of ships, with the land forces, to winter at Vigo. The neighbourhood of Portugal made that they could be well furnished with provisions and all other necessities from thence. This might also encourage that king to declare himself, when there was such a force and fleet lying so near him. It might likewise encourage such of the Spaniards as favoured the emperor to declare themselves, when they saw a safe place of retreat and a force to protect them. The duke of Ormond, upon these considerations, offered to stay if Rook would have consented; but he excused it: he had sent home the victuallers with the stores, and so he could not spare what was necessary for such as would stay there: and indeed he had so ordered the matter, that he could not stay long enough to try whether they could raise and search the men-of-war and the galleons that were sunk. He was obliged to make all possible haste home; and if the wind had turned to the east, which was ordinary in that season, a great part of our ships' crews must have died of hunger.

The wind continued favourable, so they got home safe, but half starved. Thus ended this expedition, which was ill projected, and worse executed. The duke of Ormond told me he had not half the ammunition that was necessary for the taking Cadiz, if they had defended themselves well; though he believed they would not have made any great resistance, if he had landed on his first arrival, and not given them time to recover from the disorder into which the first surprise had put them. A great deal of the treasure taken at Vigo was embezzled, and fell into private hands*. One of the galleons foundered at sea. The public was not much enriched by this extraordinary capture, yet the loss our enemies made by it was a vast one; and, to complete the ruin of the Spanish merchants, their king seized on the plate that was taken out of the ships, upon their first arrival at Vigo. Thus the campaign ended; very happily for the allies, and most gloriously for the queen, whose first year, being such a continued course of success, gave a hopeful presage of what might be hereafter expected.

* At Stowe, the seat of the duke of Buckingham, is a large chest, inlaid with mother of pearl, and called "The Vigo Chest." It is said to have contained treasure, and was brought here by sir Peter Temple, one of queen Anne's generals.

The session of parliament comes next to be related. The queen did not openly interpose in the elections, but her inclination to the tories appearing plainly, all people took it for granted that she wished they might be the majority. This wrought on the inconstancy and servility that is natural to multitudes; and the conceit, which had been infused and propagated with much industry, that the whigs had charged the nation with great taxes, of which a large share had been devoured by themselves, had so far turned the tide, that the tories in the house of commons were at least double the number of the whigs. They met full of fury against the memory of the late king, and against those who had been employed by him. The first instance wherein this appeared was in their address to the queen, congratulating her great successes: they added, that, by her wise and happy conduct, the honour of the kingdom was "retrieved." The word "retrieved" implying that it was formerly lost: all that had a just regard to the king's memory opposed it. He had carried the honour of the nation further than had been done in any reign before his. To him they owed their preservation, their safety, and even the queen's being on the throne. He had designed and formed that great confederacy, at the head of which she was now set. In opposition to this, it was now said that, during his reign, things had been conducted by strangers, and trusted to them; and that a vast treasure had been spent in unprofitable campaigns in Flanders. The Partition Treaty, and every thing else with which the former reign could be loaded, was brought into the account, and the keeping the word "retrieved" in the address was carried by a great majority; all that had favour at court, or hoped for any, going into it*. Controverted elections were judged in favour of tories with such a barefaced partiality, that it shewed the party was resolved on every thing that might serve their ends.

Of this I shall only give two instances. The one was of the borough of Hindon, near me at Salisbury, where, upon a complaint of bribery, the proof was so full and clear, that they ordered a bill to disfranchise the town for that bribery; and yet, because the bribes were given by a man of their party, they would not pass a vote on him as guilty of it: so that a borough was voted to lose its right of electing, because many in it were guilty of a corruption, in which no man appeared to be the actor. The other was of more importance; and, because it may be set up for a precedent, I will be more particular in the report. Mr. John How had been vice-chamberlain to the late queen, but missing some of those advantages that he had proposed to himself, he had gone into the highest opposition that was made in the house of commons to the court during the last reign; not without many indecent reflections on the person of the late king, and a most virulent attacking of all his ministers. He was a man of some wit, but of little judgment, and of small principles of religion: he stood knight of the shire for Gloucestershire, and had drawn a party in that county to join with him in an address to the queen, in which reflections were made on the danger and ill usage she had gone through in the former reign. This address was received by the queen in so particular a manner, that it looked like the owning that the contents of it were true: but she made such an excuse for this, when the offence it gave was laid before her, that probably she was not acquainted with the matter of the address when she so received it. Upon this, great opposition was made to his election. When it came to the poll, it appeared he had lost it; so the sheriff was moved for a scrutiny, to examine whether all those who had sworn that they were freeholders of forty shillings a-year had sworn true. By the act of parliament the matter was referred to the party's oath, and their swearing false was declared perjury; therefore such as had sworn falsely were liable to a prosecution: but, by all laws, an oath is looked upon as an end of controversy, till he who swore is convicted of perjury: and the sheriff, being an officer named by the court, if he had a power to review the poll, this put the election of counties wholly in the power of the crown: yet, upon this occasion, the heat of a party prevailed so far, that they voted How duly elected†.

* It was proposed to substitute the word "maintained," but, after a stormy debate, this was negatived by 180 to 80.—Chandler's Debates, House of Commons, iii. 205.

† Mr. John How was a native of Nottinghamshire. He represented Cirencester in the convention parliament, and was a member in every parliament during the reigns of William and Anne. In the latter, he was a privy councillor, and vice-admiral of Gloucestershire. His other preferment will be notice! in a future page. He died in 1721. He was the author of "A Panegyric on King William," and several minor productions.—Collier's Peerage.

The house of commons very unanimously, and with great dispatch, agreed to all the demands of the court, and voted all the supplies that were necessary for carrying on the war. Upon the duke of Marlborough's coming over, a new demand for an additional force was made, since the king of France had given out commissions for a great increase of his armies. Upon that, the States moved the queen for ten thousand more men. This was consented to, but with a condition, which, how reasonable soever it might be in itself, yet the manner in which it was managed showed a very ill disposition towards the Dutch; and in the debate they were treated very indecently. It was insisted on that, before the pay of these new troops should begin, the States should prohibit all trade with France, and break off all correspondence with that kingdom. It was indeed true, that France could not have supplied their armies in Italy but by the means of this secret trade; so it was reasonable to break it: but the imposing it on the Dutch, in the manner in which this was pressed, carried in it too high a strain of authority over them. There is a country that subsists not by any intrinsic wealth of their own, but by their trade: some seemed to hope that the opposition, which would be raised on this head, might force a peace, at which many among us were driving so indecently, that they took little care to conceal it. The States resolved to comply with England in every thing; and though they did not like the manner of demanding this, yet they readily consented to it. The ordinary business of a session of parliament was soon dispatched, no opposition being made to the supply, at which, in the former reign, things stuck longest.

When those matters were settled, a bill was brought in by the tories against occasional conformity, which produced great and long debates*. By this bill, all those who took the sacrament and test (which, by the act passed in the year 1673, was made necessary to those who held offices of trust, or were magistrates in corporations, but was only to be taken once by them), and did after that go to the meetings of dissenters, or any meeting for religious worship, that was not according to the liturgy or practice of the church of England, where five persons were present more than the family, were disabled from holding their employments, and were to be fined in 100*l.* and in 5*l.* a day for every day in which they continued to act in their employments, after their having been at any such meeting. They were also made incapable to hold any other employment till after one whole year's conformity to the church, which was to be proved at the quarter session. Upon a relapse, the penalty and the time of incapacity were doubled: no limitation of time was put in the bill, nor of the way in which the offence was to be proved. But, whereas the act of the test only included the magistrates in corporations, all the inferior officers or freemen in corporations, who were found to have some interest in the elections, were now comprehended within this bill. The preamble of the bill asserted the toleration, and condemned all persecution for conscience' sake in a high strain. Some thought the bill was of no consequence, and that, if it should pass into a law, it would be of no effect; but that the occasional conformists would become constant ones. Others thought that this was such a breaking in upon the toleration as would undermine it, and that it would have a great effect on corporations; as indeed the intent of it was believed to be the modelling of elections, and by consequence of the house of commons.

On behalf of the bill, it was said the design of the test act was, that all in office should continue in the communion of the church: that coming only once to the sacrament for an office, and going afterwards to the meetings of dissenters, was both an eluding the intent of the law and a profanation of the sacrament, which gave great scandal, and was abhorred by the better sort of dissenters. Those who were against the bill said, the nation had been quiet ever since the toleration, the dissenters had lost more ground and strength by it than the church. The nation was now engaged in a great war; it seemed therefore unseasonable to raise animosities at home in matters of religion, at such a time, and to encourage a tribe of informers who were the worst sort of men. The fines were excessive, higher than any laid on papists by law; and since no limitation of time, nor concurrence of witnesses, was provided for in the bill, men would be for ever exposed to the malice of a bold swearer, or wicked servant. It was moved, that since the greatest danger of all was from atheists and papists, that all such as received the sacrament for an office, should be obliged to receive it three times a-year, which all were by law required to do ; and to keep to their parish church at least one Sunday a month, but this was not admitted. All who pleaded for the bill did in words declare for the continuance of the toleration, yet the sharpness with which they treated the dissenters in all their speeches showed as if they designed their extirpation. The bill was carried in the house of commons by a great majority. The debates held longer in the house of lords : many were against it, because of the high penalties : some remembered the practice of informers in the end of king Charles's reign, and would not consent to the reviving such infamous methods : all believed that the chief design of this bill was to model corporations and to cast out of them all those who would not vote in elections for tories. The toleration itself was visibly aimed at, and this was only a step to break in upon it. Some thought the design went yet further, to raise such quarrels and distractions among us as would so embroil us at home, that our allies might see they could not depend upon us ; and that we, being weakened by the disorders occasioned by those prosecutions, might be disabled from carrying on the war, which was the chief thing driven at by the promoters of the bill. So that many of the lords, as well as the bishops, agreed in opposing this bill, though upon different views ; yet they consented to some parts of it, chiefly that such as went to meetings, after they had received the sacrament, should be disabled from holding any employments, and be fined in twenty pounds. Many went into this, though they were against every part of the bill, because they thought this the most plausible way of losing it ; since the house of commons had of late set it up for a maxim, that the lords could not alter the fines that they should fix in a bill, this being a meddling with money, which they thought was so peculiar to them, that they would not let the lords on any pretence break in upon it.

The lords hereupon appointed a very exact search to be made into all the rolls that lay in the clerk of the parliament's office, from the middle of king Henry the Seventh's reign down to the present time ; and they found, by some hundreds of precedents, that in some bills the lords began the clauses that set the fines ; and that when fines were set by the commons sometimes they altered the fines, and at other times they changed the use to which they were applied. The report made of this was so full and clear, that there was no possibility of replying to it, and the lords ordered it to be entered in their books. But the commons were resolved to maintain their point without entering into any debate upon it. The lords also added clauses requiring proof to be made by two witnesses, and that the information should be given in within ten days, and the prosecution commenced within three months after the fact. The commons agreed to this, but would not alter the penalties that they had set. The thing depended long between the two houses ; both sides took pains to bring up the lords that would vote with them, so that there were above a hundred and thirty lords in the house, the greatest number that had ever been together.

The court put their whole strength to carry the bill. Prince George, who had received the sacrament as lord high admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way, so that he was an occasional communicant, came and voted for the bill. After some conferences, wherein each house had yielded some smaller differences to the other, it came to a free conference in the painted chamber, which was the most crowded upon that occasion that had ever been known ; so much weight was laid on this matter on both sides.

When the lords retired, and it came to the final vote "of adhering," the lords were so equally divided, that in three questions, put on different heads, the "adhering" was carried but by one voice in every one of them ; and it was a different person that gave it in all the three divisions. The commons likewise adhered, so the bill was lost. This bill seemed to favour the interests of the church, so hot men were for it ; and the greater number of the bishops being against it, they were censured as cold and slack in the concerns of the church, a reproach that all moderate men must expect when they oppose violent motions. A great part of this fell on myself ; for I bore a large share in the debates, both in the house of lords and at the free conference. Angry men took occasion from hence to charge the bishops as enemies to the church, and betrayers of its interests, because we would not run blindfold into the passions and designs of ill-tempered men ; though we can appeal to all the world, and, which is more, to God himself, that we did faithfully and zealously pursue the true interests of the church, the promoting religion and learning, the encouraging of all good men and good designs, and that we did apply ourselves to the duties of our function and to the work of the gospel. Having this quiet within ourselves, we must bear the cross and submit to the will of God. The less of our reward that we receive from men, we have so much the more to look for from Him.

While the bill that had raised so much heat was in agitation, the queen sent a message to the commons, desiring them to make some suitable provision for prince George, in case he should outlive her. He was many years elder than the queen, and was troubled with an asthma that every year had very ill effects on his health; it had brought him into great danger this winter, yet the queen thought it became her to provide for all events. Howe moved that it should be 100,000*l.* a-year. This was seconded by those who knew how acceptable the motion would be to the queen, though it was the double of what any queen in England ever had in jointure; so it passed without any opposition. But while it was passing, a motion was made upon a clause in the act, which limited the succession to the Hanover family, which provided against strangers, though naturalized, being capable to hold any employments among us. This plainly related only to those who should be naturalized in a future reign, and had no retrospect to such as were already naturalized, or should be naturalized during the present reign. It was, however, proposed as doubtful whether, when that family might reign, all who were naturalized before should not be incapacitated by that clause from sitting in parliament, or holding employments; and a clause was offered to except the prince from being comprehended in that incapacity. Against this two objections lay: one was, that the lords had resolved by a vote, to which the greater number had set their hands, that they would never pass any money bill sent up to them by the commons, to which any clause was tacked that was foreign to the bill. They had done this to prevent the commons from fastening matters of a different nature to a money bill, and then pretending that the lords could not meddle with it; for this was a method to alter the government and bring it entirely into their own hands. By this means, when money was necessary for preserving the nation, they might force not only the lords, but the crown, to consent to every thing they proposed by tacking it to a money bill. It was said that a capacity for holding employments, and for sitting in the house of lords, were things of a different nature from money; so that this clause seemed to many to be a tack, whereas others thought it was no tack, because both parts of the act related to the same person. The other objection was, that this clause seemed to imply, that persons already naturalized, and in possession of the rights of natural born subjects, were to be excluded in the next reign; though all people knew that no such thing was intended when the act of succession passed. Great opposition was made for both these reasons to the passing this clause; but the queen pressed it with the greatest earnestness she had yet shewed in any thing whatsoever: she thought it became her, as a good wife, to have the act passed; in which she might be the more earnest, because it was not thought advisable to move for an act that should take prince George into a consortship of the regal dignity. This matter raised a great heat in the house of lords: those who had been advanced by the late king, and were in his interests, did not think it became them to consent to this, which seemed to be a prejudice, or at least a disgrace to those whom he had raised. The court managed the matter so dexterously that the bill passed, and the queen was highly displeased with those who had opposed it, among whom I had my share. The clause was put in the bill by some in the house of commons, only because they believed it would be opposed by those against whom they intended to irritate the queen.

Soon after this the commons sent up a bill in favour of those who had not taken the oath, abjuring the prince of Wales, by the day that was named, granting them a year longer to consider of it; for it was said, that the whole party was now come entirely into the queen's interests: though, on the other hand, it was given out that agents were come from France, on design to persuade all persons to take the abjuration, that they might become capable of employments, and so might in time be a majority in parliament, and by that means the act of succession, and the oath imposed by it, might be repealed. When the bill for thus prolonging the time was brought up to the lords, a clause was added, qualifying those persons who should in the new extent of time take the oaths, to return to their benefices or employments, unless they were already legally filled. When this was agreed, two clauses of much greater consequence were added to the bill. One was, declaring it high treason to endeavour to defeat the succession to the crown, as it was now limited by law, or to set aside the next successor. This had a precedent in the former reign, so it could not be denied now. It seemed the more necessary, because there was another person who openly claimed the crown, so that a further security might well be insisted on. This was a great surprise to many, who were visibly uneasy at the motion, but were not prepared for it, and did not see how it could be resisted. The other clause was for sending the abjuration to Ireland, and obliging all there (in the same manner as in England) to take it. This seemed the more reasonable, considering the strength of the popish interest there. Both clauses passed in the house of lords without any opposition; but it was apprehended that the house of commons would not be so easy: yet, when it was sent to them, they struggled only against the first clause, that barred the return of persons, upon their taking the oaths, into places that were already filled. The party tried their strength upon this, and upon their success in it they seemed resolved to dispute the other clause; but it was carried, though only by one voice, to agree with the lords. When the clause relating to the succession was read, Musgrave tried if it might not be made a bill by itself, and not put as a clause in another bill; but he saw the house was resolved to receive both clauses, so he did not insist on his motion. All people were surprised to see a bill that was begun in favour of the jacobites turned so terribly upon them, since by it we had a new security given, both in England and Ireland, for a protestant successor.

At this time, the earl of Rochester quitted his place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He was uneasy at the preference which the duke of Marlborough had in the queen's confidence, and at the lord Godolphin's being lord treasurer. It was generally believed he was endeavouring to embroil our affairs, and that he was laying a train of opposition in the house of commons. The queen sent a message to him, ordering him to make ready to go to Ireland; for it seemed very strange, especially in a time of war, that a person in so great a post should not attend upon it; but he, after some days advising about it, went to the queen, and desired to be excused from that employment. This was readily accepted, and upon that he withdrew from the councils. It was immediately offered to the duke of Ormond, and he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Ormond, upon his first arrival from the expedition to Cadiz, complained very openly of Rook's conduct, and seemed resolved to carry the matter to a public accusation; but the court found the party that prevailed in the house of commons determined to justify Rook: so, to comply with this, the queen made him a privy councillor; and much pains were taken on the duke of Ormond to stifle his resentments. He was in a great measure softened, yet he had made his complaints to so many lords, that they moved the house to examine both his instructions and the journals relating to that expedition. A committee of the house of peers sat long upon the matter: they examined all the admirals and land officers, as well as Rook himself, upon the whole progress of that affair. Rook was so well supported by the court, and by his party in the house of commons, that he seemed to despise all that the lords could do. Some who understood sea matters said that it appeared, from every motion that he made during the expedition, that he intended to do nothing but amuse and make a show. They also concluded, from the protection that the ministry gave him, that they intended no other. He took much pains to show how improper a thing a descent on Cadiz was, and how fatal the attempt must have proved; and, in doing this, he arraigned his instructions, and the design he was sent on, with great boldness, and showed little regard to the ministers, who took more pains to bring him off than to justify themselves. The lords of the committee prepared a report, which was hard upon Rook, and laid it before the house; but so strong a party was made to oppose every thing that reflected on him, that though every particular in the report was well proved, yet it was rejected, and a vote was carried in his favour, justifying his whole conduct. The great employment given to the duke of Ormond so effectually prevailed on him, that though the enquiry was set on by his means, and upon his suggestions, yet he came not to the house when it was brought to a conclusion. So Rook, being but faintly pushed by him, and most zealously supported by his party, was justified by a vote, though universally condemned by more impartial judges. The behaviour of the ministry in this matter heightened the jealousies with which many were possessed, for it was inferred that they were not in earnest in his whole expedition; since the conduct being so contrary to the instructions, the justifying the one was plainly condemning the other.

The report made by the commissioners appointed to take the public accounts was another business that took up much time in this session, and occasioned many debates. They pretended that they had made great discoveries: they began with the earl of Ranelagh, who had been in great posts, and had all the arts that were necessary to recommend a man in a court, who stuck at nothing that could maintain his interest with those whom he served: he had been paymaster of the army in king James's time, and, being very fit for the post, he had been continued all the last reign: he had lived high, and so it was believed his appointments could not support so great an expense: he had an account of one and twenty millions lay upon him. It was given out that a great deal of the money, lodged in his office for the pay of the army, was diverted to other uses, distributed among favourites, or given to corrupt members of parliament; and that some millions had been sent over to Holland. It had been often said, that great discoveries would be made, whensoever his accounts were looked into; and that he, to save himself, would lay open the ill practices of the former reign. But now, when all was brought under a strict examination, a few inconsiderable articles of some hundreds of pounds was all that could be found to be objected to him; and even to these he gave clear and full answers. At last they found that, upon the breaking of a regiment, a sum which he had issued out for its pay had been returned to his office, the regiment being broke sooner than that pay was exhausted; and that no entry of this was made in his accounts. To this he answered, that his officer, who received the money, was within three days after taken so ill of a confirmed stone, that he never again came to the office, but died in great misery, and, during those three days, he had not entered that sum in the books. Lord Ranelagh acknowledged that he was liable to account for all the money that was received by his under officers, but here was no crime or fraud designed; yet this was so aggravated, that he saw his good post was his greatest guilt; so he quitted that, which was divided into two: one was appointed to be paymaster of the guards and garrisons at home, and another of the forces that were kept beyond sea. Howe had the first, as being the more lasting post*. With this all the clamour raised against the earl of Ranelagh was let fall; yet, to make a show of severity, he was expelled the house. But he appeared, upon all this canvassing, to be much more innocent than even his friends had believed him†.

The clamour that had been long kept up against the former ministry, as devourers of the public treasure, was of such use to the party, that they resolved to continue it by all possible methods. So a committee of the house of commons prepared a long address to the queen, reflecting on the ill management of the funds, upon which they laid the great debt of the nation, and not upon the deficiencies. This was branched out into many particulars, which were all heavily aggravated. Yet, though a great part of the outcry had been formerly

* The second was given to Mr. Fox.—Mackay's Characters.

† Richard Jones, earl of Ranelagh, has been styled "one of the ablest men Ireland ever bred." Mackay's "Characters" describes him as having "a great deal of wit, having originally no great estate, yet hath spent more money, built more fine houses, and laid out more on household furniture and gardening than any other nobleman in England. He is a great epicure, and prodigious expensive; was paymaster all the last war, and is above 100,000*l.* sterling in arrears, which several parliaments have been calling him to account for, yet he escapes with the punishment only of losing his place. He is a bold man, and very happy in jests and repartees, and hath often turned the humour of the house of commons, when they have designed to be very severe. He is very fat, black, and turned of 60 years old." It is certain that the earl had not honesty sufficient to resist availing himself of any resources that enabled him to live in the splendid extravagance that delighted him, but this must have been sustained by considerable ability, or he could not have succeeded in pleasing such opposite characters as the licentious Charles, the bigotted James, the phlegmatic William, and the pious Anne. But his talents were not rendered amiable by a christian spirit. He never forgave his daughter, lady Coningsby, for marrying contrary to his wishes, and gave the fortune he intended for her to Greenwich Hospital. He died in 1711. His house and gardens at Chelsea became the public place of amusement, formerly so well known as Ranelagh.—Clarendon Correspondence; Peerages; Noble's Contin. of Grainger.

made against Russel, treasurer of the navy, and his officer, they found not so much as a colour to fix a complaint there; nor could they charge any thing on the chancery, the treasury, or the administration of justice. Great complaints were made of some accounts that stood long out, and they insisted on some pretended neglects, the old methods of the exchequer not having been exactly followed; though it did not appear that the public suffered in any sort by those failures. They kept up a clamour likewise against the commissioners of the prizes, though they had passed their accounts as the law directed, and no objection was made to them. The address was full of severe reflections and spiteful insinuations; and thus it was carried to the queen, and published to the nation, as the sense of the commons of England.

The lords, to prevent the ill impressions this might make, appointed a committee to examine all the observations that the commissioners of accounts had offered to both houses. They searched all the public offices, and were amazed to find that there was not one article in all the long address that the commons had made to the queen, or in the observations then before them, that was of any importance, but was false in fact. They found the deficiencies in the former reign were of two sorts; the one was of sums that the commons had voted, but for which they had made no sort of provision; the other was where the supply that was given came short of the sum it was estimated at: and between these two the deficiencies amounted to fourteen millions: this was the root of the great debt that lay on the nation. They examined into all the pretended mismanagement, and found that what the commons had stated so invidiously was mistaken. So far had the late king and his ministers been from misapplying the money that was given for public occasions, that he applied three millions to the public service that by law was his own money, of which they made up the account. They also found that some small omissions in some of the forms of the exchequer were of no consequence, and neither had nor could have any ill effect: and whereas a great clamour was raised against passing of accounts by privy seals, they put an end to that effectually, when it appeared on what ground this was done. By the ancient methods of the exchequer, every account was to be carried on, so that the new officer was to begin his account with the balance of the former account. Sir Edward Seymour, who had been treasurer of the navy, owed by his last account 180,000*l.*, and he had received after that 140,000*l.*, for which the accounts were never made up. Now it was not possible for those who came after him to be liable for his accounts. Therefore the treasurers of the navy in the last reign were forced to take out privy seals for making up their accounts. These imported no more than that they were to account only for the money that they themselves had received; for, in all other respects, their accounts were to pass according to the ordinary methods of the exchequer. Complaints had been also made of the remissness of the lords of the treasury, or their officers, appointed to account with the receivers of counties for the aids that had been given: but, when this was examined, it appeared that this had been done with such exactness that, of the sum of twenty-four millions for which they had accounted, there was not owing above 60,000*l.*, and that was for the most part in Wales, where it was not thought advisable to use too much rigour in raising it; and of that sum there was not above 14,000*l.* that was to be reckoned as lost. The collectors of the customs likewise answered all the observations made on their accounts so fully, that the house of commons was satisfied with their answers, and dismissed them without so much as a reprimand. All this was reported to the house of lords, and they laid it before the queen in an address, which was afterwards printed with the vouchers to every particular. By this means it was made out, to the satisfaction of the whole nation, how false those reports were which had been so industriously spread, and were so easily believed by the greater part. For the bulk of mankind will be always apt to think that courts and ministers serve their own ends, and study to enrich themselves at the public cost. This examination held long, and was followed with great exactness, and had all the effect that could be desired from it; for it silenced that noise which the late king's enemies had raised to asperse him and his ministers. With this the session of parliament ended. In it the lords had rendered themselves very considerable, and had gained an universal reputation over the whole nation. It is true, those who had opposed the persons that had carried matters before them in this session were so near them in number, that things of the greatest consequence were carried only by one or two voices, therefore, as they intended to have a clear majority in both houses in the next session, they prevailed with the queen, soon after the prorogation, to create four new peers, who had been the most violent of the whole party: Finch, Gower, Granville, and young Seymour were made barons. Great reflections were made upon this promotion. When some severe things had been thrown out in the house of commons upon the opposition that they met with from the lords, it was insinuated, that it would be easy to find men of merit and estate to make a clear majority in that house. This was an open declaration of a design to put every thing in the hands and power of that party. It was also an encroachment on one of the tenderest points of the prerogative to make motions of creating peers in the house of commons. Hervey, though of the other side, was at the same time made a baron by private favour. Thus the session of parliament was brought to a much better conclusion than could have been reasonably expected by those, who knew of whom it was constituted and how it had begun. No harm was done in it: the succession was fortified by a new security, and the popular clamours of corruption and peculation, with which the nation had been so much possessed, were in a great measure dissipated.

The proceedings of the convocation, which sat at the same time, are next to be related. At the first opening of it there was a contest between the two houses, that lasted some days, concerning an address to the queen. The lower house intended to cast some reflections on the former reign, in imitation of what the house of commons had done, and these were worded so invidiously, that most of the bishops were pointed at by them; but the upper house refusing to concur, the lower house receded, and so they both agreed in a very decent address. The queen received it graciously, promising all favour and protection to the church, and exhorting them all to peace and union among themselves. After this, the lower house made an address to the bishops, that they might find an expedient for putting an end to those disputes, that had stopped the proceedings of former convocations. The bishops resolved to offer them all that they could, without giving up their character and authority; so they made a proposition that, in the intervals of sessions, the lower house might appoint committees to prepare matters, and when business was brought regularly before them, that the archbishop should so order the prorogations, that they might have convenient and sufficient time to sit and deliberate about it. This fully satisfied many of that body; but the majority thought this kept the matter still in the archbishop's power, as it was indeed intended it should. So they made another application to the bishops, desiring them to refer the points in question to the queen's decision, and to such as she should appoint to hear and settle them. To this the bishops answered, that they reckoned themselves safe and happy in the queen's protection, and would pay all due submission to her pleasure and orders. But the rights, which the constitution of the church and the law had vested in them, were trusts lodged with them, which they were to convey to their successors as they had received them from their predecessors, and that it was not in their power to refer them. It would have been a strange sight, very acceptable to the enemies of the church, chiefly to papists, to see the two houses of convocation pleading their authority and rights before a committee of council that was to determine the matter. This failing, the lower house tried what they could obtain of the house of commons; but they could not be carried further than a general vote, which amounted to nothing, that they would stand by them in all their just rights and privileges. They next made a separate address to the queen, desiring her protection, praying her to hear and determine the dispute. She received this favourably; she said she would consider of it, and send them her answer. The matter was now brought into the hands of the ministers. The earl of Nottingham was of their side, but confessed that he understood not the controversy. The judges and the queen's council were ordered to examine how the matter stood in point of law, which was thus stated to them. The constant practice, as far as we had books or records, was, that the archbishop prorogued the convocation by a schedule: of this the form was so fixed, that it could not be altered but by act of parliament. There was a clause in the schedule that continued all matters before the convocation, in the state in which they then were, to the day to which he prorogued them: this made it evident that there could be no intermediate session; for a session of the lower house could, by passing a vote in any matter, alter the state in which it was. It was kept a secret what opinion the lawyers came to in this matter. It was not doubted but they were against the pretensions of the lower house. The queen made no answer to their address; and it was believed that the reason of this was because the answer must, according to the opinion of lawyers, have been contrary to what they expected; and therefore the ministers chose rather to give no answer, and that it should seem to be forgotten, than that such an one should be given as would put an end to the debate, which they intended to cherish and support.

The lower house finding that, by opposing their bishops in so rough, as well as in so unheard-of, a manner, they were represented as favourers of presbytery, to clear themselves of that imputation, came suddenly into a conclusion that episcopacy was of divine and apostolical right. The party that stuck together in their votes, and kept their intermediate sessions, signed this, and brought it up to the bishops, desiring them to concur in settling the matter, so that it might be the standing rule of the church. This was a plain attempt to make a canon, or constitution, without obtaining a royal licence, which, by the statute confirming the submission of the clergy in king Henry the Eighth's time, made both them, and all who chose them, incur a premunire. So the bishops resolved not to entertain the proposition, and a great many of the lower house apprehending what the consequence of such proceedings might be, by a petition to the bishops, prayed that it might be entered in their books, that they had not concurred in that definition, nor in the address made pursuant to it. The lower house looked on what they did in this matter as a masterpiece: for if the bishops concurred with them, they reckoned they gained their point; and, if they refused it, they resolved to make them who would not come up to such a positive definition pass for secret favourers of presbytery. But the bishops saw into their designs, and sent them for answer, that they acquiesced in the declaration that was already made on that head in the preface to the book of ordinations; and that they did not think it safe either for them or for the clergy, to go further in that matter without a royal licence. To this a dark answer was made, and so all these matters were at a full stand when the session came to an end, by the prorogation of the parliament; which was become necessary, the two houses being fixed in an opposition to one another.

From those disputes in convocation, divisions ran through the whole body of the clergy, and to fix these, new names were found out; they were distinguished by the names of HIGH CHURCH and LOW CHURCH. All that treated the dissenters with temper and moderation, and were for residing constantly at their cures, and for labouring diligently in them; that expressed a zeal against the prince of Wales, and for the revolution; that wished well to the present war, and to the alliance against France, were represented as secret favourers of presbytery, and as ill affected to the church, and were called "low churchmen:" it was said that they were in the church only while the law and preferments were on its side; but that they were ready to give it up as soon as they saw a proper time for declaring themselves. With these false and invidious characters did the high party endeavour to load all those who could not be brought into their measures and designs. When the session was at an end, the court was wholly taken up with the preparations for the campaign.

The duke of Marlborough had a great domestic affliction at this time. He lost his only son, a graceful person and a very promising youth: he died at Cambridge of the small-pox. This, as may be imagined, went very deep in his father's heart, and stopped his passing the seas some days longer than he had intended. Upon his arrival on the other side, the Dutch brought their armies into the field. The first thing they undertook was the siege of Bonn. In the meanwhile all men's eyes were turned towards Bavaria. The court of Vienna had given it out all the former winter that they would bring such a force upon that elector, as would quickly put an end to that war, and seize his whole country. But the slowness of that court appeared on this as it had done on many other occasions; for though they brought two armies into the field, yet they were not able to deal with the elector's forces. Villars, who lay with his army at Strasburg, had orders to break through and join the elector: so he was to force his way to him at all adventures. He passed the Rhine, and set down before Fort Keil, which lay over against Strasburg, and took it in a few days. Prince Lewis was in no condition to raise the siege, for the best part of his army was called away to the war in Bavaria; he therefore posted himself advantageously at Stollhoffen; yet he could not have maintained it if the States had not sent him a good body of foot, which came seasonably a few days before mareschal Villars attacked him with an army that was more than double his number. But his men, chiefly the Dutch battalions, received them with so much courage, that the French were forced to quit the attack after they had lost about four thousand men in it. Yet, upon repeated orders from France, mareschal Villars resolved to venture the loss of his whole army, rather than abandon the elector; who, though he had taken Newburg and had surprised Ratisbon, and had several advantages in little engagements with the imperialists, yet was likely to be overpowered by a superior force if he was not relieved in time. The Black Forest was thought impracticable in that season, which was a very wet one. This was too much trusted to, so that the passes were ill looked after, and therefore Villars overcame all difficulties, and joined the elector; but his troops were so harassed with the march, that he was obliged to put them for some time into quarters of refreshment.

The duke of Marlborough carried on the siege of Bonn with such vigour, that they capitulated within ten days after the trenches were opened. The French reckoned upon a longer resistance, and hoped to have diverted this by an attempt upon Liege. The States had a small army about Maestricht, which the French intended to fall upon, being much superior to it; but they found the Dutch in so good order, and so well posted, that they retired within their lines as soon as they saw the duke of Marlborough, after the siege of Bonn, was marching towards them. The winter had produced very little action in Italy. The country was under another very heavy plague, by a continued succession of threatening, and of some very devouring earthquakes: Rome itself had a share in the common calamity; but it proved to them more dreadful than it was mischievous. Prince Eugene found that his letters and the most pressing representations he could send to the court of Vienna had no effect; so at last he obtained leave to go thither.

The motions of the Dutch army made it believed there was a design on Antwerp. Cohorn was making advances in the Dutch Flanders, and Opdam commanded a small army on the other side of the Scheld, while the duke of Marlborough lay with the main army near the lines in Brabant. Boufflers was detached from Villeroy's army with a body double in number to Opdam's, to fall on him. He marched so quick that the Dutch, being surprised at Eckeren, were put in great disorder; and Opdam, apprehending all was lost, fled with a body of his men to Breda. But the Dutch rallied, and maintained their ground with such firmness, that the French retired, little to their honour; since though they were much superior in number, yet they let the Dutch recover out of their first confusion, and keep their ground, although forsaken by their general, who justified himself in the best manner he could, and cast the blame on others.

Boufflers's conduct was so much censured, that it was thought this finished his disgrace; for he was no more put at the head of the French armies; nor was the duke of Marlborough without some share of censure on this occasion, since it was pretended that he ought to have sent a force to support Opdam, or have made an attempt on Villeroy's army, when it was weakened by the detachment sent with Boufflers.

The French lines were judged to be so strong that the forcing them seemed impracticable, so the duke of Marlborough turned towards Huy, which was soon taken; and after that to Limburg, which he took with no loss but that of so much time as was necessary to bring up a train of artillery; and, as soon as that was done, the garrison were made prisoners of war, for they were in no condition to maintain a siege. Guelder was also blocked up, so that before the end of the campaign it was brought to capitulate. Thus the Lower Rhine was secured, and all that country, called the Coudras, was entirely reduced. This was all that our troops, in conjunction with the Dutch, could do in Flanders. We had the superior army, but, what by reason of the cautious maxims of the States, what by reason of the factions among them (which were rising very high between those who had been of the late king's party, and were now for having a captain general, and those of the Lovestein party, who were for governing all by a deputation from the States), no great design could be undertaken by an army so much distracted.

In the Upper Rhine matters went much worse. Villars lay for some time on the Danube, while the elector of Bavaria marched into Tirol, and possessed himself of Inspruck. The emperor's force was so broken into many small armies, in different places, that he had not one good army any where; he had none at all in Tirol: and all that the prince of Baden could do was to watch Villars's motions; but he did not venture on attacking him during this separation. Many blamed his conduct: some called his courage, and others his fidelity, in question; while many excused him, since his army was both weak and ill furnished in all respects. The duke of Vendome had orders to march from the Milanese to Tirol, there to join the elector of Bavaria: upon which junction the ruin of the house of Austria would have probably followed; but the boors in Tirol rose and attacked the elector with so much resolution, that he was forced to retire out of the country with considerable loss, and was driven out before the duke of Vendome could join him, so that he came too late. He seemed to have a design on Trent, but the boors were now so animated with their successes, and were so conducted and supported by officers and troops sent them by the emperor, that Vendome was forced to return back, without being able to effect any thing.

Nothing passed this summer in Italy. The imperialists were too weak, and too ill supplied from Germany to be able to act offensively; and the miscarriage of the design upon Tirol lost the French so much time, that they undertook nothing, unless it were the siege of Ostiglia, in which they failed. Bresello, after a long blockade, was forced to capitulate, and by that means the French possessed themselves of the duke of Modena's country. The duke of Burgundy came to Alsace and sat down before Brisac, of which he was soon master, by the cowardice, or treachery, of those who commanded, for which they were condemned by a council of war.

The emperor's misfortunes grew upon him. Cardinal Calonitz and Esterhasi had the government of Hungary trusted chiefly to them. The former was so cruel, and the other so ravenous, that the Hungarians took advantage from this distraction in the emperor's affairs to run together in great bodies, and in many places, setting prince Ragotski at their head. They demanded that their grievances should be redressed, and that their privileges should be restored. They were much animated in this by the practices of the French, and the elector of Bavaria's agents. Some small assistance was sent them by the way of Poland. They were encouraged to enter upon no treaty, but to unite and fortify themselves; assurances being given them that no peace should be concluded, unless they were fully restored to all their ancient liberties.

The court of Vienna was much alarmed at this, fearing it might be secretly set on by the Turks; though that court gave all possible assurances that they would maintain the peace of Carlowitz most religiously, and that they would in no sort encourage or assist the malcontents. A revolution happening in that empire, in which a new sultan was set up, raised new apprehensions of a breach on that side. But the sultan renewed the assurances of maintaining the peace so solemnly, that all those fears were soon dissipated. There was a great faction in the emperor's court, and among his ministers; and it did not appear that he had strength of genius enough to govern them. Count Mansfield was much suspected of being in the interests of France. The prince of Baden and prince Eugene both agreed in charging his conduct, though they differed almost in every thing else. Yet he was so possessed of the emperor's favour and confidence, that it was not easy to get him set aside. In conclusion, he was advanced to a high post in the emperor's household, and prince Eugene was made president of the council of war.

But what effect soever this might have in succeeding campaigns, it was then too late in the year to find remedies for the present disorders: and all affairs on the south of the Danube were falling into great confusion. Things went a little better on the north side of that river. The upper palatinate was entirely conquered; but near the end of the year Augsburg was forced to submit to the elector of Bavaria, and Landau was besieged by the French. Tallard, who commanded the siege, took it in fewer weeks than it had cost the Germans months to take it in the former year. Nor was this all; an army of the confederates was brought together to raise the siege: the young prince of Hesse commanded, but the prince of Nassau Welburg, as a man of more experience in war, was chiefly depended on, though his conduct showed how little he deserved it. The emperor's birthday was a day of diversion, and the German generals, then at Spire, allowed themselves all the idle liberties used in courts on such days, without the ordinary precaution of having scouts or parties abroad, in the same careless state as if no enemy had been near them. Tallard, having intelligence of this, left a part of his army to make a show, and maintain the works before Landau, and marched with his best troops against the Germans. He surprised and routed them; upon which Landau capitulated. With this the warlike operations of this campaign ended very gloriously, and with great advantage to the French.

But two great negotiations, then brought to a conclusion, very much changed the face of affairs. All the confederates pressed the king of Portugal to come into the alliance, as his own interest led him to it; since it was visible that, as soon as Spain was once united to the crown of France, he could not hope to continue long in Portugal. The almirante of Castile was believed to be in the interests of the house of Austria, therefore, to send him out of the way, he was appointed to go ambassador to France. He seemed to undertake it, and made the necessary preparations; he saw this embassy was intended for an exile, and that it put him in the power of his enemies: so, after he had raised what was necessary to defray his expense, he secretly changed his course, and escaped with the wealth he had in his hands to Lisbon; where he entered into secret negotiations with the king of Portugal and the emperor. He gave great assurances of the good dispositions in which both the people and garndeos of Spain were, who were grown sick of their new masters. The risk he himself ran seemed a very full credential. He assured them the new king was despised, and that the French about him were universally hated: the Spaniards could not bear the being made a province, either to France, or to the emperor.

He therefore proposed that the emperor and the king of the Romans should renounce all their pretensions and transfer them to the archduke, and declare him king of Spain; and that he should be immediately sent thither; for he assured them the Spaniards would not revolt from a king that was in possession, till they saw another king who claimed his right; and, in that case, they would think they had a right to adhere to the king they liked best. The king of Portugal likewise demanded an enlargement of his frontiers, and some new accessions to his crown, which were reasonable, but could not be stipulated but by a king of Spain.

In the treaty that the emperor had made with the late king, and with the States, one article was, that they should be at liberty to possess themselves of the dominions which the crown of Spain had in the West Indies, and he vested in them the right that their arms should give them in these acquisitions; upon which the king had designed to send a great fleet, with a land army, into the bay of Mexico, to seize some important places there, with a design of restoring them to the crown of Spain, upon advantageous articles for a free trade, as soon as the Spaniards should receive a king of the house of Austria. This design was now laid aside, and the reason that the ministers gave for it was, that the almirante had assured them that, if we possessed ourselves of any of their places in the West Indies, the whole nation would by that means become entirely French; they would never believe our promises of restoring them; and, seeing they had no naval power of their own to recover them they would go into the French interest very cordially, as the only way left to recover these places.

An entire credit was given to the almirante; so the queen and the States agreed to send over a great fleet, with a land army of twelve thousand men, together with a great supply of money and arms to Portugal; that king undertaking to have an army of twenty-eight thousand men ready to join ours. In this treaty an incident happened, that had almost spoiled the whole; the king of Portugal insisted on demanding the flag, and the other respects to be paid by our admiral, when he was in his ports: the earl of Nottingham insisted it was a dishonour to England to strike, even in another king's ports; this was not demanded of the fleet that was sent to bring over queen Katharine; so, though Methuen, our ambassador, had agreed to this article, he pressed the queen not to ratify it.

Methuen*, in his own justification, said, he consented to the article, because he saw it was insisted on so much, that no treaty could be concluded, unless that point were yielded; the low state of their affairs, in the year 1662, when the protection of England was all they had in view, for their preservation, made such a difference between that and the present time, that the one was not to be set up for a precedent to govern the other; besides, even then the matter was much contested in their councils, though the extremities to which they were reduced made them yield it. The lord Godolphin looked on this as too inconsiderable to be insisted on, the whole affairs of Europe seemed to turn upon this treaty, and so important a matter ought not to be retarded a day for such punctilios as a salute, or striking the flag; and it seemed reasonable that every sovereign prince should claim this acknowledgment, unless where it was otherwise stipulated by express treaties. The laying so much weight on such matters very much heightened jealousies; and it was said, that the earl of Nottingham, and the Tories, seemed to lay hold on every thing that could obstruct the progress of the war; while the round proceeding of the lord Godolphin reconciled many to him. The queen confirmed the treaty†; upon which the court of Vienna was desired to do their part. But that court proceeded with its ordinary slowness, the mildest censure passed on these delays was, that they proceeded from an unreasonable affectation of magnificence in the ceremonial, which could not be performed soon, nor easily, in a poor but a haughty court; it was done at last, but so late in the year, that the new declared king of Spain could not reach Holland before the end of October. A squadron of our fleet was lying there to bring him over; such as was wont to convoy the late king when he crossed the seas. But the ministers of the king of Spain thought it was not strong enough; they pretended they had advertisements that the French had a stronger squadron in Dunkirk, which might be sent out to intercept him; so an additional strength was sent; this lost some time, and a fair wind.

It had like to have been more fatal; for about the end of November the weather grew very boisterous, and broke out on the 27th of November, in the most violent storm, both by sea and land, that had been known in the memory of man: the city of London was so shaken with it, that people were generally afraid of being buried in the ruins of their houses. Some houses fell and crushed their masters to death; great hurt was done in the southern parts of England; little happening in the north, where the storm was not so violent. There was a great fall of trees, chiefly of elms, that were blown down by the wind. We had, at that time, the best part of our naval force upon the sea; which filled all people with great apprehensions of an irreparable loss; and indeed, if the storm had not been at its height at full flood, and in a spring tide, the loss might have proved fatal to the nation. It was so considerable, that fourteen or fifteen men of war were cast away, in which one thousand five hundred seamen perished; few merchantmen were lost; such as were driven to sea were safe: some few only were over-set. Thus the most threatening danger, to which the nation could be exposed, went off with little damage: we saw all our hazard, since the loss of our fleet must have been the loss of the nation. If this great hurricane had come at low water, or in a quarter tide, our ships must have been driven out upon the banks of sand that lie before the coast, and have stuck and perished there, as some of the men of war did; but the sea being so full of water, all but some heavy ships got over these safe: our squadron, which was then in the Maes, suffered but little, and the ships were soon refitted, and ready to sail.

* Jonathan Methuen was the representative in parliament of Devizes from 1690 to 1702. Educated for the profession of the law, he practised with success, and rose to the dignity of lord chancellor of Ireland. According to Mackay's "Characters," he was nearly promoted to the same high office in England. It is an instance of the ill government to which Ireland has for centuries been subjected, that whilst he held the station of its highest law officer, he was employed as ambassador to Portugal; where he died in 1706. Mackay's "Characters" and Dean Swift unite in giving him a very degrading character. The first says "he was a man of intrigue, but very muddy in his conceptions, and not quickly understood in any thing;" the latter, still more virulent, describes him as "a profligate rogue, without religion, or morals, but cunning enough, though without abilities of any kind." He was buried in Westminster abbey. His letters do not show any deficiency of sense.—Clarendon Correspondence, Oxford edition of this work; Noble's Contin. of Granger.

About the end of December, the king of Spain landed at Portsmouth; the duke of Somerset was sent by the queen to receive him, and to bring him to an interview, which was to be at Windsor*; prince George went and met him on the way, and he was treated with great magnificence: the court was very splendid, and much thronged; the queen's behaviour towards him was very noble and obliging: the young king charmed all that were there; he had a gravity beyond his age, tempered with much modesty; his behaviour was in all points so exact, that there was not a circumstance in his whole deportment that was liable to censure; he paid an extraordinary respect to the queen, and yet maintained a due greatness in it. He had an art of seeming well pleased with every thing, without so much as smiling once all the while he was at court, which was only three days: he spoke but little, and all he said was judicious and obliging. All possible haste was made in fitting out the fleet, so that he set sail in the beginning of January, and for five days he had a fair wind with good weather, but then the wind changed, and he was driven back to Portsmouth. He lay there above three weeks, and then he had a very prosperous navigation. The forces that were ordered to go over to his assistance were by this time got ready to attend on him, so he sailed with a great fleet, both of men of war and transport ships: he arrived happily at Lisbon, where he was received with all the outward expressions of joy and welcome, and at an expence, in a vain magnificence, which that court could not well bear; but a national vanity prevailed to carry this too far, by which other things that were more necessary were neglected: that court was then very melancholy; for the young infanta, whom the king of Spain was to have married, as had been agreed, died a few days before his arrival.

While this negotiation with Portugal was carried on, the duke of Savoy began to see his own danger, if the two crowns should come to be united; and he saw, that if the king of France drove the imperialists out of Italy, and became master of the Milanese, he must lie exposed, and at mercy; he had married his two daughters to the duke of Burgundy, and to king Philip of Spain; but as he wrote to the emperor, he was now to take care of himself and his son; his alliance with France was only for one year, which he had renewed from year to year, so he offered, at the end of the year, to enter into the great alliance; and he demanded for his share, the Novarize, and the Montferrat. His leaving the allies, as he had done in the former war, showed that he maintained the character of his family, of changing sides, as often as he could expect better terms, by a new turn; yet his interest lay so visibly now on the side of the alliance, that it was very reasonable to believe he was resolved to adhere firmly to it. So when the demands he made were laid before the court of Vienna, and from thence transmitted to England, and Holland, all the assistance that he proposed was promised him: the court of Vienna had no money to spare, but England and the States were to pay him twenty thousand pounds a month, of which England was to pay him two thirds, and the States the rest.

Since I am to relate the rest of this transaction, I must look back, and give some account of his departing from the alliance in the former war, which I had from Monsieur Herval, who was then the king's envoy in Switzerland, a French refugee, but originally of a German

* Charles Seymour, commonly known as "the proud duke of Somerset." He was born in 1662, and died in 1748. He was interred in Salisbury cathedral. Noble relates several anecdotes, fully justifying the popular epithet applied to him. Under queen Anne he was master of the horse, privy councillor, and a commissioner for the union; but upon the change of ministry he was superseded. Indignant, he, with the duke of Argyle, forced himself into the council at Kensington, summoned to deliberate upon the situation of the nation, the queen lying dead at the time. This disconcerted all the plans of the tory party. George the First restored him to all his honours, but from thence he was removed again for expressing himself with indecorous warmth, because bail was refused for his son-in-law, sir William Wyndham, suspected of treasonable correspondence with the exiled court. Upon this he had all his servants' liveries taken in a cart and thrown into the yard of the palace. These liveries were the same as those worn by the royal footmen. His servants were directed by signs, and couriers preceded him to clear the country roads, that he might pass without obstruction or observation. A countryman driving a pig, instead of obeying the mandate, held up the hog by the ears, indignantly exclaiming, "I see him, and so shall my pig." He had two wives; Eliza, only child of the earl of Northumberland; and Charlotte, daughter of the earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham. The latter once tapped him upon the shoulder with her fan, upon which he indignantly rebuked her by observing, "My first duchess was a Percy, and she never took such a liberty." His two youngest daughters were accustomed to stand and watch him by turns as he slept in the afternoon. One of them being wearied, sat down, which he observing as he suddenly awaked, declared she should remember. By his will he left her 20,000*l.* less than her sister. Such a proud brute must have been a fool.

family of Augsburg, settled but lately in France. In January, 1696, when the plot for assassinating the king and invading the nation was thought so surely laid, that it could not miscarry, the king of France sent M. Chanley very secretly to the duke of Savoy, with a full credence to the propositions he was to make, demanding a positive answer within six hours; with that the duke of Orleans wrote very warmly to him; he said, he had employed all his interest with the king his brother, to get these offers made to him, which he conjured him to accept of, otherwise he must look for utter ruin, without remedy, or recovery. Chanley told him, that at that present time, he was to reckon that king James was repossessed of the throne of England, and that the prince of Orange was either dead, or in his hands; so he offered to restore Casal and Pigneroll, and all that was afterwards agreed to by the treaty, if he would depart from the alliance. The duke of Savoy being thus alarmed with a revolution of England, and being so straitened in time, thought the extreme necessity, to which he would be reduced, in case that was true, must justify his submitting, when otherwise his ruin was unavoidable. The worst part of this was, that he got leave to pretend to continue in the alliance, till he had drawn all the supplies he was to expect for that year from England, and the States, and then the whole matter was owned, as has been related in the transactions of that year. I leave this upon the credit of him from whom I had it, who assured me he was well informed concerning it.

The duke of Savoy having now secretly agreed to enter into the alliance, did not declare it, but continued still denying it to the French, that so when the duke of Vendome sent back his troops to him, at the end of the campaign, he might more safely own it. The French had reason to suspect a secret negotiation, but could not penetrate into it, so they took an effectual, though a very fraudulent method to discover it, which was told me soon after by the earl of Pembroke. They got the elector of Bavaria to write to him, with all seeming sincerity, and with great secrecy, for he sent it to him by a subject of his own, so well disguised and directed, that the duke of Savoy was imposed on by this management: in this letter, the elector complained bitterly of the insolence and perfidiousness of the French, into whose hands he had put himself: he said, he saw his error now, when it was too late to see how he could correct it; yet if the duke of Savoy, who was almost in as bad a state as himself, would join with him, so that they might act by concert, they might yet not only recover themselves, but procure a happy peace for all the rest of Europe. The duke of Savoy, mistrusting nothing, wrote him a frank answer, in which he owned his own designs, and encouraged the elector to go on, and offered all offices of friendship on his behalf, with the rest of the allies. The French, who knew by what ways the Savoyard was to return, seized him, without so much as acquainting the elector with the discovery that they had made: they saw now into this secret; so when the time came, in which the duke of Vendome ought to have sent back his troops to him, they were made prisoners of war, contrary to all treaties; and with this the war began in those parts. It was much apprehended that, considering the weak and naked state in which the duke of Savoy then was, the French would have quickly mastered him; but count Staremberg ventured on a march, which military men said was the best laid, and the best executed of any in the whole war: he marched from the Modenese, in the worst season of the year, through ways that, by reason of the rains that had fallen, seemed impracticable, having in many places the French both before and behind him; he broke through all, and in conclusion joined the duke of Savoy, with a good body of horse. By this he was rendered safe in Piedmont; it is true the French made themselves quickly masters of all Savoy, except Montmelian, where some small actions happened, much to the duke's advantage. The Switzers interposed to obtain a neutrality for Savoy, though without effect.

The rising in the Cevennes had not been yet subdued, though mareschal Montravel was sent with an army to reduce or destroy them: he committed great barbarities, not only on those he found in arms, but on whole villages, because they, as he was informed, favoured them: they came often down out of their hills in parties, ravaging the country, and they engaged the king's troops with much resolution, and sometimes with great advantage: they seemed resolved to accept of nothing less than the restoring their edicts to them; for a connivance at their own way of worship was offered them : they had many among them who seemed qualified in a very singular manner, to be the teachers of the rest ; they had a great measure of zeal without any learning ; they scarcely had any education at all ; I spoke with the person who, by the queen's order, sent one among them to know the state of their affairs ; I read some of the letters, which he brought from them, full of a sublime zeal and piety, expressing a courage and confidence that could not be daunted ; one instance of this was, that they all agreed, that if any of them was so wounded in an engagement with the enemy, that he could not be brought off, he should be shot dead, rather than be left alive to fall into the enemy's hands ; it was not possible then to form a judgment of that insurrection, the reports about it were so various and uncertain, it being as much magnified by some, as it was undervalued by others : the whole number that they could reckon on was four thousand men, but they had not arms and clothes for half that number, so they used these by turns, while the rest were left at home, to follow their labour : they put the country all about them in a great fright, and to a vast expence ; while no intelligence could be had of their designs, and they broke out in so many different places, that all who lay within their reach were in a perpetual agitation ; it was a lamentable thing that they lay so far within the country, that it was not possible to send supplies to them unless the duke of Savoy should be in a condition to break into Dauphiny ; and therefore advices were sent them, to accept of such terms as could be had, and to reserve themselves for better times.

In Poland, the scene was more embroiled than ever ; there was some appearance of peace this summer, but it went off in winter : the old fierce cardinal drew a diet to Warsaw ; there it was declared that their king had broken all their laws : upon that, they, by a formal sentence, deposed him, and declared the throne vacant. This was done in concert with the king of Sweden, who lay with his army at some distance from them, in the neighbourhood of Dantzic, which alarmed the citizens very much : it was believed that they designed to choose Sobieski, the eldest son of the late king, who then lived at Breslau, in Sillesia, and being in the emperor's dominions, he thought himself safer than he proved to be ; the king of Poland retired into Saxony in some haste, which made many conclude, that he resolved to abandon Poland ; but he laid another design, which was executed to his mind, though in the sequel it proved not much to his advantage ; Sobieski and his brother were in a correspondence with the party in Poland that opposed the king, upon which they ought to have looked to their own security with more precaution : they, it seems, apprehended nothing where they then were, and so diverted themselves at hunting, and otherwise in their usual manner ; upon this some, sent by the king of Poland, took them both prisoners, and brought them to Dresden, where they were safely kept ; and all the remonstrances that the emperor could make upon such an act of hostility had no effect. This for a while broke their measures at Warsaw ; many forsook them, while the king of Sweden seemed implacable in his opposition to Augustus, whose chief confidence was in the czar : it was suspected that the French had a management in this matter ; since it was certain that, by the war in Poland, a great part of that force was diverted which might otherwise have been engaged in the common cause of the great alliance. All the advices that we had from thence agreed in this, that the king of Sweden himself was in no understanding with the French, but it was visible that what he did contributed not a little to serve their ends. This was the state of affairs at land.

I turn next to another element, and to give an account of the operations at sea, where things were ill designed, and worse executed : the making prince George our lord high admiral, proved in many instances very unhappy to the nation : men of bad designs imposed on him, he understood those matters very little, and they sheltered themselves under his name, to which a great submission was paid ; but the complaints rose the higher for that ; our main fleet was ready to go out in May, but the Dutch fleet was not yet come over ; so Rook was sent out to alarm the coast of France ; he lingered long in port, pretending ill health ; upon that Churchill was sent to command the fleet ; but Rook's health returned happily for him, or he thought fit to lay aside that pretence, and went to sea, where he continued a month ; but in such a station as if his design had been to keep far from meeting the French fleet, which sailed out at that time ; and to do the enemy no harm, not so much as to disturb their quiet, by coming near their coast ; at last he returned without having attempted any thing *.

It was after this resolved to send a strong fleet into the Mediterranean : it was near the end of June before they were ready to sail, and they had orders to come out of the streights by the end of September : every thing was so ill laid in this expedition as if it had been intended that nothing should be done by it besides the convoying our merchant ships, which did not require the fourth part of such a force. Shovel was sent to command ; when he saw his instructions he represented to the ministry that nothing could be expected from this voyage ; he was ordered to go, and he obeyed his orders : he got to Leghorn by the beginning of September. His arrival seemed to be of great consequence, and the allies began to take courage from it ; but they were soon disappointed of their hopes when they understood that by his orders he could only stay a few days there ; nor was it easy to imagine what the design of so great an expedition could be, or why so much money was thrown away on such a project, which made us despised by our enemies, whilst it provoked our friends, who might justly think they could not depend upon such an ally who managed so great a force with so poor a conduct, as neither to hurt their enemies, nor protect their friends by it.

A squadron was sent to the West Indies, commanded by Graydon, a man brutal in his way, and not well affected to the present state of affairs. The design was, to gather all the forces that we had, scattered up and down the plantations, and with that strength to go and take Placentia, and so to drive the French out of the Newfoundland trade : but the secret of this was so ill kept, that it was commonly talked of before he sailed : the French had timely notice of it, and sent a greater force to defend the place than he could bring together to attack it. His orders were pressing, in particular, that he should not go out of his way to pursue any of the enemy's ships whom he might see ; these he observed so punctually, that when he saw a squadron of four French men of war sailing towards Brest, that were visibly foul, and in no condition to make any resistance, he sent indeed one of his ships to view them, who engaged them, but Graydon gave the signal to call him off, upon which they got safe into Brest. This was afterwards known to be Du Casse's squadron, who was bringing treasure home from Carthage, and other ports of the West Indies, reported to be four millions of pieces of eight ; but though here was a good prey lost, yet so careful was the prince's council to excuse every thing, done by such a man, that they ordered an advertisement to be put in the gazette, to justify Graydon ; in which it was said that, pursuant to his orders, he had not engaged that fleet. The orders were indeed strangely given, yet our admirals had never thought themselves so bound down to them, but that, upon great occasions, they might make stretches ; especially where the advantage was visible, as it was in this case ; for since they were out of the way of new orders, and new occasions might happen, which could not be known, when their orders were given, the nature of the service seemed to give them a greater liberty than was fit to be allowed in the land service. When he came to the plantations, he acted in so savage a manner, as if he had been sent rather to terrify than to protect them : when he had drawn the forces together that were in the plantations, he went to attack Placentia : but he found it to be so well defended, that he did not think fit so much as to make any attempt upon it : so this expedition ended very ingloriously, and many complaints of Graydon's conduct were sent after him.

* Sir George Rooke was not a supporter of the whig party in parliament, which appears to be the only reason that actuated Burnet in always disparaging this gallant seaman. William the Third had more magnanimity, for, when urged by his ministry to discharge Rooke for opposing them in the house of commons, the king replied—"No ; if you have anything to allege against his conduct in the navy, I may comply with your request ; but I will never discharge a brave and experienced officer, who hath always behaved well in my service, for no other reason than his conduct in parliament." He was a native of Kent, born in 1650, and dying in 1709. Two or three anecdotes will place his character in a true light. In 1700, when serving in the Baltic, and endeavouring to mediate a peace between Sweden and Denmark, but the latter being refractory, he bombarded Copenhagen, and compelled them to be reasonable. The king of Sweden urged him to be more rigorous towards them, but Rooke very calmly replied, "Sir, I was sent hither to serve your majesty not to ruin the king of Denmark." Party spirit eventually prevailed, and in 1705 he was removed from the command of the fleet. When making his will, a friend remarked that his fortune was less than might have been expected, to which sir George answered—"True ; I do not leave much, but what I do leave was honestly gotten ; it never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."—Campbell's Lives of the Admirals ; Noble's Contin. of Grainger.

There was also a great complaint through the whole fleet of their victualling ; we lost many of our seamen, who, as was said, were poisoned by ill food ; and though great complaints were made of the victuallers before the fleet went out, yet there was not such care taken to look into it as a matter of that consequence deserved : the merchants did also complain that they were ill served with convoys, and so little care had been taken of the Newcastle fleet, that the price of coals rose very high ; it was also said, that there was not a due care had of our seamen that were taken by the privateers, many of them died by reason of their ill usage, while others, to deliver themselves from that, went into the French service. Thus all our marine affairs were much out of order, and these disorders were charged on those who had the conduct of them ; every thing was unprosperous, and that will always be laid heavily on those who are in the management of affairs : it is certain that, in the beginning of this reign, all those who hated the late king and his government, or had been dismissed the service by him, were sought out, and invited into employments : so it was not to be expected that they could be faithful, or cordial, in the war against France.

The affairs of Scotland come next to be related : a new parliament was called, and many were chosen to serve in it, who were believed to be in secret engagements with the court at St. Germain's : the lords, who had hitherto kept out of parliament, and were known to be jacobites, came and qualified themselves by taking the oaths to vote in parliament : it was set up for a maxim by the new ministry, that all the jacobites were to be invited home ; so a proclamation was issued out, of a very great extent, indemnifying all persons, for all treasons committed before April last, without any limitation of time for their coming home to accept of this grace, and without demanding any security of them for the future. The duke of Queensbury was sent down the queen's commissioner to the parliament ; this inflamed all those who had formerly opposed him : they resolved to oppose him still in every thing, and the greater part of the jacobites joined with them, but some of them were bought off, as was said, by him : he, seeing so strong an opposition formed against him, studied to engage the presbyterian party to stick to him : and even the party that united against him were so apprehensive of the strength of that interest, that they likewise studied to court them, and were very careful not to give them any umbrage. By this, all the hopes of the episcopal party were lost, and every thing relating to the church did not only continue in the same state in which it was during the former reign, but the presbyterians got a new law in their favour, which gave them as firm a settlement, and as full a security, as law could give ; for an act passed, not only confirming the claim of rights, upon which the crown had been offered to the late king, one of its articles being against prelacy, and for a parity in the church, but it was declared high treason to endeavour any alteration of it. It had been often proposed to the late king to pass this into an act, but he would never consent to it ; he said, he had taken the crown on the terms in that claim, and that therefore he would never make a breach on any part of it ; but he would not bind his successors by making it a perpetual law. Thus a ministry that carried all matters relating to the church to so great a height ; yet, with other views, gave a fatal stroke to the episcopal interest in Scotland, to which the late king would never give way. The great debates in this session were concerning the succession of the crown, in case the queen should die without issue. They resolved to give the preference to that debate before they would consider the supplies ; it was soon resolved that the successor to the crown after the queen, should not be the same person that was king, or queen, of England, unless the just rights of the nation should be declared in parliament, and fully settled in an independence upon English interests and councils. After this they went to name particulars, which by some were carried so far, that those expedients were indeed the setting up a commonwealth, with the empty name of a king ; for it was proposed that the whole administration should be committed to a council, named by parliament, and that the legislature should be entirely in the parliament, by which no shadow of power was left with the crown, and it was merely a nominal thing ; but the further entering upon expedients was laid aside for that time, only one act passed that went a great way towards them : it was declared, that no succeeding king should have the power to engage the nation in a war, without consent of parliament. Another act of a strange nature passed, allowing the importation of French goods, which, as was pretended, were to be imported in the ships of a neutral state. The truth was, the revenue was so exhausted, that they had not enough to support the government without such help : those who desired to drink good wine, and all who were concerned in trade, ran into it ; so it was carried, though with great opposition ; the jacobites also went into it, since it opened a free correspondence with France ; it was certainly against the public interest of the government in opposition to which private interest will often prevail. The court of St. Germain, perceiving such a disjointing in Scotland, and so great an opposition made in parliament, was from thence encouraged to set all their emissaries in that kingdom at work, to engage both the chief of the nobility, and the several tribes in the Highlands, to be ready to appear for them. One Frazer had gone through the Highlands the former year, and from thence he went to France, where he pretended he had authority from the Highlanders, to undertake to bring together a body of twelve thousand men, if they might be assisted by some force, together with officers, arms, ammunition, and money from France. After he had delivered this message to the queen at St. Germain, she recommended him to the French ministers : so he had some audiences of them. He proposed that five thousand men should be sent from Dunkirk to land near Dundee, with arms for twenty thousand men ; and that five hundred should be sent from Brest, to seize on Fort William, which commanded the great pass in the Highlands. The French hearkened to all this, but would not venture much upon slight grounds, so they sent him back with some others, in whom they confided more, to see how much they might depend on, and what the strength of the Highlanders was ; they were also ordered to try whether any of the great nobility of that kingdom would engage in the design.

When these came over, Frazer got himself secretly introduced to the duke of Queensbury, to whom he discovered all that had been already transacted ; and he undertook to discover the whole correspondence between St. Germain and the jacobites : he also named many of the lords who opposed him most in parliament, and said, they were already deeply engaged. The duke of Queensbury hearkened very willingly to all this, and he gave him a pass to go through the Highlands again, where he found some were still very forward, but others were more reserved. At his return, he resolved to go back to France, and promised to make a more entire discovery : he put one letter in the duke of Queensbury's hands, from the queen at St. Germain, directed on the back (but by another hand) to the Marquis of Athol : the letter was written in such general terms, that it might have been directed to any of the great nobility ; and probably he who was trusted with it had power given him to direct it to any, to whom he found it would be most acceptable : for there was nothing in the letter that was particular to any one person or family ; it only mentioned the promises and assurances sent to her by that lord. This Frazer had been accused of a rape, committed on a sister of the lord Athol's, for which he was convicted and outlawed ; so it might be supposed, that he, to be revenged of the lord Athol, who had prosecuted him for that crime, might put his name on the back of that letter. It is certain that the others, who were more trusted, and were sent over with him, avoided his company, so that he was not made acquainted with that proceeding. Frazer came up to London in winter, and had some meetings with the practising jacobites about the town, to whom he discovered his negotiation ; he continued still to persuade the duke of Queensbury of his fidelity to him : his name was not told the queen, for when the duke of Queensbury wrote to her an account of the discovery, he added, that unless she commanded it, he had promised not to name the person, for he was to go back to St. Germain, to complete the discovery. The queen did not ask his name, but had more regard to what he said, because in the main it agreed with the intelligence, that her ministers had from their spies at Paris. The duke of Queensbury procured a pass for him to go to Holland, but by another name ; for he opened no part of this matter to the earl of Nottingham, who gave the pass. The jacobites in London suspected Frazer's correspondence with the duke of Queensbury, and gave advertisement to the lord Athol, and by this means the whole matter broke out, as shall be told afterwards. What influence soever this, or any other practice might have in Scotland, it is certain the opposition in parliament grew still greater ; and since the duke of Queensbury would not suffer them to proceed, in those strange limitations upon the crown, that had been proposed, though the queen ordered him to pass the other bills, they would give no supply ; so that the pay of the army, with the charge of the government, was to run upon credit, and by this means matters there were likely to come to extremities. A national humour of rendering themselves a free and independent kingdom did so inflame them, that as they had a majority of seventy in parliament, they seemed capable of the most extravagant things that could be suggested to them: the greatest part of the ministry forsook the duke of Queensbury in parliament; both the earl of Seafield, lord chancellor, the marquis of Athol, the lord privy seal, and lord Tarbet, the secretary of state, with all that depended on them, broke off from him: yet upon the conclusion of the session, Athol was made a duke, and Tarbet was made earl of Cromarty, which looked like rewarding them for their opposition*. Soon after that, the queen resolved to revive the order of the thistle, that had been raised by her father, but was let fall by the late king: it was to be carried in a green ribbon, as the George is in a blue, and the glory was in the form of a St. Andrew's cross, with a thistle in the middle. Argyle, Athol, Annandale, Orkney, and Seafield were the first that had it, the number being limited to twelve†. And to such a height did the disorders in that kingdom rise, that great skill and much secret practice seemed necessary to set matters right there: the aversion and jealousy towards those who had been most active in the last reign, and the favour showed to those who were in king James's interests, had an appearance of bringing matters out of an excess, to a temper: and it was much magnified by those who intended to flatter the queen, on design to ruin her. Though the same measures were taken in England, yet there was less danger in following them here than there: errors might be sooner observed, and easier corrected, where persons are in view, and are watched in all their motions: but this might prove fatal at a greater distance, where it was more easy to deny, or palliate, things, with great assurance. The duke of Queensbury's engrossing all things to himself, increased the disgust, at the credit he was in: he had begun a practice of drawing out the sessions of parliament to an unusual length, by which his appointments exhausted so much of the revenue, that the rest of the ministers were not paid, and that will always create discontent; he trusted entirely to a few persons, and his conduct was liable to just exceptions: some of those who had the greatest credit with him were believed to be engaged in a foreign interest, and his passing, or rather promoting the act, that opened a correspondence with France, was considered as a design, to settle a commerce there; and upon that, his fidelity, or his capacity, were much questioned.

There were still high discontents in Ireland, occasioned by the behaviour of the trustees there. The duke of Ormond was the better received when he went to that government, because he came after the earl of Rochester; till it appeared that he was in all things governed by him; and that he pursued the measures which he had begun to take, of raising new divisions in that kingdom; for, before that time, the only division in Ireland was, that * James Douglas, second duke of Queensbury, was born in 1662. When returned from travelling, Charles the Second appointed him a privy councillor for Scotland, but these and other appointments he resigned when James succeeded to the throne. William restored him to all his offices, appointed him a lord of the bedchamber, a captain in the Dutch guard, made him a lord of the treasury, permitted him to vote in the house of lords as a Scotch peer, though his father was living, and appointed him to the lord treasurer'ship of Scotland. In 1695, upon the death of his father, he resigned all his military employments, but was made lord privy seal, an extraordinary lord of session, knight of the garter, and for two sessions lord high commissioner. In this post he was retained by queen Anne, and she named him a commissioner of the union, of which he was a chief promoter, and for which he received extraordinary marks of public favour. He was elected one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland. In 1704 he was obliged to retire from office by the superior numbers of his political opponents, but the next year returned to power as first lord of the treasury, and privy seal. He was raised to the English peerage as duke of Dover, marquis of Beverley, and baron Rippon. From 1710 until his death in 1711, he was one of the secretaries of state for the united kingdoms. His political opponents represent him in very odious lights, but there is no doubt that he was a talented, virtuous man.—Noble's Contin. of Grainger; Lockhart Papers—Peerages.

George Mackenzie, lord Macleod, and Castlehaven, viscount Tarbet, and earl of Cromartie, was distinguished for his loyalty in the reigns of Charles, James, and William. Besides the other appointments mentioned by Burnet, queen Anne appointed him justice-general, an office he resigned in 1710. He died in 1714, in his eighty-fourth year.—Noble.

† The order of the thistle was instituted by James the Fifth of Scotland, in the year 1554; revived by our James the Second in 1697, and re-established, as mentioned in the text, by queen Anne. The order consists of the sovereign, and twelve brethren, or knights. The star is a St. Andrew's cross of silver embroidery, with rays emanating between the points of the cross, on the centre of which is a thistle of green and gold upon a field green, round which is a circle of gold, and on this the motto "Nemo me impune lacessit," (No one provokes me with impunity.) The jewel and collar correspond.

of English and Irish, protestants and papists; but of late an animosity came to be raised there, like that we labour under in England, between whig and tory. The wiser sort of the English resolved to oppose this all they could; and to proceed with temper and moderation: the parliament there was opened with speeches and addresses, that carried the compliments to the duke of Ormond so far, as if no other person besides himself could have given them that settlement which they expected from his government. The trustees had raised a scandal upon that nation, as if they designed to set up an independence upon England; so they began the session with a vote, disclaiming that as false and injurious. They expressed on all occasions their hatred of the trustees and of their proceedings, yet they would not presume to meddle with any thing they had done, pursuant to the act that had passed in England, which vested the trust in them. They offered the necessary supplies, but took exceptions to the accounts that were laid before them, and observed some errors in them. This begat an uneasiness in the duke of Ormond; for though he was generous, and above all sordid practices, yet being a man of pleasure, he was much in the power of those who acted under him, and whose integrity was not so clear. One great design of the wiser among them was, to break the power of popery, and the interest, that the heads of the Irish families had among them: they enacted the succession of the crown, to follow the pattern set them by England in every particular. They also passed an act concerning papists, somewhat like that which had passed in England three years before; but with some more effectual clauses, for the want of which we have not yet had any fruit from our act: the main difference was that which made it look less invidious, and yet was more effectual, for breaking the dependence on the heads of families; for it was provided, that all estates should be equally divided among the children of papists, notwithstanding any settlements to the contrary, unless the persons on whom they were settled qualified themselves by taking the oaths, and coming to the communion of the church: this seemed to carry no hardship to the family in general, and yet gave hopes of weakening that interest so considerably, that the bill was offered to the duke of Ormond, pressing him with more than usual vehemence, to intercede so effectually, that it might be returned back under the great seal of England. They understood that the papists of Ireland had raised a considerable sum, to be sent over to England, to support their practices, in order to the stopping this bill: it came over, warmly recommended by the duke of Ormond; but it was as warmly opposed by those who had a mind to have a share in the presents, that were ready to be made. The pretence for opposing it was, that while the queen was so deeply engaged with the emperor, and was interceding for favour to the protestants in his dominions, it seemed not seasonable, and was scarcely decent, to pass so severe a law against those of his religion: though this had the less strength, since it was very evident that all the Irish papists were in the French interest, so there was no reason to apprehend that the emperor could be much concerned for them. The parliament of England was sitting when this bill came over, and men's eyes were much set on the issue of it; so that the ministers judged it was not safe to deny it: but a clause was added, which they hoped would hinder its being accepted in Ireland. That matter was carried on so secretly, that it was known to none, but those who were at the council, till the news of it came from Ireland, upon its being sent thither; the clause was to this purpose, that none in Ireland should be capable of any employment, or of being in the magistracy in any city, who did not qualify themselves by receiving the sacrament, according to the test-act passed in England, which before this time had never been offered to the Irish nation. It was hoped by those who got this clause to be added to the bill, that those in Ireland who promoted it most, would now be the less fond of it, when it had such a weight hung to it: the greatest part of Ulster was possessed by the Scotch, who adhered stiffly to their first education in Scotland; and they were so united in that way, that it was believed they could not find such a number of men who would qualify themselves, as was necessary by this clause, to maintain the order and justice of the country. Yet upon this occasion the Irish parliament proceeded with great caution and wisdom; they reckoned that this act, so far as it related to papists, would have a certain and great effect for their common security; and that when it was once passed, it would never be repealed; whereas if great inconveniences did arise upon this new clause, it would be an easier thing to obtain a repeal of it, in a subsequent parliament, either of England or Ireland. So the act was passed, and those who thought they had managed the matter with a master-piece of cunning, were outwitted by an Irish parliament. However this artifice, and some other things in the Duke of Ormond's conduct, put them into such an ill humour, that the supply bill was clogged and lessened by many clauses added to it. The session ended in so much heat, that it was thought that parliament would meet no more, if the duke of Ormond was continued in the government.

Thus the parts of the government that were thought the most easily managed, Scotland and Ireland, had of late been put into so much disorder, that it might prove no easy work to set them again in order; the government was every where going, as it were, out of joint; its nerves and strength seemed to be much slackened; the trusting and employing not only violent tories, but even known jacobites, as it brought a weakness on the management, so it raised a jealousy that could not be easily cured. Stories were confidently vented, and by some easily believed, that the queen was convinced of the wrong done her pretended brother, and that she was willing to put affairs in the hands of persons who favoured his succession; it was also observed, that our court kept too cold civilities with the house of Hanover, and did nothing that was tender or cordial looking that way; nor were any employed who had expressed a particular zeal for their interests. These things gave great jealousy: all that was said in excuse for trusting such persons, was, that it was fit once to try if good usage could soften them, and bring them entirely into the queen's interests; and assurances were given, that, if upon a trial, the effect hoped for did not follow, they should be again dismissed.

This was the state of our affairs when a new session of parliament was opened in November: the queen, in her speech, expressed a great zeal for carrying on the war, and with relation to the affairs of Europe; she recommended union and good agreement to all her people; she said she wanted words to express how earnestly she desired this. This was understood as an intimation of her desire, that there should be no further proceedings in the bill against occasional conformity: addresses full of respect were made to the queen, in return to her speech; and the lords, in theirs, promised to avoid every thing that should occasion disunion, or contention: but nothing could lay the heat of a party, which was wrought on by some who had designs that were to be denied, or disguised, till a proper time for owning them should appear. A motion was made in the house of commons for bringing in the bill against occasional conformity: great opposition was made to it; the court was against it, but it was carried by a great majority that such a bill should be brought in. So a new draught was formed; in it the preamble, that was in the former bill, was left out. The number, besides the family, that made a conventicle, was enlarged from five to twelve: and the fine set on those, who went to conventicles, after they had received the sacrament, besides the loss of their employment, was brought down to fifty pounds: these were artifices by which it was hoped, upon such softenings, once to carry the bill on any terms; and when that point was gained, it would be easy afterwards to carry other bills of greater severity. There was now such a division upon this matter, that it was fairly debated in the house of commons; whereas, before, it went there with such a torrent, that no opposition to it could be hearkened to. Those who opposed the bill went chiefly upon this ground, that this bill put the dissenters in a worse condition than they were before: so it was a breach made upon the toleration, which ought not to be done, since they had not deserved it by any ill behaviour of theirs, by which it could be pretended that they had forfeited any of the benefits, designed by that act: things of this kind could have no effect, but to embroil us with new distractions, and to disgust persons well affected to the queen and her government: it was necessary to continue the happy quiet that we were now in, especially in this time of war, in which even the severest of persecutors made their stops, for fear of irritating ill humours too much. The old topics of hypocrisy, and of the danger the church was in, were brought up again on behalf of the bill, and the bill passed in the house of commons by a great majority: and so it was sent up to the lords, where it occasioned one debate of many hours, whether the bill should be entertained, and read a second time, or be thrown out: the prince appeared no more for it, nor did he come to the house upon this occasion; some who had voted for it, in the former session, kept out of the house, and others owned they saw farther into the design of the bill, and so voted against it. Upon a division it was carried, by a majority of twelve, not to give it a second reading, but to reject it.

The bishops were almost equally divided: there were two more against it than for it; among these, I had the largest share of censure on me, because I spoke much against the bill: I knew how the act of test was carried, as has been already shown in its proper place; I related that in the house, and the many practices of the papists, of setting us of the church against the dissenters, and the dissenters against us by turns, as it might serve their ends; I ventured to say, that a man might lawfully communicate with a church that he thought had a worship and a doctrine uncorrupted, and yet communicate more frequently with a church that he thought more perfect: I myself had communicated with the churches of Geneva and Holland: and yet at the same time communicated with the church of England: so, though the dissenters were in a mistake, as to their opinion, which was the more perfect church, yet allowing them a toleration in that error, this practice might be justified. I was desired to print what I said upon that occasion, which drew many virulent pamphlets upon me, but I answered none of them: I saw the jacobites designed to raise such a flame among us, as might make it scarcely possible to carry on the war; those who went not so deep, yet designed to make a breach on the toleration by gaining this point; and I was resolved never to be silent, when that should be brought into debate; for I have long looked on liberty of conscience as one of the rights of human nature, antecedent to society, which no man could give up because it was not in his own power: and our Saviour's rule, of doing as we would be done by, seemed to be a very express decision to all men who would lay the matter home to their own conscience, and judge as they would willingly be judged by others.

The clergy over England, who were generally inflamed with this matter, could hardly forgive the queen and the prince the coldness that they expressed on this occasion: the lord Godolphin did so positively declare, that he thought the bill unseasonable, and that he had done all he could to hinder its being brought in, that though he voted to give the bill a second reading, that did not reconcile the party to him: they set up the earl of Rochester as the only man to be depended on who deserved to be the chief minister.

The house of commons gave all the supplies that were necessary for carrying on the war: some tried to tack the bill against occasional conformity to the bill of supply, but they had not strength to carry it: the commons showed a very unusual neglect of all that related to the fleet, which was wont to be one of their chief cares; it was surmised, that they saw that if they opened that door, discoveries would be made of errors that could neither be justified, nor palliated, and that these must come home chiefly to their greatest favourites; so they avoided all examinations that would probably draw some censure on them.

The lords were not so tender; they found great fault with the counsels, chiefly with the sending Shovell to the Mediterranean, and Graydon to the West Indies; and laid all the discoveries that were made to them, with their own observations on them, before the queen, in addresses that were very plain, though full of all due respect: they went on likewise in their examinations of the outcry made of the waste of the public treasure in the last reign; they examined the earl of Orford's accounts, which amounted to seventeen millions, and upon which some observations had been made by the commissioners, for examining the public accounts; they found them all to be false in fact, or ill grounded, and of no importance.

The only particular that seemed to give a just colour to exception was very strictly examined: he had victualled the fleet while they lay all winter at Cadiz: the purser's receipts for the quantity that was laid into every ship were produced, but they had no receipts of the Spaniards, from whom they had bought the provisions; but they had entered the prices of them in their own books, and these were given in upon oath. This matter had been much canvassed in the late king's time, and it stood thus: Russel, now earl of Orford, when he had been ordered to lie at Cadiz, wrote to the board of victualling, to send one over to provide the fleet: they answered, that their credit was then so low, that they could not undertake it: so he was desired to do it upon his own credit. It appeared that no fleet nor single ship had ever been victualled so cheap as the fleet was then by him: it was not the custom in Spain to give receipts; but if any fraud had been intended, it would have been easy to have got the Spaniards, after they had their money, to have signed any receipts that could have been offered them for swelling up the accounts; for the practices of swelling accounts in their dealings with their own court, were well known there. Upon these reasons the lords of the treasury had passed his accounts, and were of opinion that he had done a great service to the government in that whole transaction. The house of lords did now confirm this, and ordered an account of that whole matter to be printed.

The commons made no progress in any discoveries of ill practices in the earl of Ranelagh's office, but concluded that matter with an address to the queen, that she would order a prosecution. This was an artifice to make the nation still think, that great discoveries of corruption might be made, if carefully looked after: it was expected, after such an outcry as they had made, and after the expence the nation was put to, for this commission, and the extraordinary powers that were lodged with the commissioners, that at least some important discoveries should have been made by them.

The commons sent up a bill to the lords for continuing the commission another year: it was observed that an alteration was made of the persons; some who expected better places got their names to be left out. The lords excepted to one Bierly, who was named to be one of the commissioners, because he had been a colonel, and had not yet cleared the accounts of his own regiment; so they struck out his name, and named another; and they added two more, who were not members of the house of commons. The reason of this was, because the members of that house would not appear before them to explain some particulars; they only sent their clerk to inform them, and when the lords sent a message to the house of commons to desire them to order their members to attend on their committee, all the return they had was, that they would send an answer, by messengers of their own; but this was illusory, for they sent no such message. So the lords thought it necessary, in order to their being better informed, to put some in the commission for the future who should be bound to attend upon them as oft as they should be called for. The commons rejected these amendments, and pretended that this was of the nature of a money-bill, and that therefore the lords could make no alterations in it. The message that the commons sent the lords upon this head, came so near the end of the session, that the lords could not return an answer to it, with the reasons for which they insisted on their amendments; so that bill fell.

The charge of this commission amounted to eight thousand pounds a-year; the commissioners made much noise, and brought many persons before them to be examined, and gave great disturbance to all the public offices, what by their attendance on them, what by copying out all their books for their perusal, and yet in a course of many years, they had not made any one discovery; so a full stop was put to this way of proceeding.

An incident happened during this session, which may have great consequences, though in itself it might seem inconsiderable; there have been great complaints long made, and these have increased much within these few years, of great partiality and injustice in the elections of parliament-men, both by sheriffs in counties, and by the returning officers in boroughs. In Aylesbury, the return was made by four constables, and it was believed that they made a bargain with some of the candidates, and then managed the matter, so as to be sure that the majority should be for the person, to whom they had engaged themselves; they canvassed about the town, to know how the voters were set, and they resolved to find some pretence for disabling those who were engaged to vote for other persons than their friends, that they might be sure to have the majority in their own hands. And when this matter came to be examined by the house of commons, they gave the election always for him who was reckoned of the party of the majority, in a manner so barefaced, that they were scarcely out of countenance when they were charged for injustices in judging elections. It was not easy to find a remedy to such a crying abuse, of which all sides in their turns, as they happened to be depressed, had made great complaints; but when they came to be the majority, seemed to have forgot all that they had formerly cried out on. Some few excused this on the topic of retaliation; they said they dealt with others as they had dealt with them, or their friends. At last an action was brought against the constables of Aylesbury, at the suit of one who had been always admitted to vote in former elections, but was denied it in the last election. This was tried at the assizes, and it was found there by the jury, that the constables had denied him a right of which he was undoubtedly in possession, so they were to be cast in damages; but it was moved in the Queen's Bench to quash all the proceedings in that matter, since no action did lie, or had ever been brought, upon that account. Powel, Gould and Powis were of opinion, that no hurt was done the man; that the judging of elections belonged to the house of commons; that as this action was the first of its kind, so if it was allowed, it would bring on an infinity of suits, and put all the officers concerned in that matter upon great difficulties: lord chief justice Holt, though alone, yet differed from the rest; he thought this was a matter of the greatest importance, both to the whole nation in general, and to every man in his own particular; he made a great difference between an election of a member, and a right to vote in such an election; the house of commons were the only judges of the former, whether it was rightly managed or not, without bribery, fraud or violence; but the right of voting in an election was an original right, founded either on a freehold of forty shillings a-year in the county, or on burgageland, or upon a prescription, or by charter, in a borough: these were all legal titles, and as such were triable in a court of law. Acts of parliament were made concerning them, and by reason of these, every thing relating to those acts was triable in a court of law; he spoke long and learnedly, and with some vehemence upon the subject: but he was one against three, so the order of the court went in favour of the constables*. The matter was upon that brought before the house of lords by a writ of error; the case was very fully argued at the bar, and the judges were ordered to deliver their opinions upon it, which they did very copiously.

Chief justice Trevor insisted much on the authority that the house of commons had to judge of all those elections; from that he inferred that they only could judge who were the electors: petitions were often grounded on this, that in the poll some were admitted to a vote who had no right to it, and that others were denied it who had a right; so that in some cases they were the proper judges of this right; and if they had it in some cases, they must have it in all. From this he inferred that every thing relating to this matter was triable by them, and by them only; if two independent jurisdictions might have the same case brought before them, they might give contrary judgments in it; and this must breed great distraction in the execution of those judgments.

To all this it was answered, that a single man, who was wronged in this matter, had no other remedy but by bringing it into a court of law: for the house of commons could not examine the right of every voter, if the man, for whom he would have voted, was returned, he could not be heard to complain to the house of commons, though in his own particular he was denied a vote, since he could not make any exceptions to the return; so he must bear his wrong without a remedy, if he could not bring it into a court of law. A right of voting in an election was the greatest of all the rights of an Englishman, since by that he was represented in parliament; the house of commons could give no relief to a man wronged in this, nor any damages; they could only set aside one, and admit of another return; but this was no redress to him that suffered the wrong; it made him to be the less considered in his borough, and that might be a real damage to him in his trade; since this was a right inherent in a man, it seemed reasonable that it should be brought, where all other rights were tried, into a court of law; the abuse was new, and was daily growing, and it was already swelled to a great height; when new disorders happen, new actions must lie, otherwise there is a failure in justice, which all laws abhor; practices of this sort were enormous and crying; and if the judgment in the Queen's Bench was affirmed, it would very much increase these disorders, by this indemnity that seemed to be given to the officers, who took the poll.

After a long debate it was carried by a great majority to set aside the order in the Queen's Bench, and to give judgment according to the verdict given at the assizes. This gave great offence to the house of commons, who passed very high votes upon it, against the man of Aylesbury, as guilty of a breach of their privileges, and against all others who should for the future bring any such suits into courts of law; and likewise against all counsel, attorneys and others, who should assist in any such suits; and they affirmed that the whole matter relating to elections belonged only to them; yet they did not think fit to send for the man who had sued, or rather in whose name the suit was carried on ; so they let the matter as to him fall, under a show of moderation and pity, and let it rest upon those general votes. The lords on their part ordered the whole state of the case to be drawn up and printed, which was done with much learning and judgment ; they also asserted the right that all the people of England had, to seek for justice in courts of law, upon all such occasions ; and that the house of commons, by their votes, struck at the liberties of the people, at the law of England, and at the judicature of the house of lords ; and they ordered the lord keeper to send a copy of the case and of their votes to all the sheriffs of England, to be communicated to all the boroughs in their counties. The house of commons was much provoked with this, but they could not hinder it ; the thing was popular, and the lords got great credit by the judgment they gave, which let the people of England see how they might be redressed for the future, if they should meet with the injustice, partiality, and other ill practices that had appeared of late in elections, even beyond the examples of former times. This may prove a restraint on the officers, now that they see they are liable to be sued, and that a vote of the house of commons cannot cover them *.

During the session and on her own birth-day, which was the sixth of February, the queen sent a message to the house of commons, signifying her purpose to apply that branch of the revenue that was raised out of the first-fruits and tenths, paid by the clergy, to the increase of all the small benefices in the nation : this branch was an imposition, begun by the popes, in the time of the holy wars, and it was raised as a fund to support those expeditions : but when taxes are once raised by such an arbitrary power as the popes then assumed, and after there has been a submission, and the payments have been settled into a custom, they are always continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at first raised, subsists no more : so this became a standing branch of the papal revenue, until Henry the Eighth seemed resolved to take it away : it was first abolished for a year, probably to draw in the clergy, to consent the more willingly to a change, that delivered them from such heavy impositions : but in the succeeding session of parliament, this revenue was again settled as part of the income of the crown for ever. It is true, it was the more easily borne, because the rates were still at the old value, which in some places was not the tenth, and in most not above the fifth part of the true value : and the clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates should be rigorously set to their full extent.

The tenths amounted to about 11,000*l.* a-year, and the first-fruits, which were more casual, rose one year with another, to 5,000*l.*, so the whole amounted to between sixteen and seventeen thousand pounds a-year : this was not brought into the treasury, as the other branches of the revenue ; but the bishops, who had been the pope's collectors, were now the king's, so persons in favour obtained assignments on them, for life, or for a term of years : this had never been applied to any good use, but was still obtained by favourites, for themselves and their friends : and in king Charles the Second's time, it went chiefly among his women and his natural children. It seemed strange, that while the clergy had much credit at court, they had never represented this as sacrilege, unless it was applied to some religious purpose, and that during archbishop Laud's favour with king Charles the First, or at the restauration of king Charles the Second, no endeavours had been used to appropriate this to better uses: sacrilege was charged on other things, on very slight grounds; but this, which was more visible, was always forgotten *.

* The decision of the court of queen's bench, in this most important case, was reversed in the house of lords by a majority of fifty, opposed by only sixteen. Besides sir John Trevor, the chief justice of the common pleas, baron Price was the only judge that coincided with the three judges of the queen's bench. Chief baron Ward, baron Bury, baron Smith, and justice Tracy agreed with Holt. Justices Neville and Blencowe were absent. Holt emphatically and justly said upon this re-argument, " If such an action comes to be tried before me, I will direct the jury to make the defendant pay well for it. It is denying the plaintiff his English right, and if this action be not allowed, a man may be for ever deprived of it. It is a great privilege to choose such persons as are to bind a man's life and property by the laws they make."

Scarcely any judicial decision ever occasioned such a disturbance in the houses of parliament. The commons made strong resolutions vindicatory of their right alone to determine all matters relative to elections ; which were met by counter resolutions of the peers, quite as strong, declaring that to assert a person deprived of his vote wrongfully, was without a remedy by the ordinary course of law, is destructive of the property of the subject, &c. This occasioned a free conference between the houses, but as neither would yield, the queen soon after dissolved the parliament.—Brown's Cases in Parliament, i. 45 ; Chandler's Debates House of Commons, iii. 308, 388, 395 ; House of Lords, ii. 74, 98 ; Raymond's Rep. ii. 988.

When I wrote the history of the reformation, I considered this matter so particularly, that I saw here was a proper fund for providing better subsistence to the poor clergy; we having among us some hundreds of cures that have not of certain provision, twenty pounds a-year; and some thousands that have not fifty: where the encouragement is so small, what can it be expected clergymen should be? It is a crying scandal that at the restauration of king Charles the Second, the bishops and other dignitaries who raised much above a million in fines, yet did so little this way: I had possessed the late queen with this, so that she was fully resolved, if ever she had lived to see peace and settlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the assignations that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of small benefices. This is plainly insinuated in the essay that I wrote on her memory, some time after her death. I laid the matter before the late king, when there was a prospect of peace, as a proper expression both of his thankfulness to Almighty God, and of his care of the church; I hoped that this might have gained the hearts of the clergy: it might at least have put a stop to a groundless clamour raised against him, that he was an enemy to the clergy, which began to have a very ill effect on all his affairs. He entertained this so well, that he ordered me to speak to his ministers about it: they all approved it, the lord Somers and the lord Halifax did it in a most particular manner; but the earl of Sunderland obtained an assignation, upon two dioceses, for two thousand pounds a-year for two lives; so nothing was to be hoped for after that. I laid this matter very fully before the present queen, in the king's time, and had spoken often of it to the lord Godolphin.

This time was perhaps chosen to pacify the angry clergy, who were dissatisfied with the court, and began now to talk of the danger the church was in, as much as they had done during the former reign: this extraordinary mark of the queen's piety and zeal for the church produced many addresses, full of compliments, but it has not yet had any great effect in softening the tempers of peevish men. When the queen's message was brought to the house of commons, some of the whigs, particularly sir John Holland and sir Joseph Jekyll †, moved that the clergy might be entirely freed from that tax, since they bore as heavy a share of other taxes; and that another fund might be raised of the same value, out of which small benefices might be augmented; but this was violently opposed by Musgrave, and other Tories, who said the clergy ought to be kept still in a dependence on the crown.

Upon the queen's message, a bill was brought in, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation by charter, to apply it to the use for which she now

* The first-fruits, primitiæ, or annates, were the first year's entire profits of a living, or other spiritual preferment, according to a valuation made under the direction of Pope Innocent the Fourth, by Walter, bishop of Norwich, in 1254 (38 Henry III.) and afterwards increased during the pontificate of Nicholas the Third, in 1292 (20 Edward I.). This last valuation is still preserved in the Exchequer. Tenths, or decimæ, were the tenth part of the annual profit of such preferment, according to the same valuation, claimed also by the popes under no more valid title than the command to the Levites, contained in Numbers xviii. 26. This claim met with a vigorous resistance from the English parliament, and a variety of statutes were made to restrain it. That passed in 1405 (6 Henry IV. c. 5) calls it "a horrible mischief and damnable custom." Yet the clergy continued to pay this tax to the papal see as the head of the church, until the statute 26 Henry VIII. c. 3, in 1535, made the king, for the time being, head of the church, and transferred to him the above payments. They continued to be paid to the crown until queen Anne, as mentioned by Burnet, gave them for the improvement of small livings, vesting the funds in trustees by statute 2 Anne, c. 11. It has ever since been known as queen Anne's bounty.—Blackstone's Commentaries, i. 284; Burn's Eccles. Law, ii. 260.

† Sir Joseph Jekyll, the son of a Northamptonshire clergyman, was born in 1663. Adopting the profession of the law, he speedily rose to eminence, was made a serjeant in 1700, and in a few years after became chief justice of Chester. At the death of William he was urged to resign this office, but no threats could induce him to comply with this wish of the court party. In the reign of Anne, as indeed throughout life, he was a truly consistent whig. It will be noticed hereafter, that he was a manager of the trial of Dr. Sacheverel. At the accession of George the First, he was knighted, and in 1717, upon the death of sir John Trevor, he was raised to the mastership of the rolls. Of the jurisdiction of this court he had a dispute with lord chancellor King, and published an essay on the subject. He died in 1738, meriting the character of "a gentleman who meant well, a lover of liberty and his country, an useful subject, an upright lawyer, and an amiable man." His wife, a sister of the great lord Somers, was fond of puzzling the learned Whiston, by asking him odd questions connected with revelation. Once, she enquired of him "why Eve was made of one of Adam's ribs?" He seemed to evade the question, but when she persisted with it, he replied, that he knew no better reason than "because it was the most crooked bone he had."—Gen. Biog. Dict.; Noble's Contin. of Grainger; Woolrych's Life of Jeffreys.

gave it ; they added to this a repeal of the statute of mortmain, so far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed, or by their last wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmenting of benefices ; it was suggested, how truly I cannot tell, that this addition was made in hope that it would be rejected by the lords, and that the scandal of losing the bill might lie on them. It occasioned a great debate in the house of lords : it was said, that this law was made, and kept up, even during the times of popery, and it seemed not reasonable to open a door to practices upon dying men. It was answered, that we had not the arts of affrighting men by the terrors of purgatory, or by fables of apparitions ; where these were practised, it was very reasonable to restrain priests from those artifices by which they had so enriched their church, that without some such effectual checks they would have swallowed up the whole wealth of the world, as they had indeed in England, during popery, made themselves masters of a full third part of the nation. The bishops were so zealous and unanimous for the bill, that it was carried and passed into a law. The queen was pleased to let it be known, that the first motion of this matter came from me ; such a project would have been much magnified at another time ; and those who had promoted it would have been looked on as the truest friends of the church ; but this did not seem to make any great impression at that time ; only it produced a set of addresses from all the clergy of England, full of thanks and just acknowledgments.

I come now in the last place to give the relation of the discoveries made of a plot which took up much of the lords' time, and gave occasion to many sharp reflections that passed between the two houses in their addresses to the queen. About the same time that the story of Frazer's pass, and negotiations began to break out, sir John Macclean, a papist, and the head of that tribe, or clan, in the Highlands and western isles of Scotland, came over from France in a little boat, and landed secretly at Folkstone, in Kent ; he brought his lady with him, though she had been delivered of a child but eleven days before. He was taken, and sent up to London ; and it seemed, by all circumstances, that he came over upon some important design : he pretended at first, that he came only to go through England and Scotland, to take the benefit of the queen's general pardon there ; but when he was told that the pardon in Scotland was not a good warrant to come into England, and that it was high-treason to come from France, without a pass, he was not willing to expose himself to the severity of the law : so he was prevailed on to give an account of all that he knew, concerning the negotiations between France and Scotland. Some others were at the same time taken up upon his information, and some upon suspicion : among these there was one Keith, whose uncle was one of those who was most trusted by the court of St. Germain, and whom they had sent over with Frazer to bring them an account of the temper the Scotch were in, upon which they might depend. Keith had been long at that court, he had free access both to that queen and prince, and hoped they would have made him under secretary for Scotland ; for some time he denied that he knew any thing, but afterwards he confessed he was made acquainted with Frazer's transactions, and he undertook to deal with his uncle to come and discover all he knew, and pretended there was no other design among them but to lay matters so, that the prince of Wales should reign after the queen. Ferguson offered himself to make great discoveries : he said Frazer was employed by the duke of Queensbury to decoy some into a plot which he had framed and intended to discover as soon as he had drawn many into the guilt ; he affirmed that there was no plot among the jacobites, who were glad to see one of the race of the Stuarts on the throne ; and they designed when the state of the war might dispose the queen to a treaty with France to get such terms given her, as king Stephen and king Henry the Sixth had, to reign during her life. When I heard this, I could not but remember what the duke of Athol had said to myself, soon after the queen's coming to the crown ; I said, " I hoped none in Scotland thought of the prince of Wales : " he answered, " he knew none that thought of him as long as the queen lived : " I replied, " that if any thought of him after that, I was sure the queen would live no longer than till they thought their designs for him were well laid : " but he seemed to have no apprehensions of that. I presently told the queen this, without naming the person, and she answered me very quick, there was no manner of doubt of that ; but though I could not but reflect often on that discourse, yet since it was said to me in confidence, I never spoke of it to any one person, during all the enquiry that was now on foot : but I think it too material not to set it down here. Ferguson was a man of a particular character ; upon the revolution he had a very good place given him, but his spirit was so turned to plotting, that within a few months after he turned about, and he has been ever since the boldest and most active man of the jacobite party ; he pretended he was now for high church, but many believed him a papist ; there was matter of treason sworn both against him and Keith, but there was only one witness to it.

At the same time Lindsey was taken up, he had been under-secretary first to the earl of Melfort, and then to the earl of Middleton ; he had carried over from France the letters and orders that gave rise to the earl of Dundee's breaking out, the year after the revolution ; and he had been much trusted at St. Germain's ; he had a small estate in Scotland, and he pretended that he took the benefit of the queen's pardon, and had gone to Scotland to save that, and being secured by this pardon, he thought he might come from Scotland to England ; but he could pretend no colour for his coming to England ; so it was not doubted but that he came hither to manage their correspondence and intrigues. He pretended he knew of no designs against the queen and her government ; and that the court of St. Germain's, and the earl of Middleton in particular, had no design against the queen ; but when he was shewed Frazer's commission to be a colonel, signed by the pretended king, and countersigned Middleton, he seemed amazed at it ; he did not pretend it was a forgery, but he said that things of that kind were never communicated to him.

At the same time that these were taken up, others were taken on the coast of Sussex ; one of these, Boucher, was a chief officer in the duke of Berwick's family, who was then going to Spain, but it was suspected that this was a blind to cover his going to Scotland ; the house of lords apprehended that this man was sent on great designs, and suspecting a remissness in the ministry, in looking after and examining those who came from France, they made an address to the queen, that Boucher might be well looked to ; they did also order sir John Macclean to be brought before them ; but the queen sent them a message, that Macclean's business was then in a method of examination, and that she did not think fit to alter that for some time ; but as for Boucher, and those who were taken with him, the earl of Nottingham told the house, that they were brought up, and that they might do with them as they pleased ; upon that the house sent back Macclean, and ordered the usher of the black rod to take the other prisoners into his custody, and they named a committee of seven lords to examine them. At this time the queen came to the parliament, and acquainted both houses that she had unquestionable proofs of a correspondence between France and Scotland, with which she would acquaint them, when the examinations were taken.

The commons were in an ill humour against the lords, and so they were glad to find occasions to vent it. They thought the lords ought not to have entered upon this examination : they complained of it, as of a new and unheard-of thing, in an address to the queen : they said it was an invasion of her prerogative, which they desired her to exert. This was a proceeding without a precedent : the parliamentary method was, when one house was offended with any thing done in the other, conferences were demanded, in which matters were freely debated. To begin an appeal to the throne was new, and might be managed by an ill-designing prince, so as to end in the subversion of the whole constitution ; and it was an amazing thing to see a house of commons affirm, in so public a manner and so positively, that the lords taking criminals into their own custody, in order to an examination, was without warrant or precedent ; when there were so many instances fresh in every man's memory, especially since the time of the popish plot, of precedents in both houses, that went much further ; of which a full search has been made, and a long list of them was read in the house of lords. That did not a little confound those among them, who were believed to be in a secret correspondence with the house of commons ; they were forced to confess that they saw the lords had clear precedents to justify them in what they had done, of which they were in great doubt before.

The lords upon this made a very long address to the queen, in which they complained of the ill usage they had met with from the house of commons : they used none of those hard words that were in the address made against them by the house of commons, yet they justified every step they had taken, as founded on the law and practice of parliament, and no way contrary to the duty and respect they owed the queen. The behaviour of the house of commons was such, on this occasion, as if they had no mind that plots should be narrowly looked into: no house of parliament, and indeed no court of judicature, did examine any person without taking him into their own custody, during such examination; and if a person's being in custody must restrain a house of parliament from examining him, here was a maxim laid down, by which bad ministers might cover themselves from any enquiry into their ill practices, only by taking the persons who could make discoveries into custody. The lords also set forth the ill consequences that might follow upon one house of parliament carrying their complaints of another to the throne, without taking first the proper method of conferences. This address was drawn with the utmost force, as well as beauty and decency of style; and was reckoned one of the best pieces of its kind that were in all the records of parliament. The queen, in her answer, expressed a great concern to see such a dispute between the two houses.
